morning papers should leave the reader in complete uncertainty as to what has been said. The debate on the second reading of the Irish Tramways and Public Companies' Bill on Wednesday morning is one of these cases. The Government have been greatly pressed by the Irish party to make some provision for relieving the congested districts in the West of Ireland by migration, as well as by emigration; and Mr. Trevelyan is believed to have said in his speech that he would listen to this proposal. But the different newspapers give quite different versions of what he said, and as they are all equally authoritative, it is only by the help of considerations based on general probabilities that we are able to come to any conclusion. The conclusion we have come to is that Mr. Trevelyan was in a yielding mood, and that migration is to have a trial. Our chief reason for thinking this is that the Bill was read a second time without a division, and it is hard to believe that Mr. Parnell would have allowed this, if the Government had not made some concession to his conception of Irish wants. The eleventh clause of the Bill provides that in the section of the Arrears Act which enables grants to be made in aid of emigration, £200,000 shall be substituted for £100,000. As to the advantage of this alteration there can be no reasonable question. It will not only allow of more emigrants being sent out, but also of those who are sent out being provided with a better outfit. The highest sum that can at present be spent on any one emigrant is £5, and by this clause the Government will be able to raise this sum to £8. Unfortunately, the Irish party are pledged to oppose emigration by every means in their power. They have a pet remedy of their own in migration, and though the facts, so far as they are known, probably make against migration, the Members who preach it are not the least disturbed. They draw an imaginary picture of Ireland, and then abuse the Government for not accepting it in lieu of the reality. The real picture, or what we then believed to be the real picture, was painted by Mr. Trevelyan some time ago. In that we see an Ireland in which all the good land is already occupied, and none of the unoccupied land is good. That is precisely what we should have looked for in a country in which the passion for holding land has been so keen, and the population so large in comparison with the means of subsistence. Mr. Trevelyan's description of Ireland outside the districts along the West Coast divides it into land that is cultivated and land that is not cultivated, and this last he again divided into land of which something might be made by a considerable expenditure of money, and land of which nothing can be made by any expenditure whatever. Of these classes, the land that is cultivated is, by the nature of the case, already occupied; while as to the land that is incapable of improvement, nothing can be gained by occupying it. There remains the land which is at once not cultivated, and capable of improvement. But of this, Mr. Trevelyan said distinctly that, when improved, it can only be used for grazing, and no extension of the Irish grazing grounds can give occasion for any large migration of human beings. The contention of the Irish party in opposition to this view is of a double kind. Sometimes they deny that Mr. Trevelyan has stated the facts correctly. A great part of what he sets down as land that can only feed cattle, they maintain to be land that can feed human beings. Of course, if this were so, a good case for migration would have been made out. The overpopulation of Ireland would then be simply a matter of bad distribution. The people are too close together in one district and too far apart in others. Once let them be removed from the part of the island where the soil will not yield enough to feed them, and be planted on those waste lands which only need the application of the spade to blossom like the rose, and all will go well. The other contention is not so often put forward in the House of Commons, but it was made with great plainness in a famous speech of Mr. Davitt's. Why should the rich pastures for which Ireland is famous support cattle only, and not men? The real answer is obvious enough,—Because Nebuchadnezzar has left no imitators. When Irishmen can eat grass, like the ox, the great grazing-farms may profitably be broken up into small holdings. So long as they require a different kind of food, grazing-farms will be best used for their present purpose. This, however, is not at all the answer that the Irish party gives. According to them, the grazing-farms do not support human beings, because the human beings are not there to be supported. Let the starving peasantry of the West be brought to these pastures, and they will be starving no longer. The spade and the plough will soon break up the smooth, green surface, and abundant crops will repay the toil that has brought the land into cultivation.

If the Government are going to spend £50,000 out of the £100,000 referred to in this Bill,—and even Mr. Forster seems to approve of this experiment being made,—our fear is that one or both of two things will happen. When the State is willing to lend money to public companies, it is seldom long before companies are created to borrow it; and we shall be surprised if, in a short time, there do not exist associations formed for the express purpose of bringing waste lands into cultivation, and of changing lands now in pasture into tillage. It is too probable that both these experiments will fail. The waste lands will prove to be good for nothing; the pasture lands will prove to be only good for pasture. But if they do fail, Ireland will not simply be no better for them,—she will be a little the worse. Another hope will have been disappointed; another effort to set natural laws at defiance will have met with the customary fate of such attempts. The Government may see reason for believing that money may be spent in this way to more purpose than they thought would be possible a few months back; and if so, we shall be heartily glad to find that our fears are groundless. But if all that they believe is that the Bill will pass if migration is included among its objects, and not otherwise, it will only be one more instance added to the many in which the real welfare of Ireland has been sacrificed to the ignorant or interested demands of her Parliamentary representatives.

A JAMAICA RITUAL CASE.

THE conduct of the Bishop of Jamaica in a Ritual case, in which he was lately called upon to intervene, appears to us to afford a favourable example of the spirit and temper in which such questions should be approached by those in authority. Complaint was made to the Bishop that one of his clergy, Mr. Deurwaarder, incumbent of St. Andrew's Church, Gilnock, had set up "a high altar," and that he was in the habit of using altar lights, incense, wafer-bread, "and wine ceremonially mixed with water." The complainants, who seem to have been members of the congregation, objected to these practices, and assured the Bishop that they represented the general feeling of the congregation, "many of whom would withdraw from the church," if the objectionable usages were not given up. The Bishop assumed, with good reason as it seems, that the case was one of genuinely aggrieved parishioners, and he determined accordingly to take the matter in hand. He summoned the principal Clergy of the neighbourhood, and, attended by these and his Archdeacon, held a Visitation, first in the vestry of Mr. Deurwaarder's church, and afterwards in the body of the church. Mr. Deurwaarder "admitted that the facts were substantially as stated, and that division in the church was resulting from the ritual practices he had felt it right to adopt." "Upon this, most of the clergy present reasoned with Mr. Deurwaarder, and urged him to give up the objectionable ritual." But Mr. Deurwaarder held his ground with Dutch doggedness. "His responsibility," he urged, "ended with the keeping of the Rubric which required that ritual; the Church had ordered the ritual, and if damage resulted to souls, that was the Church's responsibility, and not his." "He was then reminded that the Ornaments Rubric was at best of uncertain meaning and application, and that this was certainly an instance in which (until undisputed authority had either by legislation so amended the Rubric as to remove all ambiguity from it, or else by judicial decision finally determined the meaning of the Rubric as at present worded) he ought, in accordance with the clear intention of the Church, to submit the matter to the Bishop's decision. But he replied that he would not," although the Bishop himself joined in the advice of his clerical assessors.

On the failure of this private conference to influence Mr. Deurwaarder, the Visitation adjourned to the body of the church, "where the large congregation had been patiently waiting for a long time." After the singing of "a processional hymn" and the reading of some prayers, the patience of the congregation was further tried by a two hours' address from the Bishop "upon the principles and teaching of the Church respecting ritual, as set forth in the Prayer-book." The Bishop then made one more appeal to Mr. Deurwaarder to consent to be guided by the Bishop's advice in the matter complained of, "until some final adjudication had been arrived at by the Church" on the subjects in dispute. The Bishop was followed by the Archdeacon, and the Archdeacon by "the clerical members of the Parochial Council." But Mr. Deurwaarder was not to be moved, and he cut short all further discussion by declaring that "his mind was made up, and that he would rather go to prison than yield." Judging from the official account, which is all that we have to go upon, Mr. Deurwaarder seems to be as provoking a specimen of a Ritualistic incumbent as it is possible to conceive. His attitude towards everybody was that of those who thought that the Sabbath was not made for man, but man for the Sabbath. Ritual, after all, is a means to an end, and not an end in itself. Be it more or less, ornate or simple, its proper object is to dignify the worship of Almighty God, and to edify the worshippers. But where unwonted ritual, however legal, is forced on an unwilling congregation, it defeats its own purpose and ceases to be justifiable. We have therefore no sympathy with the temper of mind exemplified by Mr. Deurwaarder, nor with his morbid conception of duty. The Ornaments Rubric would indeed become intolerable if it were to be imposed on clergy and laity as an inflexible rule, obligatory without any regard to times and circumstances. Nor was Mr. Deurwaarder satisfied even with this exaggerated view of his duty. "When he was reminded"—whether accurately or not is not now the question—"that at least some of the things he was doing had not the authority of the Rubric he referred to, he said they had, nevertheless, the authority of the Catholic Church." Articles of necessary faith accepted by the Catholic Church are doubtless binding on all members of the Church, and cannot be repealed without apostasy by any portion of the Church. But to place details of ritual in that category is absurd. Even before our own Reformation, various English dioceses had their own separate "uses" in matters of ritual; and a common complaint against Ultramontanism is that it strives to destroy all such local variations, and reduce public worship everywhere to one dead-level of monotonous uniformity. In short, Mr. Deurwaarder's attitude towards all the parties concerned was sufficiently provocative, and it is not difficult to imagine, with recent examples before us, how he would have been dealt with by some Bishops nearer home. His own diocesan, however, took a more charitable as well as a more statesmanlike view of what duty demanded of him. He "counselled patience on the part of the congregation, attendance at the public worship as far as their consciences would allow, and devout adherence to the teaching of the Word of God and the Book of Common Prayer," reminding them at the same time that it would be prudent to wait for the Report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission before making up their minds as to what was or was not the legal ritual of the Church. The Diocesan Council supported the Bishop's policy, and the Church in Jamaica has thus been spared the scandal and injury of a clerical prosecution for which there was a much better justification than for the prosecution of Mr. Green.

Here, then, we have another illustration of the wisdom of leaving to the Bishops, as nearly all the members of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission propose to do, a veto on litigation in cases of doctrine and ritual. Lord Coleridge, whose ill-judged and painful observations on this point we may consider on another occasion, draws a sensational picture of aggrieved parishioners robbed of their legal rights by the arbitrary veto of a Bishop. The Chief Justice is a skilful rhetorician, but he has somewhat overdone his rhetoric on this occasion. The common accusation against the Bishops is that they are only too ready to deliver Ritualistic clergymen to the "tormentors" of the Church Association, and we may be quite sure that when there is a genuine grievance no Bishop on the Bench would sacrifice the rights of a congregation to the crotchets or even morbid sense of duty of an incumbent. Experience has shown that the danger is all the other way. Without the Episcopal veto so moderate and revered a man as Mr. Carter, of Clewer, would have been dragged before the Courts, and possibly imprisoned, to the grief and indignation not only of his own parishioners, but of the public in general. The harm that would have come of such a prosecution is manifest. What harm has come of the exercise of the Bishop of Oxford's veto, or of the use which Archbishop Tait made of his veto on more than one occasion? Lord Coleridge thinks that the Courts might always be trusted to stop mere frivolous or malicious prosecutions. But lawyers are hardly the most likely persons to stop litigation, and experience does not ratify the justice of Lord Coleridge's natural bias in favour of his profession. As a rule, Judges are lawyers first and statesmen afterwards. Nor is Lord Coleridge's reference to the accusations of "policy," which have occasionally been made against the Bishops, to the point. The Judicial Committee, and not the Bishops in partical, have been accused of shaping their decisions by policy and popular prejudice more than by strictly legal considerations; and Lord Coleridge's ad captandum appeal to ignorant prejudices against the Episcopal veto proves that there is at least one eminent Judge on the Bench whose mind may be dominated by other than strictly legal considerations. The danger to the Church, whether we view it as a spiritual society or as a political institution, comes of too much rather than of too little litigation; and any provision which tends to put a check on litigation must be an unquestionable gain. What is now needed in the interest of all parties, and of interests higher in importance than any party interests, is a prolonged period of peace. What Lord Coleridge and the Archbishop of York would give us is an embittered renewal of strife, ending certainly and speedily in Disestablishment. It is strange to see the Chief Justice of England and the Primate of the Northern Province labouring to put so effectual a weapon into the hands of the Liberation Society.

We have commended the temper and statesman-like policy displayed by the Bishop of Jamaica on a trying occasion. We believe, however, that he would have done better to have defended his conduct with fewer reasons, and to have rested his case on the uncertainty which hangs over the Ecclesiastical Judicature in England rather than on the "ambiguity" of the Ornaments Rubric. The meaning of the Rubric is perfectly plain, and is admitted to be perfectly plain by the Ridsdale judgment. The ambiguity is not in the Rubric, but in the extraneous matter which the lawyers have "read into" the Rubric. Nor can we agree with the Bishop in thinking that there is necessarily any lack of "logic" or "loyalty" in claiming the use of the disputed ritual pending the results of the Royal Commission. The wiser policy, surely, is to have a truce all round in the interval, and leave matters as they are wherever congregation and clergy are agreed, which they appear not to have been in the case which called for the Bishop of Jamaica's intervention. Our real need is a wise and charitable toleration, and not a policy of rigid and mischievous uniformity.

JUDGES AS LEGISLATORS.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD, to use a legal phrase, "took nothing by his motion" to annul the new Rules of Procedure. Probably he did not himself desire that he should succeed, certainly it was most undesirable in the interests of the Legal profession or of the public that he should have done so. His success would have been of evil omen to all reform in Parliamentary as well as in Legal procedure. No subject can be imagined less fitting for the minute attention of the House of Commons, and for such debate as a Committee of the House can provide, than the New Rules of Legal Procedure. It would be just as fitting to submit to them a revised edition of the Thirty-nine Articles. The principle of devolution is one which Parliament is slowly beginning to recognise as not only desirable, but necessary. It is being gradually extended by reference of the details of complicated measures, in the House itself to Grand Committees, and outside of the House to administrative Departments and bodies of experts. The reference of Electric Lighting Bills to the Board of Trade is the most important and recent illustration of the working of this principle. The reference of the details of legal procedure to legal experts is an older practice, and certainly not less necessary. All the Acts for reforming the practice and procedure of the Courts of Justice in the last generation, from the Common Law and Chancery Procedure Acts of 1851 and 1852 downwards, have delegated to the Judges the power of making rules for securing the due carrying-out of the Acts in matters of detail. The Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 were no exceptions to the rule, and the great bulk of what are called the New Rules are not new at all, amounting only to a republication of rules already made under those Acts. It was, indeed, provided by those Acts that the Rules should lie on the tables of both Houses for a certain time before coming into force. But the object of that provision was not to enable them to be exhaustively discussed by private Members on points of detail, but as a safeguard against the introduction of grave constitutional changes under the guise of Rules of Procedure. In the present instance, no doubt, a case might conceivably have been set up that the palladium of British liberty, the sacred right of Trial by Jury, was being tampered with by the paid servants of the Crown, and so forth, if the Rules had been suddenly promulgated by a secret committee of Judges nominated by the Chancellor. But, unfortunately for any such contention, the New Rules, so far as they are new, are only a very mealy-mouthed and modified form of the recommendations of a Committee, known as Lord Coleridge's Committee, on which members even of the Outer Bar were conspicuous, and from which members of the other branch of the profession were not absent. The public had much discussed and very generally acquiesced in those recommendations at the time. Hence there was no pretence for urging that the New Rules, which were much less stringent in the direction of curtailing trial by jury, were bringing about grave constitutional changes unawares. Sir Hardinge Giffard, indeed, like Lord Bramwell in the Upper House, represented the Bar Committee, who petitioned against the New Rules, on the ground that they had not been consulted on them before their promulgation, and a somewhat similar complaint was urged by the Incorporated Law Society on behalf of Solicitors. But, as regards the Bar Committee, the answer was very simple,—that it had not come into existence at the time when the Rules were practically settled, and even the legal ability of the Lord Chancellor could hardly be expected to devise a method of consulting a body which was not yet created. But to both bodies the answer of substance was the same, that they were represented on Lord Coleridge's Committee, and that their members had ample means of knowing what was proposed and what was being done.

The fact is that the Legislature is aware that if devolution is to be the order of the day, there is nobody to whom legislation may be devolved who is less likely to require looking after from the point of view of the Conservative than her Majesty's Judges. In the first place, they have always legislated on the procedure of their own Courts, so that the power has not been placed in new hands. In the second place, they are more or less aged members of the most conservative of all professions. When the conservatism of age is added to that of the lawyer, and the innovating spirit is further kept in check by the thought that the innovator will have to make himself master of the details of any novelties which may be introduced, there is every reason for not anticipating revolutionary proceedings. How strongly this was felt in the House was apparent from the scanty attendance of Members even from the legal profession on Sir H. Giffard's field-day. The general conclusion of the public in the matter was admirably put by Mr. H. Fowler. While, he said, the wisdom of some of the New Rules might be doubted, and he might have added that for every rule the wisdom of which was doubted probably as many supporters could be produced as opponents, yet "they were, on the whole, a very decided step in the path of law reform. Judges were not law reformers, as a rule they never had been, and never would be. But when Parliament got from them so large an instalment as this, he thought they ought to take it thankfully, and then ask for more." It is certain that the step, though decided, is not as large as has been represented in some quarters. Of 1,045 rules, only 125 are new, and most of the novelties are modifications, rather than revolutions of existing practice. A great deal of alarm has been felt as to the extension of summary judgments for the recovery of land. But it has been plainly shown that the remedy is not new, and as it is restricted to cases where the tenant's term has expired, and where the defendant cannot convince a Judge on affidavit that he has prima facie a defence, it is clear that no new method of arbitrary eviction has been devised. The order on which these summary judgments have been recovered is, perhaps, the most useful part of the reforms effected by the Judicature Acts. The judicial statistics show that by far the larger portion of the actions which are brought are practically undefended, and this order, by making a clean sweep of the larger portion of such actions before they come into Court, has left the Courts more time to deal with their substantial business. But as the Queen's Bench Division still has arrears to the number of a thousand, and the block in Chancery is greater than ever, much yet remains to be done. A considerable saving of time, with a gain of efficiency, will no doubt be made by the decrease in the number of cases tried by a jury in ordinary civil actions, especially those arising out of contract. The saving will not only be direct, from the trial of an action taking less time, but also indirect from the decrease in the number of applications for new trials. These scandals to English law will also be diminished in number by the restrictions placed upon the causes for which new trials may be ordered, as well as by condensing the application into one stage instead of two. The block in Chancery is likely to be sensibly reduced by the transfer to Chambers of a great deal of purely formal, unlitigious work in the way of petitions for payment of money out of Court, and the like. Meanwhile, enormous sums of money will be saved, in all probability, by the provisions which enable vexed questions arising on wills and settlements to be solved singly as questions of pure law, instead of its being necessary, as now, to throw the whole estate "into Chancery." If these rules are honestly and thoroughly acted on, it will hardly be possible in the future for solicitors to get themselves annuities for life by the institution of administration suits on the most frivolous pretexts. "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce" ought to become an impossibility.

Mr. Fowler, following out his principle of asking for more, proposed another method for increasing the time of the Courts by annulling Order 63, which perpetuates the Long Vacation. But as by annulling the order for vacations he would also have annulled the order for sittings, it is perhaps fortunate that he did not get more than twenty-two Members to go into the lobby with him. It was not to be expected that the Judges would abolish their own holidays, together with that of the Bar and the Solicitors and the Clerks of the Law Offices. It is, however, pretty certain that some change in the Long Vacation is not far off. Both Lord Bramwell and the Lord Chancellor declared themselves in the House of Lords on Monday in favour of its being shortened. The original justification for it, that there was no more work to do, and that barristers, suitors, and officers of the Court must give their attention to the harvest, no longer exists. The crowded state of the single Long Vacation Court, with its present narrow limitation to matters of "urgent urgency," is pretty conclusive proof that there is work to be done, and that there are people eager to do it. Conveyancing goes on; bankruptcy counsel are fully employed. Neither in the Chancery nor in the Queen's Bench Division would junior counsel be averse to an extension of the chances of earning a livelihood. The interests of Judges and overworked leaders cannot long be allowed to override those of every one else. Whether by a "rota, or some other arrangement," there can be little doubt that the Long Vacation is doomed. The new rules, so far as they carry out the intentions of their authors, will hasten the doom. If law is made cheaper and quicker, the number of lawsuits cannot fail to increase. The increase can only be met by increasing the number of Courts, or the length of their sittings. The latter alternative must needs commend itself to the Treasury and to the public.

BLOCKING BILLS IN PARLIAMENT.

IT will some day be looked upon as a wonderful legislative arrangement that, except in the case of a few leading Government measures, no Act of Parliament can be passed if a single Member of the House of Commons objects. A proposal that a Legislature must, like a jury, give an unanimous verdict, has never, we believe, been formulated in any Constitution, and does not commend itself to the judgment as likely to promote the redress of grievances. However desirable it may be that minorities should make their voices heard, it has never yet been suggested that they should have a veto on legislation, still less that a minority of one should enjoy this exceptional privilege. Yet this is practically the result which the Rules of the House of Commons have brought about. Nor is there anything on the face of these Rules which appears unreasonable. To prevent the tyranny which a Government could and often did formerly exercise, it has been provided that opposed public business shall not be commenced after half-past twelve at night. Humanity alone would seem to prompt such a rule, and it could hardly have been foreseen that mischief would flow from it. Yet it is this simple and kindly regulation which has been converted into an engine to "block" Bills. Any Member can, by availing himself of the rule, prevent any progress being made with a measure, and thus veto legislation on the subject. The plan is very simple. It is only necessary to give notice of a motion that the second reading of the Bill shall be postponed for six months, and all discussion after half-past twelve at night is prevented. It may, of course, be answered that the Bill may still be debated at a reasonable hour. But such a consolation is illusory. It is all that the Government can do to carry through the House within the reasonable limits of a Session some half-dozen measures which they conceive to be of first-rate importance, and to obtain the supplies of money necessary for the administration of the country. All the time which the Administration has at command must be devoted to these objects, and it is almost impossible to procure the discussion of minor measures before midnight. For private Members, the case is still worse. Practically, their opportunities of legislation seem to be limited to Wednesdays, and then they are at the mercy of three or four sturdy talkers. A Bill which is generally approved has no chance of being even explained to the House, if a single Member, from dislike of the measure or its proposer, or from mere caprice, likes to stand in the way; and though half an hour's discussion might pass it without a division, nay, though no discussion at all is wanted to recommend it to the House, it is absolutely deprived of all chance of becoming law.

The sort of thing which happens is well illustrated by the appeal which Mr. Fawcett made to Mr. Warton one night this week. Mr. Fawcett has introduced two Bills of a very modest character for the improvement of the machinery of the Post Office. One of them relates to Postal Orders. It will be remembered that three years ago an Act was passed enabling the Postmaster-General to issue a new form of Money Order, not involving the troublesome formalities connected with the older species. The new Money Orders, which have been christened by way of distinction Postal Orders, may be obtained without giving the name of either sender or receiver, and may be cashed at any Post Office most convenient to the recipient. As might be expected, this simple form of remittance has become exceedingly popular. While the circulation of the older Money Orders is decreasing, that of the Postal Orders has increased from about four millions and a half to nearly eight millions during the last two years, while no less a sum than £3,451,000 has been remitted by means of such orders during the year ending March last. There is, however, found to be one defect in the system. The orders are only issued for certain fixed amounts, the lowest of which is 1s. and the highest £1. There is no power to abandon the issue of any denomination which is found to be useless, or to issue orders for other denominations which are likely to be popular. Postal orders are largely employed in paying small bills, and for this purpose the desideratum is to have orders of such amounts that, by the combination of two of them and the use of a few stamps, any broken amount may be made up. One object of Mr. Fawcett's present Bill is to enable the Post Office to alter the denominations of orders, so as to meet this want. Another object is to enable an interchange of postal orders to take place between the mother-country and Colonies which have their own Post Offices. The Bill also enables orders to be issued under the authority of the Postmaster-General by any officer of the Crown, although not an officer of the Post Office. This will empower their issue on board the ships of the Navy and in regiments on foreign service, and thus the transmission home of the wages of seamen and soldiers will be greatly facilitated. These are objects which it would have been thought no one could object to. And the fact that Sir John Lubbock, who, in the Banking interest, jealously criticised the Postal-Order scheme in 1880, has not thought it necessary to oppose the present Bill, is in itself a certificate that the proposed modifications of the system are perfectly harmless. The other Post-Office measure is yet more purely administrative. It provides a ready means of punishing a series of petty Post-Office offences which at present either go unpunished, or must be made the subject of formal criminal proceedings. Such acts as placing lighted matches in pillar-boxes, sending dangerous or indecent articles by post, forging postmarks, and misleading the public by the use of false telegraph forms and official envelopes, are, as a rule, not sufficiently serious offences to warrant a prosecution for a misdemeanour, while they are at the same time calculated to cause great annoyance, and in some cases to do much mischief. They should be promptly checked, without being made too much of; and this is the treatment which is at present impossible, but which would be sanctioned by the Bill. It is not surprising that such a measure should meet with all but unanimous approval. The exception is Mr. Warton. That gentleman is alone in opposing both Bills, and when Mr. Francis Buxton on Monday night pressed Mr. Fawcett to urge the measure forward, all that the Postmaster-General could do was to appeal to the Member for Bridport to remove his hostile notices, promising that he should have full opportunity of discussing in Committee any provision to which he took objection. The spectacle of a Minister, high in popular favour, and supported by the general opinion of the House of Commons, begging a single private Member not to exercise his veto, and interfere with the working of a great State Department, is a very singular one, and a striking illustration of the process of blocking Bills. It is to be hoped that the Government may in this case be as pertinacious as Mr. Warton; but the demands on the time of the House at this season make it impossible to foretell with certainty what the ultimate effects of a block may be.

It must be admitted, however, that the Rule which produces these strange consequences took the place of a still more monstrous system. When opposed Bills could be brought on for discussion at any time of the night—or rather, morning—the Government had the power to harass a minority almost out of their lives. By putting the Bill on the notice-paper night after night and not bringing it on, they could tire out all but the most persistent opponents, and when the objecting minority had been wearied out by repeated fruitless attendances till three in the morning, could select some opportunity when vigilance was relaxed to force the measure through the House without discussion. The Inclosure Bill of 1869, which signed away the inheritance of the people over 13,000 acres of common land without any appreciable equivalent, was stopped only at the cost of weeks of protracted waiting and watching, which would have been spared had the present half-past-twelve rule been in force. As passing a bad Bill, as a rule, does more harm than stopping a good one, the system of blocking probably leads to better results than the practice previously existing. But some way might surely be invented for preventing the abuse of the system. It is ridiculous that a single man should, by writing half-a-dozen words on a piece of paper, paralyse the action of the House of Commons. That a minority strongly impressed with the justice of its view should have every means of preventing hasty legislation, and of laying its objections fully before the House and the country, is essential. But there should be some guarantee that a bonâ fide opposition to a Bill really exists. That a single Member has blocked it is no sufficient proof. It would surely not be difficult to devise some modification of the present rule which would supply the necessary test in a rough and ready way. It might, for example, be provided that notice of rejection in the name of one Member should not, after a certain period had elapsed, prevent the midnight discussion of a Bill, unless a certificate of, say, half-a-dozen Members that they approved the opposition were forthcoming. The association of even three or four Members in opposition to a measure would show a certain amount of genuine feeling, whereas the present system suggests opposition of a reckless, unthinking character. The right of blocking might also, without unfairness, be confined to one, or at most two, stages of a Bill. To suspend its consideration at every step, as may be done at present, is unnecessary, from any point of view. Whatever the most appropriate remedy may be, it is an undoubted fact that while the present system remains in force, many measures of real utility, involving no party question, and of a character which would meet with the marked approval of the House, if an opportunity could be obtained for discussion, are postponed at the pleasure of a single Member, to the detriment of the country at large, and against the will of the constituencies.

THE PATHETIC ELEMENT IN LITERATURE.

THAT the Literature of our own day is deficient in Pathos must have been an observation often made by the critic; probably it has appeared before in these columns. We do not imagine that in the whole history of Fiction so much wealth in every other kind of excellence has been ever before combined with so much poverty in this one. The works of George Eliot, for instance, present us with specimens of wit, humour, imagination, tragic power, poetry, and the most subtle and delicate observation. The one literary beauty which we should remark as lacking to them is pathos. Perhaps the exclusion may appear to imply some peculiar use of the word; and words are used so vaguely, that the attempt to confine it to its specific meaning may possibly be peculiar. We understand by it that slight, delicate touch which, reaching below the region of idiosyncracies, and penetrating to the depths of purely human emotion, surprises the spring of tears; not, perhaps, bidding them flow—that depends on temperament—but rousing in every one the peculiar blending of emotion and sensation which tears manifest and relieve. It must be transient. The feeling it evokes is swallowed up immediately in something that is not itself. It hovers on the edge of pity, but as it passes into pity it ceases to be pathos. It is entangled with the web of memory, but when we take up that thread, the pathetic touch has ceased to vibrate. All that is strongly individual is without it; it must be simple, it must be human, or indeed something wider than human, for it seems to us especially connected with the animal world, and one reason why we find none on the page of our great novelist is that the influence of a peculiar individuality is felt there too strongly. It is gone at the first approach of anything of the nature of analysis, and we question whether a certain sense of inadequacy be not inseparable from it. The feeling represented, at all events, must be always associated with a certain dumbness; it is the appeal that is made to us, whether in life, or in some representation of life, by a sorrow that reveals itself unconsciously. We mean of course unconsciously to the sufferer; it is not necessary that the creator of a pathetic work should be ignorant of what he does, though he often is so; as far as he stands outside the feelings he expresses, it is not necessary that this note should be sounded unconsciously more than any other; the indispensable condition is only that the reader should look at the sorrow from afar. As we try to describe the feeling, we are closely reminded of the etymological connection between dimness and dumbness. What we mean by pathos brings home to the mind of the person who feels it the sense of both these things;—the clear daylight, the distinct utterance, effectually dispels it. Where eloquence begins, it ends.

Pathos, if we have rightly described it, is not pre-eminently the characteristic of any first-rate genius. To find a writer whose productions it characterises, we must turn to some shy, reserved nature, with whom it is not merely a dramatic effect, but, what is a very different thing, an actual outcome of the character. And we do not, accordingly, find much of it in Shakespeare, in proportion to the wealth of every kind which we find in his works. But we may take from him specimens of the wealth in which he is poorest, and one scene from King John, which will occur to every reader as an apparent refutation of the limitations we have given to the scope of Pathos, affords, in fact, a good illustration of our meaning. The lament of Constance for Arthur is the specimen of pathos, perhaps, most universally appreciated, and it is undeniable that she cannot be called dumb; we have known her lament in dramatic representation made extremely clamorous, and though such a conception seemed to us very injurious to the beauty of the situation, it certainly did not destroy its tear-compelling power. But no small part of the wonderful power of the picture seems to us to consist of the dumbness of Arthur,—the slowness and faintness of the sketch, the truth, in a certain sense, of his own words,— “Good, my mother, peace!

I am not worth this coil that’s made for me.”

And in the case of Constance herself, our sympathy is solely with the mother. It is the purely human feeling—nay, it is the one emotion we share with the creatures below humanity—that is made interesting. If the reader imagines how an artist of lesser genius would have treated the grief of a bereaved mother, he will see that it is touched with wonderful temperance, though with such great impressiveness. The few lines beginning, “Grief fills the place up of my absent child,” touch on the anguish of every bereaved heart; they open a vista for every reader to some remembered longing, they put before us the sorrow that belongs not to rich or poor, high or low, wise or foolish, but to all. And yet how few they are, how soon we turn to other things, how little is Shakespeare engrossed with that pathetic image! He gives us an indirect glance at it, and hurries on to the interests of a nation. It is interesting, in the case of the only dramatist who can be named on the same page with Shakespeare, to observe how the pathos of this indirect glance fades away, when it becomes direct. Antigone seems to us the grandest female figure in dramatic literature, but the only time she is brought forward in a pathetic light is in her first appearance as an unconscious child. Pathos cannot combine with the full diapason of tragic power; those flute-like notes are lost in any flood of harmony, their melody is soon over, but for the moment it must be heard alone.

The age which we should choose as richest in accessible specimens of Pathos, the eighteenth century, is of itself a good illustration of the power that lies in this indirectness of attention. This period has of late been much rehabilitated, but its poetic claims have not yet been brought forward; and its best friends will confess that it was, on the whole, an age of prose. But the poetry of a prosaic age is exactly that which is most likely to be pathetic. It supplies the inevitable element of reserve—of dumbness, we would rather say—without which pathos is swallowed up in something beyond itself. And to take Gray as the type of this kind of poetry, the few words of one of his friends quoted by Matthew Arnold, and recurrent in his essay on Gray as a sort of refrain—"he never spoke out"—express with wonderful happiness and simplicity not only the characteristic of a particular poet, but the characteristic of all to whom we should apply the epithet "pathetic." Hackneyed as they are (and it is a peculiar disadvantage to all pathetic poetry to be hackneyed), his "Elegy" and the "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College" keep for all readers that dim sense of far-off troubles and sorrows which seems to bring "some painless sympathy with pain." No poetry is more purely, abstractedly human; the dim vision of the cottage-door gladdened by the father's return, of the playing-fields alive with schoolboys, touching as they do on the two extremes of society, contain nothing that is individual, nothing that is not absolutely common to humanity. Where Gray does diverge into individuality, he seems to us most unfortunate; and the picture of the indolent day-dreamer of whom we learn that "large was his bounty, and his soul sincere," while yet "he gave to misery all he had, a tear," exchanges poetry for something that, if we could forget its beauty of language, we should perceive to be twaddle. The whole interest of the poem is that common life is here, as it were, set to music. The dim, obscure lives of toil and privation are brought before us, not in their painful sordidness, and not in their arduous effort and meritorious success either, but in their broad human interest, as the lives of those bound together by strong affections, rejoicing in the daily meeting, busied with each other's needs, seeking on the bed of death a last glance from the eyes fullest of love. It takes nothing from the simplicity of this broad human interest that the words which call it up are essentially those of a scholar, and that we might restore some of its gems to their original setting on the page of Lucretius or Tacitus. On the contrary, it adds much to it. It gives that indirectness of attention which is what we want. Turn from Gray to Wordsworth, concentrate your attention on the lives of the poor,—you may gain much, but the pathetic touch is gone. If, for instance, any one fresh from the passage to which we have alluded should read Wordsworth's "Michael," which is nothing more than the hint at peasant life expanded into a little biography, and assert that he found as much pathos in the portrait as the sketch, all we could say would be that he and we mean different things by the word. When we are invited to contemplate a specimen of humanity at that nearness in which we discern such special facts as that the parents were advanced in life when the son was born, and that they lost their money through the treachery of an acquaintance, we are apt to feel that the picture, being as individual as this, is not individual enough. The present writer, at least, confesses to feeling very often that Wordsworth has lost one excellence, and not fully gained the other.

The contrast between the two, at any rate, is an instructive one for our purpose. Wordsworth and Gray, from this point of view, may be considered as representing the nineteenth century and its predecessor. That Wordsworth was the greater poet (though that is at least not a disqualifying circumstance for this representation), we leave out of the question; we consider them only with regard to their contribution to this particular kind of literature. Wordsworth represents what is best in modern democracy. He looks at the poor not as the picturesque retainers, the grateful dependents of their social superiors; he sees in them specimens of humanity interesting on their own account, but he often fails to render his picture of them interesting, because he specialises what is characteristic of the class without specialising what is characteristic of the individual. Where he aims at pathos, he sometimes drops into prosaic triviality. We should have expected most of his readers to agree with us in thus describing his "Alice Fell," if Mr. Arnold had not included the verses in his selection from the poet. The attempt to describe in poetry such an incident as a child having her cloak caught in a coach wheel and replaced by a benevolent passenger seems to us, we must say, in spite of this formidable vote on the opposite side, a very good illustration of what pathos is not. It might almost be set by the side of the caricature of Wordsworth in the "Rejected Addresses" as a specimen of what is puerile when it should be childlike. This incident is too trivial for the most passing allusion, but the homely, every-day sorrows of the poor may be most pathetic when shown us by the light of a far-off sympathy, transient as the gleam that fringes a flying shower, while yet if hammered at through six or seven verses they become simply tedious. Describe the incidents of village life at which the "Elegy" glances from afar, and you have your choice between being tedious, and exchanging the broad, human view for one that takes cognisance of idiosyncracies; and Wordsworth seems to us so much afraid of the last alternative, that he has constantly chosen the first. If you expand the fitting subject for the allusion of half a line into a theme of a poem, you will in either case eliminate the pathetic element from it.

The contrast between the two poets brings out the explanation of our poverty in this direction, and its connection with the democratic spirit of our age. It is a twofold connection. In the first place, all literature feels the direct influence of the political spirit of the age. It is true that we should not expect the influence of democracy to be hostile to pathos; an attention to the needs of the poor and the obscure would appear, at first sight, its moral correlate, and this attention will be allowed to be a part of democracy by its bitterest enemies. Its very excellence is that it attends only to what is human in each of us, and demands no special claim of character and position before it will devote itself to remove grievances and mitigate suffering. Of course, this means attending more to the needs of the lowly than the exalted, for they are greater, and also they are the needs of the majority. This is a gain worth paying any price to secure. But, as a matter of fact, we do pay a price to secure all excellence; and the price we pay for a complete recognition of every need is, that we have somewhat lost the subtle power of emotion which belongs to an indirect expression of all dumb need. Gray represents the eighteenth-century glance at the life of the poor,—a glance full of sympathy, but essentially a glance from afar. They are still the dumb masses. They are certainly "our own flesh and blood," in the sense that they feel those sorrows and hopes which their poet feels also. "On some fond breast the parting soul relies," in the palace as well as the cottage. But they are hardly our own flesh and blood in Mr. Gladstone's sense. They are not beings whom we have any notion of calling into council as to the sanitary or educational arrangements which affect their welfare. From this point of view, the notion of helping them out of their dumbness, and endowing them with the franchise, must be allowed to strike the reader with horror. A neat, slated roof does not more disadvantageously replace what Gray carelessly calls a straw-built shed, than the new view of the agricultural labourer replaces the old, with regard to his place in poetry. Wordsworth does not regard him from this point of view exactly, but he is not so far from it as he is from the view of the predecessor with whom we contrast him. We feel that the Bastille has fallen, that the "Rights of Man" are in the air, that America has set an example of successful rebellion, that the first Reform Bill is on its way,—that Democracy, in short, is a growing power. The poor are dumb no longer; they can occasionally be very tedious. We cannot look at a thing at the same time from at hand and from afar. The "humane century," as Mr. Frederic Harrison has called the eighteenth century, was just in time for its educated men to look at the poor with sympathy, and from afar. Earlier ages were too soon for the first; our own, and apparently all following ages, are too late for the last. The transition age supplies the elements of pathos.

It may seem to be putting a strain upon the theory of political life thus to connect it with literature, and that homely, every-day life which supplies literature with its subjects. But those who care least for politics are moulded by politics. That perennial life in which each one of us partakes, makes up in permanence what it lacks in vividness; its hopes and fears become our hopes and fears to some extent, and even they who turn away from all political interest and try to lose themselves in the past, discover in the echoes to which they cannot deafen their ears something that by its very continuity forces them to fear it or admire it,—somehow or other, to wish that this or that may come of it. However, it is not so much the direct influence of democratic feeling on literature that we would trace, as its influence on literature through the medium of the social life. The tendency of our age to leave nothing unsaid is impressed on our attention by every newspaper and almost every book we open, and is forced on our belief by its record on contemporary legislation. Why was Obstruction never a part of the tactics of Opposition until our own day? Not because people have suddenly discovered, as a truth of which their forefathers were ignorant, that while you insist on discussing a measure it cannot pass into a law, nor because Members of Parliament are less high-minded than they were, but simply because the whole tone of general taste was in former days against such a method of procedure, and in our days is with it. The change is a part of that democratic influence on the social code to which we have so often adverted,—a change which it seems to us those equally misinterpret who insist on labelling it as either good or bad. This particular side of it seems to us to be regretted, but it is inseparably associated with so much that is a cause of satisfaction, that we would rather speak of its dangers than its evils. It is intimately associated with what Carlyle meant by veracity. People are always mistaking unreserve for truthfulness, and if there were no connection between the two, they could not be confused. Our contemporary literature is marked by instances of this unreserve that would have been inconceivable to our grandfathers; an allusion to the legend of Godiva with which we remember a specimen of it being greeted many years ago, would have lost all its point by this time, so many have followed Godiva's example. And the fashion is reflected in fiction. Our greatest writer of fiction expresses all she means. Hers is not the art that calls up a train of suggestion with half a word, we never feel in closing the volume that she has roused a set of recollections in which the original note is drowned; her words linger in the memory with all the strong characteristics of their own individuality; but they stir no hidden spring, surprising the reader with the revelation of depths of emotion within, perhaps forgotten, perhaps never fully known. And the words which convey the writer's whole meaning, though they may convey it perfectly and admirably, can hardly, according to our understanding of the word, convey what we mean by pathos.

The loss of the pathetic element in literature is great. With it, we lock the door of escape from unendurable compassion, we forbid ourselves ever to contemplate pain without actually sharing it. We lose the medicine for many a sick mind, the spell that recalls without its bitterness many a bitter memory, the mediator that teaches us compassion for many a hated foe. We lose that refuge from the pressure of individual sorrow which is so little the discovery of a civilised age, that the singer whose words most recall it is the earliest known to our race, telling us how the obsequies of a hero released the tears they did not cause. "His loss the plea, the griefs they mourned their own." Nor let it be thought that we speak of a merely sentimental loss; the thing we describe is, after all, the literary reflection of a view of the sorrows of life needed by all. What we can never forget, we must at times put far from us, and contemplate through the softening medium of thoughts that blend sorrow with hope. What pathos is in literature that resignation is in life, and if a democratic age fail to recognise the excellence of this virtue, it is because men forget that apart from it, no manly effort is possible, and for the majority of lives, no sustained cheerfulness. They know it little who think it the foe of energy; the truth is, that energy loses half its efficacy in a nature that knows nothing of resignation. Do we mean to urge that the literary quality thus nobly related should be made a conscious effort? All we have said shows that we hold such an attempt to be self-defeating; at the first effort to attain pathos, it takes its inexorable flight. But we do not think that the endeavour to avoid its foes is equally vain, and the most deadly among them, that love of the ridiculous which is quite equally the foe of all humour, is what, for our own part, we feel among the most serious dangers of a democratic age. While the inquest over a heart-rending calamity is interrupted with laughter at every grotesque or absurd expression in the account of the disaster, while the pages of Punch are the chief study of the young in their leisure hours, and while the bracketed "laughter" in our Parliamentary reports call the attention of the reader to statements in which there is no wit or pleasantry, or any possible source of them, we shall lose the pathetic element in literature, and a great many other good things also. Against this vulgarising tendency of our time we would gladly see a strong and conscious effort, being certain that it would encourage not only those faculties which make literature pathetic, but also that it would reinforce the sources of all true humour, as much the friend to true pathos, as it is the foe of its vulgar and libellous caricature.

THE DEFICIENCY IN ENGLISHMEN'S ENJOYMENTS.

THE dissertations on Sport which August 12th regularly brings us, never fail to remind us of that admirable picture which Anthony Trollope gave us in "The Duke's Children" of Crummie-Toddie, the ugly moorland place in the west of Perthshire as organised for grouse-shooting and deer-stalking by Mr. Reginald Dobbes. "Mr. Dobbes declared that nothing like it had as yet been produced in Scotland. Everything had been made to give way to deer or grouse. The thing had been managed so well, that the tourist nuisance had been considerably abated. There was hardly a fertile patch left in the district, nor a head of cattle to be seen. There were no inhabitants remaining, or so few, that they could be absorbed in game-preserving or cognate duties. Reginald Dobbes, who was very great at grouse, and supposed to be capable of outwitting a deer by venatical wiles more perfectly than any other sportsman in Great Britain, regarded Crummie-Toddie as the nearest thing there was to a Paradise on earth. Could he have been allowed to pass one or two laws for his own protection, there might still have been improvement. He would like to have the right to have all intruders thrashed by the gillies within an inch of their lives; and he would have had a clause in his lease against the making of any new roads, opening of foot-paths, or building of bridges. He had seen somewhere in print a plan for running a railway from Callender to Fort Augustus, right through Crummie-Toddie. If this were done in his time, the beauty of the world would be over. Reginald Dobbes was a man of about forty, strong, active, well made; about five feet ten in height, with broad shoulders, and greatly-developed legs. He was not a handsome man, having a protrusive nose, high cheek-bones, and long upper lip; but there was a manliness about his face which redeemed it. Sport was the business of his life, and he thoroughly despised all who were not sportsmen. He fished, and shot, and hunted during nine or ten months of the year, filling up his time as best he might with coaching, polo, and pigeon-shooting. He regarded it as a great duty to keep his body in the finest possible condition. All his eating and all his drinking was done upon a system, and he would consider himself to be guilty of weak self-indulgence were he to allow himself to break through sanitary rules." Of Reginald Dobbes's indignation when Crummie-Toddie was described as "inferentially ugly," of the bags of game he made, and of his sullen resentment when Lord Silverbridge left Crummie-Toddie for a few days to go and flirt at Killan-codlem, a proceeding which he declared to be "hardly honest" seeing that Lord Silverbridge's gun was counted upon to make up the mighty bags of Crummie-Toddie game of which the sporting world was told in the newspapers, Mr. Trollope gave such a picture that no one else can pretend to rival him in painting the type of man who gives up his life to organised sport. Reginald Dobbes grudging every minute and every gun lost to the great cause of making up the grand-total of birds and deer brought down at Crummie-Toddie, remains as a great historical picture of one well-marked type of Englishman,—a type as quaint, as paradoxical, as easy to show to be a priori all but impossible, as it is equally easy to prove it to be, as a matter of experience, not uncommon, and in one sense peculiarly national. Certainly, if one had been asked beforehand whether it would be possible to produce a class of men so far devoted to a particular kind of recreation that they would pursue it with the grim professional ardour proper to works of pure obligation, and not only without hoping ever to gain anything except its own characteristic enjoyment by it, but even confidently expecting to spend much of their substance upon it every year, and all this in spite of toil and hardship, in spite of having to choose for the theatre of sport comparatively dull scenery, where travellers are not attracted, and in spite of being compelled to ignore all those lighter enjoyments which lovers of pleasure usually like to interweave in the intervals of their eagerest pursuit,—one would, without experience of the facts, have answered in the negative. It would be almost impossible to imagine, a priori, that people devoted to self-indulgence,—as Mr. Trollope admits that Reginald Dobbes was,—would ever make an arbitrary yoke of any one kind of self-indulgence, a yoke which should oblige them to give up every other kind, even the most refined and exalted, and to work like galley-slaves at the particular amusement they had chosen. One would say of course beforehand, that the very devotion to self-indulgence would preclude giving a tyrannical supremacy to any particular pursuit inconsistent with the pleasureableness of life as a whole. So, however, as a matter of fact, it certainly is not. Experience proves that the Reginald Dobbesses of life not only exist, but exist in considerable numbers, devoting themselves to their dull Crummie-Toddies with a rigid pertinacity as unlike one's general conception of the joy of life, as the work of destruction is unlike to the work of creation. And as we have said, there is not only no mistake about the fact, but there is no mistake about the characteristic national feature involved in the fact. It is specially English to take up some particular kind of sport, and pursue it with all the ardour, all the self-denial, all the rigid indifference to anything beyond the sport itself, which would be appropriate to an obligatory duty, or even to the very few passions—like gambling or avarice—which seem to cast a glamour over every mind which is once subject to them. No one can say this exactly in the same sense of the sportsman's life. The Reginald Dobbesses of the world do not give the impression of having lost hold of their own purposes, in the uncontrollable excitement of a sovereign passion. You would not conceive that they had imagination enough to be magnetised by their favourite amusement; and, indeed, sport requires so much of general health of body and mind to pursue it with effect, that it is hardly possible to think of the enthusiasm of such sportsmen as Reginald Dobbes as you think of the miser whose life is devoted to gain, or the gambler whose whole heart is in the jingle of the dice. Sportsmen are too healthy-minded for such absorbing passions as those. Nevertheless, the devotees of sport are not too healthy-minded for the mistake of spoiling an enjoyment by its over-organisation. Like all Englishmen, they are apt to make a task of a pleasure; but unlike most Englishmen, they fail to discover that they lose nearly all the pleasure by the completeness with which they organise it into a task.

That, however, is the root of the mistake in almost all routines of enjoyment. No one thoroughly enjoys organised amusements, because you cannot be in the true humour to enjoy that of which you make a regular task-work,—a business to which you bend all your efforts as you do to your duties or your professional engagements. The truest enjoyments are not carefully prepared beforehand, but are the more or less unexpected yield of unconscious and unplanned resource. You may, of course, take a sort of satisfaction in having everything go exactly as you had intended it to go,—in seeing the birds rise where you expected them to rise, in shooting as many of them as you expected to shoot, and carrying home a bag fuller even than you counted on; but well-organised satisfactions like these are not in the truest sense enjoyments; they are only satisfactions, precisely such satisfactions as you get out of work well done, not the surprises with a touch of grace and gratitude in them which enhance almost every high enjoyment.

The truth is, that English people hardly know how to enjoy themselves, just because they insist on over-organising all enjoyment. As Wordsworth truly enough said,—

"For we are vexed by heavy laws,
And often, glad no more,
We wear a face of joy, because We have been glad of yore."

We look as if we enjoyed ourselves, though all the joy is absent, only because we find ourselves among the associations in which we were once accustomed to enjoy ourselves, and because we are hardly frank enough with ourselves to confess that the spell is over and the charm past. True enjoyment is seldom secured by careful dispositions. It is the unexpected exercise of some faculty that we hardly suspected to exist, the gleam or flash of some insight for which we never looked, the rekindling of delightful associations nearly erased, the new meaning given to some favourite book, the new vividness of waking in the morning, the new restfulness of the evening light, the new vivacity of all one's old tastes under some unexpected stimulus, which really constitute the essence of enjoyment. Almost all the deliciousness of any pleasure is done away with by too much organising, by reducing it to routine, by stopping up the avenues of fresh and unexpected combinations of circumstance. Who that knows what travel is, can doubt that the perfect organisation of travel in these latter days,—the security and perfect appointment of the journey, the voluptuous comfort of the hotels, the multitudes of arrangements for sight-seeing and luxurious meals,—diminish, instead of increasing, the delight of it? Everything, from sport to travel, from scenery to appetite, is discounted. You are told everywhere exactly what to expect and what to guard against, until the inlets of genuine surprise,—that highest stimulus of all true enjoyment,—are almost blocked up. Nevertheless, if we English understood enjoying as well as we understand working, we should carefully eschew too much routine in our pleasure-making, and leave open as many doors as we can for unexpected incidents, even though we might be quite sure that at various of these doors very unpleasant incidents would emerge; for the delight of unexpected pleasure would far more than outweigh the distresses of unexpected discomforts. To succeed at work, you must organise it carefully. To succeed in enjoyment, you must as carefully leave plenty of room for the vividness which an organised routine benumbs, if it does not wholly banish.

SEA-FISHING.

THE ingenious poet "J. D.," who wrote, early in the seventeenth century, "The Secrets of Angling," tells us, in the quaint analogy which he discovers between his favourite art and religion, that the angler must needs have faith,—faith that "store of Fish without all doubt abound" in "waters, brookes, and lakes." Unhappily, the two hundred and seventy years that have passed since he haunted the pure and unfrequented streams of England have brought us to a pass in which it is impossible to exercise this necessary virtue. The population has increased fivefold, and the anglers fiftyfold. Fishing clubs pour out daily through the seasons thousands of competitors, who stand as thick upon the river banks as the troops that keep the line of a procession. In season and out of season the nightly net is plied, in spite of Preservation Societies; while Science, true to her mission of promoting the happiness of the greater number, supplies the aquatic Nihilist with dynamite. This is bad enough, but worse remains behind. The greed of manufacturers, a greed which Parliament has not, it seems, the power, or it may be the will, to restrain, has rendered whole rivers, almost from source to outflow, as barren of life as the Dead Sea. If the destruction of fish by means legitimate or illegitimate progresses for another generation as it has progressed during the last thirty years, angling will have become, except in the private waters that are the luxury of the few, a thing of the past.

Happily, the sea remains unexhausted, and is likely so to remain for more than one generation, recruited, as it perpetually is, from regions that cannot be ransacked, even if they can be approached. Not that the hand of the destroyer has not made itself visible even here. The trawler has swept clean, or left with but the scantiest remnants of former abundance, many a pleasant bay which was once the fisherman's delight. Whitby, for instance, brightest of "bright, seaward towns," has lost this out of its many charms. Twenty years ago, a basket, we might almost say a boatful, of fish might be caught wherever almost the anchor might be cast out within the embouchure of the river. When the writer last visited it, little could be done, and that little only in the rare combination, or rather opposition, of tide and wind which made it possible to "drift." Yet there are places enough still left unspoiled. Many are happily protected by the nature of the bottom from the fatal sweep of the trawl; as for line fishing, nothing seems to make an impression on the inexhaustible numbers of the deep. Indeed, it is probable that in any fishing ground the number destroyed by the dogfish far exceed that taken by net or line, by fishermen, either amateur or professional.

It must be allowed, indeed, that the sport, however abundant or interesting, has some considerable drawbacks. In the first place, the bare mention of it will cause a qualm in not a few readers. There are but few places where it can be followed with any considerable success from the shore; a boat is necessary, and commonly a stationary boat; and of all known contrivances for trying the human stomach, not even a coasting steamer, with all its dirt and smells, can be compared to a small boat at anchor. It is not easy to say whether the motion is more trying in the short waves raised by a breeze, or the long swell of a so-called calm. Then, again, the weather makes it very uncertain. It is a peculiarity in fresh-water angling, a peculiarity admirably suited to our climate, that bad weather suits it, on the whole, rather better than good. When we come to the sea, the conditions are changed. The weather which delights the river fisherman, if he be not a mere loungeur, the squalls of wind in which the pike runs fiercely at the bait, and the salmon rises without misgiving at the fly, make the sea impracticable. And even when these have passed, they leave an equally disturbing influence behind them. It is provoking in the last degree to the fisherman to see days of the most delightful weather, the last remnant, it may be, of his holiday, passing away unemployed, because the water has not grown sufficiently clear after a recent storm. For the thickness that is commonly favourable to the angler's craft when it is pursued in the river, is its greatest hindrance in the deeper and therefore darker waters of the sea. Even when all conditions are favourable, an unexpected obstacle sometimes presents itself. The amateur will seldom be able to dispense with professional assistance. Boats are difficult, if not dangerous, to manage, and localities, recognised or discovered in a river with comparative ease, can hardly be identified, except by those who have a life-long familiarity with every land-mark. But professional assistance it is sometimes strangely difficult to obtain. The blue-shirted men, who earn a mysterious subsistence by lounging on the pier or the beach, are often strangely unwilling to earn a good day's wages by two or three hours' work. They are wholly wanting in "J. D.'s" cardinal virtue. They do not think that anything can be caught. The shore, indeed, they tell you, was swarming with fish a month before, and will be swarming again in a month's time; but just now, they assert, with a conviction which seems to you born of indolence rather than knowledge, that it is an absolute blank. The fact probably is, that the regular fishermen do not care for the petty gain that may be thus made, while the ordinary boatmen find it more lucrative to wait for customers who will be content with a row or a sail.

It must be remembered, too, that much of the coast of England is practically useless for near-shore fishing. Roughly speaking, for, of course, there are exceptional spots, the eastern sea-board counties of England south of Yorkshire, and the southern counties east of Dorsetshire, afford but few opportunities for sea-fishing. In the north, Bridlington is, or was a few years ago, an excellent resort for the fisherman, who must, however, be able to hold his own in bargaining with the canny sons of Yorkshire. Filey is still better, because with its "brigg," a long line of rocks running out into the sea, with deep water on their northern side, it affords one of those opportunities that are so seldom found of angling from the shore. With favourable weather, that is, a wind that blows not too strongly from the harbour side, the "brigg" gives for some hours in the day an admirable chance of sport, all the more welcome because the rod is used, instead of the ruder implement of the hand-line. The eastern coast has, on the whole, the advantage of better weather during the months which are commonly available for holiday, as the prevailing westerly and south-westerly winds blow off the land. Apart from this consideration, which is, indeed, of the highest importance, the south-western coast is, perhaps, to be preferred. Sea-fishing has here received a scientific development which, to the best of our knowledge, it has not elsewhere obtained, while the neighbourhood of the Atlantic seems to furnish an endless supply of fish. Beer, a picturesque little fishing village not far from the Dorsetshire border, may be mentioned as an excellent locality; and on the north Devonshire coast, Clovelly is worthy of mention, though here the angler will find his time limited by the strong tidal currents, which make it impossible to fish when either the ebb or the flow are in full force. But Clovelly has charms which may make the angler well content to spend the balance of his time upon the shore. Good localities, indeed, are numerous, and not difficult to discover; the only difficulty is, as we have said before, presented by the conditions of weather that are necessary for success. The lucky man who, duly provided by nature with the "heart of oak and triple brass," of which the fisher, beyond all who do business in the great waters, has need, and whose holiday happens to coincide with an anti-cyclone, will have a "good time" indeed. He will have, for a cost that is insignificant, compared with the price of dubious chances of salmon at a Highland hotel, excellent sport, a catch abundant, and eatable to the last (for a bad fish is as uncommon in the sea as a good one is uncommon in a river), and health-giving days, which will send him back to the city a browner and a better man.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

LEAVING EGYPT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Events have justified the view which I ventured to put forward last winter in your columns, that the strong European element in the Egyptian Administration makes it almost needless to quarrel over the mere name of our presence in Egypt. Call it "protectorate," or "friendly guidance," or what you will; there are the Europeans, armed and resolute. The Egypt of to-day is entirely in their power, and it is impossible for them to come away. Every fresh sanitary regulation, every improvement, real or imagined, in the way of doing things for the public good, gives more and more authority to the foreigner upon the banks of the Nile. Do what we will and say what we will, we, the Europeans, cannot come away without a gross neglect of our duty to Egypt. It is a small matter whether four battalions or five battalions of British infantry suffice to frighten the Egyptians into accepting European ideas. Even if no troops at all were required to prevent a Moslem revolt—a thing much more likely than some people imagine—there would still be the army of foreign office-holders, which no human power can dispense with. My only fear is that the English may take upon themselves a good deal of unpopularity and trouble and expense, in doing the work that is every foreigner's work in Egypt. Let Europe clearly understand that we represent the merchants and the money-lenders, the foreign shopkeepers and the cosmopolite tourists, in our thankless Egyptian task, and there will be less desire to sneer at poor old John Bull for doing other people's work, as well as his own.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE LIBERAL DAILY PRESS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It certainly would be a bad day for Liberals and Liberalism if the Daily News, or any other Liberal paper, were to be conducted on the principles advocated by your correspondents, Messrs. Matthews and Cobb. It is far more important that the Daily News should be the organ of the Liberal cause rather than the organ of the Government, and it is infinitely to be desired that its Liberalism should be independent, even if it is sometimes mistaken. It was mistaken, as it seems to me, on the Suez-Canal question, and attacked the Government for doing about the very best thing it could do under the circumstances. But it is far better that such a mistake should have been made than men should regard its editorial staff as mere Government clerks. "Loose Liberal Members" are far more likely to be brought to a sense of their duties by coming in contact with their own constituents than by editorials inspired by a Minister.—I am, Sir, &c.,

RICHARD BARTRAM.

[We have never condemned any Liberal newspaper for independence,—which we have always claimed for ourselves. And we should never have thought of challenging the general exercise of its discretion by the great Liberal journal, however much we had differed from it. But it did seem hard on the Liberal party that the chief Liberal organ should be so prepossessed against the proposals of a Liberal Government, as to assail them before the case which the Government could produce on its own behalf had been given to the world. We have not thought it desirable to insert any of the many letters received on this subject except such as were moderate in tone and publicly acknowledged by their authors. We hope the hints given will be taken, and must now close this correspondence.—Ed. Spectator.]

TORTURE FOR CRIMINALS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Ernest Bell's quotation from the "Unseen Universe" in his letter to you last week on the "absolutely indescribable torture, thrilling through every fibre of the frame," caused by electricity, brings to my mind the ordeal I underwent a short time ago at a hydropathic establishment, for the cure (?) of rheumatism by the electric bath.

The physician was present, and the operator, a most intelligent man, went on with his duty in a cool, calculating way, whilst I writhed in excruciating pain. A day or two afterwards, on entering the bath-room, to resume my self-imposed torture, I observed my operating friend rocking himself, and holding his jaw from the terrible pain which he said he had from the extraction of a tooth. I could not help laughing, though at the same time pitying the poor fellow. He soon, however, was by my side, operating upon me for the third time, but, as I thought, with rather less severity, owing perhaps more to his own suffering than to the prolonged howls which I gave vent to.

There can be no mistake about the power of punishment which can be inflicted by electricity; but whether it would

"delight the physiological world," and be more demoralising to the community than the use of the 'cat,' " I forbear to express an opinion. My testimony is to the "absolutely indescribable torture" for a "specified time," which Mr. Bell asserts is now for the first time confessed to by scientific men.—I am, Sir, &c.,

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In reference to the letter on the above subject which appears in your issue of last Saturday, perhaps you will allow me to call attention to the following extract from Mr. Gilmour's book, entitled "Among the Mongols," which you reviewed so favourably some time ago:—"Of all the healing appliances in the hands of a foreigner, none strikes the fancy of a Mongol so much as the galvanic battery; and it is rather curious that almost every Mongol who sees it and tries its effects, exclaims, 'What a capital thing it would be for examining accused persons! It would far surpass whipping, beating, or suspending. Under its torture, a guilty man could not but confess.' Some one in England has advocated the use of the galvanic battery in place of the 'cat' in punishing criminals, and it is curious to note the coincidence of the English and Mongol mind." THE CREE INDIANS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have just received from a friend, who is settled near Qu'Appelle, in the north-west of Canada, the following account of the mode of testing the bravery of the young men among the Cree Indians. He says:—"Last week I saw a religious dance among these people; the spectacle was so atrocious that I nearly fainted. The object was to test the endurance of their young fighting men. A large conical tent, supported by a central pole, was erected, of which one side was occupied by a band of drummers and by the chiefs; the other side was left an open space, for the administration of the proposed test of manly virtue. The performance began by a chorus of tremendous shouts and outcries from the men around, to an accompaniment of prolonged tomtoming on the drums. The men were got up in wonderful style, some painted in coloured stripes to resemble tigers, with scalps dangling round their waists and wrists, and tomahawks hanging in their belts. Their extremities were covered with Indian leggings, faced with beads and porcupine quills. Their faces were painted in all the colours of the rainbow, and a good many more. After a short silence, a young man came forward, about twenty years of age. Him they seized, and immediately cut a slit through each breast, and then passed through this hole a stout stick. To these sticks they fastened ropes, the other ends of which were firmly tied to the central pole of the tent. The young man then went to the extremity of the rope and leaned back with his whole weight, being supported by the sticks through his breast. He pulled the flesh right away from his bones, and in that awful position, without a cry escaping him, he began to dance to the thundering music of the band. He continued dancing forty-five minutes, when he fainted. Fifteen others then passed through the same ordeal, who were thus admitted as braves of the tribe. The trial was somewhat varied for some of them, by setting them to pull guns through the grass while harnessed in the same frightful fashion, or by swinging them to trees with hooks fastened in their backs. This band of Indians is only two miles from our settlement, so that you see we form a mixture of both civilised and savage people. Fancy this next door to Canada!"

Although it is on another subject, may I add one remark to the observations already made on your admirable review of Mr. Drummond's work on "Natural Law in the Spiritual World." You say that "he finds in natural law the warrant for eternal punishment, sudden conversion," &c. I do not think that Mr. Drummond finds any warrant in natural law for "eternal punishment," in any other sense than a destruction of life which is eternal. Later on, I think you miss Mr. Drummond's meaning with respect to life and biogenesis, by failing to accept in its fullness his statement that in speaking of life, Christ "must have meant literal life," "because we must always take the literal rather than the metaphorical meaning in interpreting the Bible," which does not "mystify its readers." The meaning here seems to be that the word "life" covers many varieties, but that it always carries with it a central idea, of which the opposite is "literal" death or destruction. Taken in this sense,

I think Mr. Drummond's argument is logical and defensible.—

NATURAL LAW IN THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The objection which Mr. Waddington raises to Mr. Drummond's theory of Biogenesis as a generally accepted scientific doctrine applies also to the many eminent scientific authorities who support that view. That the theory of spontaneous generation is a fair subject for inquiry and speculation, no one would deny. No one acquainted with the history of scientific discoveries but readily believes that the most important light may be thrown upon the origin of life by such investigators as Dr. Bastian, though their particular theory may not be confirmed. But to say that the present evidence for the doctrine of spontaneous generation places it within the pale of exact science, is to put hypothesis in the place of certainty. Spontaneous generation is a possibility may be to some minds so far postulated that other doctrines may be built upon it. But it is no less certain, in the present state of the question, that the only theory of the origin of life that has vindicated itself to reason and experiment is the theory that all present powers of life are descended from previously existing life. Mr. Drummond very wisely accepts as the ground of his analogical reasoning the verified results of inquiry, not the speculations that have only appeared above the horizon, and have not yet cast off the clouds that surround them. Should it be ultimately proved, not simply to the satisfaction of the ardent advocates of spontaneous generation, but to the scientific mind generally, that the course of the world's development is the history of a process in which unconscious matter is developed up to conscious and free intelligence, no one would more readily accept that truth than Mr. Drummond. His analogical method would as freely adapt itself to abiogenesis as to the prevalent doctrine. The former theory would, in fact, seem to demand a more urgent postulation of an infinite superintending Mind, one with the universe, as thought and being are one. To suppose that any action of the ultimate atoms would develop any form of life tending to the higher organisms now occupying the world, apart from such directive Mind, is as unscientific as to imagine that the notes of a piano could produce music without a performer, or the vocal chords beget speech and sing without the will. Mr. Drummond effectively entrenches himself, as to his doctrine of biogenesis, behind the statements of Tyndall and Huxley, the latter affirming that biogenesis is "victorious at the present day all along the line;" the former, "that no shred of trustworthy experimental testimony exists to prove that life in our day has ever appeared independently of antecedent life."

To assert, with Mr. Waddington, that only under certain special conditions, the production of living out of certain not living matter does not take place, is to utter a sterile truism, so far as evidence for spontaneous generation is concerned. But when it is borne in mind that these special conditions represent the highest efforts of the modern mind, the adverse evidence becomes very strong. It seems an easy escape out of the difficulty to say that, while no such spontaneous generation takes place now, it may be supposed to have taken place some time ago. The lay intellect, seeking a decided answer, puzzled, and yet not plainly disillusioned, asks, as it has a right to ask,—When, then, did such spontaneous generation take place? At what epoch? At what stage of the history of matter? What was the first product of this spontaneity of matter? What was there in the past conditions of the state of our earth that favoured spontaneous generation more than in the present but yet varied conditions that pertain at the surface or in the depths of the earth to-day? The conditions under which the planet was developed, as to its structure and the processes of change it has incurred, are now conjectured with increasing approximation to truth. Surely, after all the miniature reproductions of natural processes which have been realised in the laboratories of our chemists, it is not impossible to reproduce such different phases of transition which molecules have undergone, from the gaseous to the crystalline, as may be sufficient for the problem in question. And yet, with all the resources of modern science, and with the varied conditions of the earth to-day, spontaneous generation has not been established to the general satisfaction of scientific men. Under these circumstances, is it not most scientific honestly to recognise our failure, and instead of building our arguments on hypotheses, to found them on the known and verified? If that is so, the doctrine of biogenesis is the fullest answer science has yet to give as to the origin of life; and Mr. Drummond has done wisely in basing his natural law on the rock of fact, as he has his spiritual law on the sure foundations of consciousness.—I am, Sir, &c., J. MATTHEWS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As a friend of Mr. Henry Drummond, intimately acquainted with his opinions, I ask permission to make a few remarks on the letter of "C. C. M.," published in last week's issue of your paper, on his book, "Natural Law in the Spiritual World." Mr. Drummond would probably have himself replied to a critic so able and courteous, but he is at present far from this country, engaged on a scientific expedition, and it may be long before he sees the Spectator.

Your correspondent has perceived, correctly I think, that the key to Mr. Drummond's theological views is to be found in the first chapter of his book, that on biogenesis, and especially in the strong view there expressed of the difference between the condition of the natural and that of the redeemed man. This is a point so vital, that if the view of it taken by a consistent thinker be ascertained, his opinions on other points may be inferred from it all along the line, and as your correspondent points out, the consequences of it extend all through Mr. Drummond's book. "C. C. M." writes to remark that there is another view, however, on this important point, which regards the transition from the state of nature to that of redemption as the germination of a latent seed, which only requires to be loosened from its integuments in order to grow freely,—an unveiling of the consciousness of the Christ or divine humanity which is concealed in the natural man, like the sun in a mist. Every reader must be struck with the contrast between the mildness of these metaphors and the strength of those employed in Scripture, where this change is called a new birth, a new creation, a passing from death unto life. The Bible must use very extreme language in describing very simple experiences, if your correspondent's view of this experience be the true one. It is a view at all events fundamentally at variance with Mr. Drummond's, and it involves fundamental differences at many other points.

But what I wish to observe is that this view, with the other views which it involves, does not remain unaffected by Mr. Drummond's book. Carrying with him a conception of Christian truth which starts from the view of redemption described above, and is thought consistently out from this stand-point, Mr. Drummond has laid this alongside of the revelation of truth in natural law furnished by the recent discoveries of science, and found the two to be in startling accord. No doubt, as an apologete, he has chiefly those in view who deny supernatural revelation altogether, but indirectly his argument tells strongly against any construction of this revelation which is fundamentally at variance with his own. Had he started with the view of "C. C. M.," the demonstration which he has developed would have been impossible. In so far, therefore, as this demonstration lends probability to his own conception of Christian truth, it casts doubt on that of "C. C. M.," and it is not unlikely that the further development of Mr. Drummond's method may prove not only a brilliant apology for faith against unbelief, but also a vindication of a robustly dogmatic theology against the Pelagian construction of Christianity.

Your correspondent refers to the weight lent to his view in men's minds by the attention recently directed to the writings of William Law, and the publication of the "Letters from a Mystic of the Present Day." But I venture to say that this impression is very faint, in comparison with that made in the opposite direction during the last dozen years by the spread of the literature of the new science of New Testament theology. The aim of this science, which is now lectured upon in every German university, and has been expounded in such excellent text-books as those of Schmid, Reuss, and Weiss, is to exhibit the whole circle of ideas of each of the important New Testament writers in succession, as it existed in his own mind. In this way, the exact teaching of St. Paul, of St. Peter, of St. John, and of our Lord himself, is now far better known than it has ever been before. The general result has been to prove that the Augustinian and Puritan construction of Christianity, whether the true one or not, is at least that of the Bible writers. Some of the ablest exponents of the new science do not believe in the authority of Scripture, but look upon the contents, for example, of the Epistles of St. Paul as merely the private opinions of that apostle. But as you read their severely scientific and purely objective accounts of his opinions, you seem to be perusing a systematic treatise by some Puritan divine, so completely do their views agree. And perhaps there is no single point on which the views of all the leading New Testament writers, when thus brought out, are found so entirely to coincide with the teaching of the Puritan theology as that in reference to which "C. C. M." and Mr. Drummond are at variance.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Perhaps I should have said the "Intelligence of Animals," but my meaning, in relation to the interesting correspondence in your columns, is no doubt clear. The whole question seems to me to lie in the proverbial nut-shell, and to be solvable by the proverbial common-sense. Dogs' hearing is undoubtedly very keen and accurate, and even subtle; and dogs have also the power of putting this and that together in a marvellously shrewd and almost rational fashion. They cannot understand sentences, but they get hold of words, i.e., sounds, and keep them pigeon-holed in their memory. I might as well argue moral principle from the fact that my dog "Karl," like scores of other dogs, will hold a piece of biscuit on his nose so long as I say "trust," and will when I say "paid for" gaily toss his head and catch the biscuit in his honest mouth, as argue that because he finds eleven tennis-balls among the shrubs in five minutes, when I say, "We can't find them at all, 'Karl,' do go and find them, good dog, will you? Find the balls, old fellow,"—therefore he understands my sentence. He simply grasps the words "find" and "balls," sees the game at a stand-still, and reasons out our needs and his responsibilities, quickened by the expectation of pattings on the head, pettings, and pieces of biscuit. It is remarkable that if I try to delude him by uttering "base coin" in the shape of words just like the real words, as, for example, if I say "Jacob," instead of "paid for," he makes no mistake, but refuses the morsel, however delicate, till it is "paid for."

Prominent nouns, participles, verbs, &c., make up the lingua franca that so beautifully links together men and dogs, and now and then men and horses, their intelligence being quickened by their dumbness, as is that of deaf and dumb men and women, whose other faculties become so keenly intensified, and who put this and that together so much more quickly than do we who have all our faculties. There are of course "Admirable Crichtons" among dogs, as there are among men, but the difference between dog and dog will generally, I think, be traceable more to human training than to born capacity. The yearning look which "Karl" gives when (told to "speak") he gives forth his voice in response, is sometimes piteously like, "Oh, that I could really tell all I feel!" He is like, and all dogs of average intelligence are like, the Frenchman I met yesterday on the beach at Hastings, who wanted to know whether he could reach Ramsgate on foot before night-fall, and how far it was; and who, as I only know a few French words, and am utterly unable to speak or understand sentences, was obliged to make me understand his wants by a few nouns such as everybody knows, and by causing me to put this and that together. There is of course the vital defect in the parallel that I could learn to understand French, and the dog could never learn to understand sentences; but as so many parallels have vital defects of some kind, even down to that historic self-drawn parallel between Alexander and the robber, we may well say, whether we be men or dogs, "Let me reflect." Dogs do undoubtedly reflect, and reason, and remember; and they never forget their "grammar," as school-boys do. Instinct, like chance, is only a name expressing fitly enough our own ignorance. Did not Luther and Wesley believe in the resurrection of animals?—I am, Sir, &c., Northmarston, August 13th.

S. B. JAMES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I beg to contribute another anecdote on the subject of how our meaning is conveyed to animals. When I was in Norway with my husband, a dog belonging to the people of the house went with us in all our walks. One day a strange dog joined us, and seemed to wish to get up a fight with our dog, "Fechter," who for protection kept almost under our feet; my husband said several times, "Go on, 'Fechter,'" in English, which he immediately did, but soon came back again. At last we succeeded in driving the strange dog away, but he soon returned. Then my husband said without any alteration of tone or gesture that I was aware of, "Drive that dog away, 'Fechter.'" He immediately rushed at him, and we saw no more of our trampler. I have long thought that dogs do understand, not "the precise sounds themselves, but the intention put into them by the speaker."—I am, Sir, &c., AN OBSERVER OF ANIMALS.

THE WORD "CHAP."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I do not wish to intervene in the controversy noticed in the Spectator of last week, between Mr. Skeat and Mr. Wedgwood, as to the etymology of "chap," but Burns's line,— shows "chapman" so used as, without losing its proper meaning, to signify "fellowship." There was also a curious and significant use of the term "chap" in Scotland. It was always more characteristic of the west and south-west than of the east and south-east. The use of the word "chap" used to be held in the east as the note of the Glasgow-bred man. The common sobriquet of such a one was "Glasgow chappie." May not this have been due to the fact that the west, and especially Glasgow, was the home of the chapman, and the factory of his wares?—I am, Sir, &c., F.

"When chapman billies leave the street,"

BOOKS.

MR. PATTISON'S EDITION OF MILTON'S SONNETS.*

THIS is one of those little volumes which the true lover of literature will not only read carefully once, but dip into again and again. It is a book to study seriously, and a book to enjoy leisurely. Much has been written by editors and critics upon the Sonnets of Milton, but no one, so far as we know, has done for them what Mr. Pattison has done. In an edition which for print and paper it is a joy to look at, and which is not too large for the pocket, the editor prints the poet's English and Italian sonnets (the latter with translations), and accompanies them by notes which are at once lucid, comprehensive, and concise. The knowledge displayed in these notes is not of the kind which a clever man is sometimes able to acquire for an immediate and special purpose, it is of the weightier and far worthier kind which is the growth of years and of love for a noble subject.

The poems are preceded by an elaborate introduction on the structure of the sonnet. It is a masterly piece of workmanship, and it is not necessary wholly to agree with such criticism in order to appreciate its power. Mr. Pattison's judgment on the sonnet resembles that of Mrs. Battle on whist. She liked the rigour of the game, and he, arguing for the legitimate form, observes that much misplaced skill would have been saved "if it had been recognized that the so-called Sonnets of Shakespeare are not sonnets at all, any more than those of Lord Brooke, but a continuous poem, or poems, written in fourteen-line stanzas." There is much to be said, no doubt, in favour of what, for convenience' sake, may be termed the legitimate sonnet, of which we have two notable examples in the "Milton, thou shouldst be living at this hour," of Wordsworth, and in the "Chapman's Homer" of Keats. At the same time, if we reject from our sonnet literature all the poems in fourteen lines that do not follow this difficult and elaborate construction, our sonnet-anthologies would be poor indeed. As a critic, Mr. Pattison is correct in denouncing the rhyming of the final couplet, seeing that it gives epigrammatic point to a poem the thought of which should be, as it were, equalised through the lines, although variety demands a fresh aspect of the subject in the tercets. "The two last lines of a sonnet," he writes, "must not rime together. The principle of the sonnet structure is continuity of thought and metre; the final couplet interrupts the flow; it stands out by itself as an independent member of the construction; the wave of emotion, instead of being carried on to an even subsidence, is abruptly checked and broken as against a barrier." This is a law of the sonnet, and in our judgment a good law generally; but if it had not been broken a hundred times, we should have lost some of the loveliest poems ever written in sonnet form. All the Elizabethan and Jacobean poets, when writing sonnets, rhyme the last couplet; neither Wordsworth, Keats, nor Hartley Coleridge scruple to do the same when it suits their convenience; and Blanco White, in his one sonnet which S. T. Coleridge thought the most grandly conceived in our language, throws the whole point of the poem into a rhyming couplet at the end. It will not do then, to say that one form is admissible, and no other, when great poets have decided to the contrary; but we may say that the Miltonic sonnet satisfies us more fully than the Shakespearean, not because the construction is more difficult, but because the result is more harmonious. Who can doubt, however, that Shakespeare knew what he was about in adopting the easy-rhyming sonnet of Daniel; and we decidedly disagree with the following judgment of Mr. Pattison:—

"It was an unfortunate choice of vehicle when Shakespeare selected the sonnet form. It was a form in which his superabounding force strangled itself. He is baffled by the language just in proportion to the power of his thought. Shakespeare required freedom, and when free he spoke English such as no other Englishman ever had skill to utter. But the sonnet's narrow bounds demand condensation. Now, the formal requirement of terse expression is a boon to watery or diffuse thinkers. The compression of fourteen lines effects the expulsion of superfluities, and lends the external support of stays to a weakly frame. Quite opposite is the effect of restricted space upon a teeming fancy and a robust intellect. In him force is concentrated, to begin with. In his endeavour after still further compression of energy, he becomes laboured instead of pithy, obscure instead of nervous."

This argument would seem to imply that the sonnet is a form of verse chiefly useful in giving that aid to feeble poets which weak women imagine they can obtain from an external support. If this is what Mr. Pattison means, the remark is singularly inappropriate in an introduction to the Sonnets of Milton, whose intellect, although indefinitely more limited, was as robust as Shakespeare's. To both, we think, although for different reasons, the confined space of the sonnet afforded a relief to the pressure of thought in moments of intense consciousness. To Shakespeare, they gave the means of uttering certain phases of personal emotion during an unhappy period of his life; to Milton, through long years of official labour and political conflict, they proved that the poetical fire was not extinct, and relieved the tension of a mind that had been called by nature to another task.

When the infamous massacre of April, 1655, occurred in the Piedmontese valleys, a special envoy was despatched to remonstrate with the Duke of Savoy. "All the despatches in this business," says Mr. Pattison, "were written in Latin by Milton. The tone of them is more moderato than we should have expected, considering that Blake was in the Mediterranean, and master of the sea-coast." And he adds, that being thus restricted by diplomatic propriety, Milton gave vent to his feelings in a sonnet. Listen to it once more, and say whether the passion expressed in it is not that of a strong man deliberately choosing the sonnet's narrow limit not because he needs the support it affords, but because his vehemence of feeling can be most naturally expressed within its "narrow plot":—

"Avenge, O Lord! thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold;
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones,
Forget not; in thy book record their groans,
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piedmontese, that rolled Mother with infant down the rocks; their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow
O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple tyrant; that from these may grow
A hundredfold, who, having learnt thy way,
Early may fly the Babylonian woe."

"That sublimest of psalms," is the comment of Landor on this fine sonnet. Mr. Pattison's remarks upon it deserve to be quoted for their originality and suggestiveness. After saying that it would be difficult to find in any language a sonnet of equal power "to vibrate through all the fibres of feeling," he adds:—

"Yet with what homely materials is the effect produced! Not only is there not a single purple patch in the wording, but of thought or image all that there is, is a borrowed thought, and one repeatedly borrowed, viz., Tertullian's saying, 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.' It would not be impossible, but it would be sacrilege, to point to distinct faults in this famous piece; yet we may say, that with a familiar quotation for its only thought, and with diction almost below ordinary, its forceful flood of suppressed passion sweeps along the hackneyed Biblical phrases of which it is composed, just as a swollen river rolls before it the worn pebbles long ago brought down from the mountain-side. From this sonnet we may learn that the poetry of a poem is lodged somewhere else than in its matter, or its thoughts, or its imagery, or its words. Our heart is here taken by storm, but not by any of these things. The poet has breathed on us, and we have received his inspiration."

That the poet can do with us what he will, apart from his thoughts, his matter, his imagery, or his words, is an idea not readily to be accepted. To our thinking, he is dependent on them all for the inspiration which gives them life. Suppose that the rhythm of these fourteen lines was palpably defective, and that the rhymes were inaccurate,—would the sonnet take our hearts by storm then?

The sweetness of the early sonnetteers is not to be found in Milton. For the first time in our sonnet literature, all artifice has disappeared. He has used the form to express personal feeling, and even ardent passion, but not the passion of love. Ingenuity of fancy is discarded, there are no conceits in these poems, and no sign that Milton used the sonnet as a conventional form of verse. Of such a master of versification, who knew how to untwist

"All the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony," it is not to be questioned that it was by this instrument, and by no other, that he could best utter what was in him during the busy mid-period of his life. Mr. Pattison notes—and in these days, that note carries with it a warning which ought to be useful to living poets—that Milton, who ranks with the greatest writers of sonnets, is uniformly intelligible. He knows what he wishes to utter, and expresses it with what may seem bald simplicity, but is in truth the perfection of art. On the other hand, it would be possible to name many sonnet-writers of reputation who appear to start in search of a meaning in the first line, and fail to find it in the last. A sonnet with one obscure line lacks the perfection we are entitled to look for in so short a poem. Again—and this is a point the editor is careful not to overlook—each sonnet should be a separate poem. To use the old proverb, it is a tub that must stand upon its own bottom. This rule was disregarded by the Elizabethans, and sometimes with no good effect by Wordsworth; but Milton, to quote once more from Mr. Pattison, confined each sonnet "to the utterance of a single independent emotion."

It is unfortunate that novelists are not exempt from the law which precludes us all from having more than one ideal woman or man, and we should like to rule that they should also differ from other mortals in having an equally enthusiastic love for every different aspect of nature, and an equally graphic power of portraying it. If we could have these little matters arranged to our liking, a great novelist might retain the power of inventing enchantment for us to a green old age. But as it is, how much too soon the mind ceases to command the power of creating these charms for us, or only repeats and executes the same orders, till we turn away disappointed. William Black was once inspired to create a Princess of Thule; or, rather, probably, to endue with all sweet perfections some faint living resemblance to that lovely and loveable ideal of his spiritual imagination; and only once, alas! could he describe to us, for the first time, that Hebridean archipelago lying in the luminous, misty light of northern summer seas. No doubt, his Daughter of Heth was very attractive, and won a place in our hearts; but no man can have two princesses to rule over him equally, and so it happens that having met early with his ideal woman, and having been inspired to describe her vividly, Mr. Black attained at once his highest powers of enchanting, and ever since has had to take a humbler place, through no fault of his own. In as far as Yolande succeeds in delighting us, it is by her modest resemblance to her elder and diviner sister, and if Allt-nam-ba becomes a local habitation and a name around which our affections cluster, it is because it is still in the Scotch Highlands, and can therefore claim a very distant relationship to Stornaway and Lewis.

But how can Yolande, daughter of the independent, obstructive Member of Parliament, the self-possessed young lady, product of the intensely conventional French pension or ladies' school, compete with the island-born lassie, the child of nature, self-educated, or rather nurtured by nature and her own inborn or heaven-born instincts and impulses? Loving and loyal as Yolande is, she has not a chance against Sheila; or even against the solitary Coquette who has had no fond and we may almost say foolish father to spoil her to her heart's content, but, instead, has had to fight her way to the citadels of the affections of a stern, Scotch, Presbyterian uncle, and her manly but unmannerly cousins. Yolande is full of strength of character and devoted affection, and she is tall and beautiful, as a heroine always should be; but she is matter-of-fact and practical to a painful extent, and self-confident overmuch, and a trifle stern in what should be her tenderest relation,—her relation to her much injured and gentle invalid mother. And then she is scientific, and prepares a hortus siccus, and is exercised about the welfare of her drying-boards and blotting-paper, and interested and even anxious for the safety of her specimens, and goes the extravagant length of proposing to restore the tone of her poor mother's mind, amongst other means, by teaching her botany. We may be wrong, but we get unhappy under the influence of a scientific heroine; and our depression turns to indignation when we find her boring her long-suffering mother, by continual stoppages of her pony-carriage to cull another interesting object of research. But above and beyond all these reasons for not feeling as entirely in captivity to Yolande as we did to Sheila and to Coquette, beyond her name, and her science, and her matter-of-factness, and her self-satisfaction, is an objection which, perhaps, only an evil-minded critic, bred to censoriousness and captiousness, would feel,—namely, inconsistency. We know that this is not really a failing in Yolande. We are sure she would never have done it. It is entirely Mr. Black's fault; only, as he has misinformed us, and we cannot disprove his statement, we must take it as proved that this calm, wise, eminently practical, sound-judging Yolande, this girl of prices and inventories, of foresight, prudence, punctuality, economy; this sensible girl; this model housewife, head agent, head gamekeeper, head groom, head cook, head waitress, and housemaid, actually so lost her head—no, not lost her head; any one, even an Old-Bailey pleader, might have done that—but so contradicted all the maxims of her life, and all the results of her own reasoning and of her own experience, as deliberately to plan the reform of a poor victim of demoralising and debasing drugs by the expedient of taking the same doses herself, so as to shame and frighten her exemplar. Of course, in a novel, the plan succeeds, but even then only by an accident; but what becomes of the sound common-sense of a girl who does not calculate on the different effects of the same dose on an old stager and a young beginner? and what becomes of her conscientiousness and high ideal of duty when she intentionally and of set purpose risks self-murder, on the chance that good may come of it?

We are quite sure that Yolande would never have agreed to the Quixotic scheme proposed to her by the excellent but high-flown Melville, and sanctioned by Mr. Shorthands, a business-like Member of Parliament, and by her nervous and mistaken father. She would, when she understood the matter, have put them all in their right places, and urged the usual and sensible means. Mr. Black must have been hard set for a plot, when he arranged what we may call this ridiculous conspiracy of three sensible men against the peace of the girl they all loved so well. But the story before us does not go in for the probable at all. The father is as weak and timid as the daughter is strong and brave; but, like her, he is, at Mr. Black's command, thoroughly inconsistent. He has sacrificed his life, all his public obligations and his highest domestic duty, to protect and pet his Yolande, and yet allows her, without a struggle, to be exposed to personal danger, bodily fatigue, loneliness, and anxiety, in taking up a work to which he has himself ignominiously succumbed, at the bidding of two uninterested advisers,—uninterested as far as he knew. For here comes in absurdity number three. One of these advisers, represented to be a man of deep and profound judgment, and passionately in love with Yolande, urges on the father and daughter this risky scheme, which breaks up all the daughter's happiness, but relieves the pusillanimous father from the onus of his grave and pressing responsibilities.

Mrs. Winterbourne's character, again, is anything but consistently drawn,—the tender, loving, docile, gentle woman is about the last person we should have picked out as likely to throw stones at and break a London hotel window. We can, in fact, say very little for the sense, not to say sanity, of the group of which Yolande is the centre; though Mrs. Bell, indeed, is a hearty, loving, natural woman, who redeems the rest from a charge of wholesale silliness. The sketches of the other personages seem to us to embrace all the talent which Mr. Black devotes in this book to his dramatis personæ. We have seldom seen a better picture of what may be called sensible selfishness than that displayed in the delineation of the Master of Lynn. The description of his unblinking devotion to his own absolute and unadulterated comfort rises to humour—a quality we do not remember to have often noticed in Mr. Black—in the sympathy it seems to demand from us for the Master of Lynn's simple good-faith in his own reading of his position, and for his imperturbable good-humour. We should like to quote his conversation with the friend who comes to enlighten him as to the private history of Yolande's family, but that it is too long, and reveals too much of the story. There is something quite child-like and innocent in the simple, common-sense, and pachydermatous insensibility to social opinion which his calm and immovable selfishness generates. But we will give part of the Master's letters before and after his engagement is broken off:—

"Station Hotel, Inverness, October 2nd.

"MY DEAREST YOLANDE,— Well, the plain truth is, dear Yolande, that I have quarrelled with my father, if that can be called a quarrel which is all on one side—for I simply retire, on my part, and seek quiet in an Inverness hotel. The cause of the quarrel, or estrangement, is that he is opposed to our marriage; and he has been put up to oppose it, I imagine, chiefly by my aunt, the elderly and agreeable lady whom you will remember meeting at the Towers. I think I am bound in honour to let you know this; not that it in the least affects either you or me, as far as our marriage is concerned, for I am old enough to manage my own affairs; but in order to explain a discourtesy which may very naturally have offended your father, and also to explain why I, feeling ashamed of the whole business, have rather kept back, and so failed to thank your father, as otherwise I should have done, for his kindness to me. Of course, I knew very well when we became engaged in Egypt that my father, whose political opinions are of a fine old crusted order, would be rather aghast at my marrying the daughter of the Member for Slagpool; but I felt sure that when he saw you and knew you, dear Yolande, he would have no further objection; and indeed I did not anticipate that the eloquence of my venerated aunt would have deprived him of the use of his senses. One ought not to write so of one's parent, I know; but facts are facts; and if you are driven out of your own home through the bigotry of an old man and the cattish temper of an old woman, and if you have the most angelic of sisters taken to nagging at you with letters, and if you are forced into the sweet seclusion of a hotel adjoining a railway station, then the humour of the whole affair begins to be apparent, and you may be inclined to call things by their real names. . . . I should not be at all surprised to hear from you that you had imagined something of the state of the case; for you must have wondered at their not asking you and your father to dinner, or something of the kind, after Polly taking you to the Towers when you first came north; but at all events, this is how we are situated now, and I should be inclined to make a joke of the whole affair, if it were not that when I think of you I feel a little bit indignant. Of course, it cannot matter to you—not in the least. It is disagreeable, that is all. If dogs delight to bark and bite, it does not much matter so long as they keep their barking and biting among themselves. It is rather hard, certainly, when they take possession of your house, and turn you out into the street; especially when you have a lovely sister come, and accuse you of having no higher ambition in life than playing billiards with commercial travellers. I shall hang on here, I expect, until our other tenants—they who have the forest—leave for the south; then I shall be able to make some final arrangements with our agent here; after which I shall consider myself free. . . . Perhaps, if I go away for a while, the people at Lynn may come to their senses. Polly has been at them once or twice; she is a warm ally of yours; but to tell you the truth I would not have you made the subject of any appeal. No word of that kind shall come from me. Most likely when the last of the people that the Grahams have with them at Inverstry have gone, Polly may go over to Lynn and establish herself there, and have a battle-royal with my revered aunt. Of course, I would not bother you with the details of this wretched family squabble if I did not think that some explanation were due both to you and to your father. I shall be glad to hear from you, if you are not too much occupied.—Yours affectionately,

"MY DEAREST YOLANDE," he wrote, "I am inexpressibly grieved that you should have given yourself the pain to write such a letter; and you might have known that whenever you wished our engagement to cease I should consider you had the right to say so; and so far from accusing you or doing anything in the tragedy line, I should beg to be allowed to remain always your friend. And it won't take any length of time for me to be on quite friendly terms with you—if you will let me; for I am so now; and if I saw you to-morrow, I should be glad of your companionship for as long as you chose to give it me; and I don't at all think it impossible that we may have many another stroll along the streets of Inverness, when you come back to the Highlands, as you are sure to do. Of course I am quite sensible of what I have lost—you can't expect me to be otherwise; and I daresay, if all the circumstances had been propitious, and if we had married, we should have got on very well together—for when Polly attributes everything that happens to my temper, that is merely because she is in the wrong, and can't find any other excuse; whereas, if you and I had got married, I fancy we should have agreed very well, so long as no one interfered. But to tell you the honest truth, my dear Yolande, I never did think you were very anxious about it; you seemed to regard our engagement as a very light matter—or as something that would please everybody all round; and though I trusted that the future would right all that—I mean that we should become more intimate and affectionate—still, there would have been a risk; and it is only common sense to regard these things now, as some consolation, and as some reason why, if you say, 'Let us break off this engagement,' I should say, 'Very well; but let us continue our friendship.' But there is a tremendous favour I would beg and entreat of you, dearest Yolande; and you always had the most generous disposition—I never knew you refuse anybody anything (I do believe that was why you got engaged to me—because you thought it would please the Grahams and all the rest of us). I do hope that you will consent to keep the people at Lynn in ignorance—they could only know through Polly, and you could keep it back from her—as to who it was, or why it was, that our engagement was broken off. This is not from vanity; I think you will say I haven't shown much of that sort of distemper. It is merely that I may have the whip-hand of the Lynn people. They have used me badly; and I mean to take care that they don't serve me so again; and if they imagine that our engagement has been broken off solely, or even partly, through their opposition, that will be a weapon for me in the future. And then the grounds of their opposition—that they or their friends might have to associate with one professing such opinions as those your father owns! You may rest assured, dearest Yolande, that I did not put you forward and make any appeal; and equally I knew you would resent my making any apology for your father, or allowing that any consideration on their part was demanded. It's no use reasoning with raving maniacs; I retired. But I mention this once more as an additional reason why, if our engagement is to be broken off, we should make up our minds to look on the best side of affairs, and to part on the best of terms; for I must confess more frankly to you now that there would have been some annoyance, and you would naturally have been angry on account of your father, and I should have taken your side, and there would simply have been a series of elegant family squabbles. There are one or two other points in your letter that I don't touch on; except to say that I hope you will write to me again—and soon; and that you will write in a very different tone. I hope you will see that many things justify you in so doing; and I hope I have made this letter as plain as can be. I have kept back nothing; so you needn't be reading between the lines. If you have no time to write a letter, send me a few words to show that you are in a more cheerful mood. If you don't, I shouldn't wonder if I broke through all social observances, and presented myself at your door—to convince you that you have done quite right, and that everything is well, and that you have given me a capital means of having it out with the Lynn people when the proper time comes. So please let me have a few lines; and in the meantime I hope I may be allowed to sign myself, yours most affectionately,
A. LESLIE."

The Master's sister, Polly, is another admirable sketch of a good-humoured and affectionate woman and warm partisan, with a great love of admiration, and a healthy-minded desire to lessen the family difficulties and add substantially to the family property.

The exquisite descriptions of scenery and atmospheric effects which, in his earlier novels, were such a notable feature of Mr. Black's writings, are not to be found in Yolande; hints of the well-remembered beauty are given here and there; a few lines of description in the Mediterranean, and again on the Nile, recall the delight we once had in them; and in the Highlands the whole tenor of the story, the incidents and the daily order of life, make one entirely realise that one is living almost amongst the clouds, on the edge of the boundless, lonely moors, and amongst the corries and glens and streams of the mountains, liable to squalls and freshets and blinding mists, and protected by almost inaccessible steep and bad roads from the rest of mankind; a realisation sometimes bringing a sense of delightful exultation, sometimes of pleasing sadness, not seldom of fear, according to the prevailing state of mind. But the impressions of the grand and the wild and beautiful thus given are not quotable, for the scene in each case is too mixed up with incident. The opening of the second volume, however, is almost an exception, and gives so exhilarating a sensation of the long-vacation holiday of which we are on the eve, that we will close our notice by exciting this delightful feeling:—

"Far up in the wild and lonely hills that form the backbone, as it were, of eastern Inverness-shire, in the desert solitudes where the Findhorn and the Foyers first begin to draw their waters from a thousand myotic-named or nameless rills, stands the lodge of Allt-nam-ba. The plain little double-gabled building, with its dependencies of kennels, stables, coachhouse, and keepers' bothy, occupies a promontory formed by the confluence of two brawling streams; and faces a long, wide, beautiful valley, which terminates in the winding waters of a loch. It is the only sign of habitation in the strangely silent district; and it is the last. The rough hill-road leading to it terminates there. From that small plateau, divergent corries—softly wooded most of them are, with waterfalls half hidden by birch and rowan trees—stretch up still farther into a sterile wilderness of moor and lochan and bare mountain-top, the haunt of the ptarmigan, the red deer, and the eagle; and the only sound to be heard in these voiceless altitudes is the monotonous murmur of the various burns. Since she (Yolande) had come to live at Allt-nam-ba she had acquired the conviction that the place seemed very close up to the sky; and that this broad valley, walled in by those great and silent hills, formed a sort of caldron, in which the elements were in the habit of mixing up weather for transference to the wide world beyond. At this very moment, for example, a continual phantasmagoria of cloud-effects was passing before her eyes. Far mountain-tops grew blacker and blacker in shadow; then the gray mist of the rain stole slowly across and hid them from view; then they reappeared again, and a sudden shaft of sunlight would strike on the yellow-green slopes and on the boulders of wet and glittering granite. But she had this one consolation—that the prospect in front of the lodge was much more reassuring than that behind. Behind—over the mountainous ranges of the moor—the clouds were banking up in a heavy and thunderous purple; and in the ominous silence the streams coming down from the corries sounded loud; whereas, away before her, the valley that led down to the haunts of men was for the most part flooded with brilliant sunlight, and the wind-swept loch was of the darkest and keenest blue."

AN ANECDOTAL HISTORY OF PARLIAMENT.*

It was in the year 1872 that Mr. Jennings and his friend Mr. W. S. Johnstone brought out their entertaining Book of Parliamentary Anecdote, and the favourable reception of that volume has encouraged Mr. Jennings to compile the present work, which differs somewhat in arrangement from its predecessor, and contains a much greater amount of matter. There is a detestable fashion abroad of sneering at a certain class of very useful and interesting books as "mere compilations," but we confess we have never been able to see the point of the contemptuous epithet. The mere compilation can hardly, perhaps, be a work of genius, but it may display genuine taste and talent; and such a book, for example, as that now before us demands much more labour in its production, and is much more interesting and valuable when produced, than many a book which is thoroughly "original," in the popular and vulgar sense of that much-abused word.

To criticise a volume of anecdotes is not easy, for when the critic has praised or condemned the choice and arrangement of the collected stories, and given reason for the praise or condemnation, his task is performed, and there is nothing more for him to say. Mr. Jennings does not, however, confine himself to anecdotes pure and simple; but gives us noteworthy extracts from remarkable speeches, pithy records of memorable Parliamentary events, well-chosen sketches in prose and verse of eminent legislators, and a rich store of miscellaneous and unclassifiable fragments of information. Indeed, had Mr. Jennings dropped the "anecdotal" from his title, and simply called his book "The Story of the British Parliament, with all the Tire-some Portions Omitted," he might have been charged with a flippant outrage upon the dignity of history, but he certainly could not have been accused of giving a misleading name to his very entertaining compilation. The amount of labour represented by the work may be estimated from the fact that the list of books actually quoted comprises more than 150 works, and the well-informed reader hardly needs the compiler's announcement that many more volumes have been consulted in its preparation. Mr. Jennings gives in his preface a recent illustration of the practical usefulness of his book:—

"The occasion of a particular incident or the use of a certain phrase is often matter of dispute, and requires verification, both in Parliament and out of it. A circumstance which occurred in the Session of 1876 will show that the want of a ready means of authenticating such facts and phrases is felt at times by persons even of great eminence in active political life. Mr. Gladstone, speaking in the House of Commons of an expression used by a former colleague (the Earl of Clarendon) in an important crisis, said he had been at some pains to find out in 'Hansard' what were the actual meaning and connection of that expression ('drifting into war'), and he gave the correct version."

If Mr. Gladstone had consulted Jennings instead of Hansard he would certainly have been saved a good deal of trouble, and it is to be hoped that he will soon become acquainted with the true method of minimising one portion of his labours. Phrases such as that of Lord Clarendon's stick to the public memory, but their origin is often speedily forgotten, even by professed politicians. How many readers know or remember who were the first coiners of such phrases as "the wisdom of our ancestors," "the sovereign people," and "her Majesty's Opposition"? Let the ignorant turn to Mr. Jennings's pages, and they will be enlightened. The author of the first was Sir William Grant, who, though he died so late as 1832, and was classed by Brougham with speakers of the first order, has passed almost entirely out of the memory of this generation; and his appeal to wise ancestors was made in answer to Sir Samuel Romilly, who had dared to suggest that creditors ought to have a claim upon the real as well as the personal property of their debtors. As Sir William's speech was, unfortunately for him, delivered not in China, but in England, the ancestors were ontvoted. "The sovereign people" is not the original form of the phrase which originated with one of the Dukes of Norfolk. In May, 1798, the Duke presided at a dinner of the Whig Club, and at the close of the evening gave as a toast, "Our Sovereign—the People," or, as Lord Holland's version has it, "The People—our Sovereign." For this democratic and decidedly undukely utterance his Grace was dismissed from the Lord-Lieutenancy of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and Fox, who, at another dinner of the same club, publicly adopted the toast, had his name struck out of the list of Privy Councillors. It was Mr. John Cam Hobhouse, afterwards Lord Broughton, who first spoke of "his Majesty's Opposition," the phrase being adopted by Canning and expounded by Tierney, who said, "We are certainly a branch of his Majesty's Government. Although the gentlemen opposite are in office, we are in power. The measures are ours, but all the emoluments are theirs." Mr. Jennings notes that Joseph Hume, in a letter to Sir Joshua Walmsley, claims to have been the first person to use the word "Radical" as a party designation, and the now familiar phrase "burning questions" is traced to a letter written to some political friends by the late Mr. Edward Miall. The information given in this volume on such matters as these is very full, and it is, perhaps, too much to expect that Mr. Jennings should draw attention to what has not, as well as to what has, been said; but it may be well in future editions to state, for the benefit of Conservative readers, that Mr. Bright did not exclaim, "Perish, India!" or Mr. Gladstone ever express a wish to "turn the Turks out of Europe, bag and baggage."

Of the anecdotes proper given in this history, a good many are of course humorous, though, considering the number of noted wits and humorists who have sat in both Houses, notably in the Commons, the proportion is not so large as might have been expected. We do not think of humour as one of the prominent gifts of Sir Robert Peel, but nothing could well be neater or more grimly funny than his reply to Feargus O'Connor, who, when charged in the House with being a Republican, repelled the imputation, adding, however, the equivocal statement that he did not care whether the Queen or the Devil were the reigning monarch. Sir Robert quietly remarked, "When the honourable gentleman sees the Sovereign of his choice on the throne of these realms, I hope he'll enjoy, and I'm sure he'll deserve, the confidence of the Crown." Another of the good things preserved by Mr. Jennings occurred in a speech made by

* An Anecdotal History of the British Parliament, from the Earliest Periods to the Present Time. Compiled from Authentic Sources by George Henry Jennings. New Edition. London: Horace Cox, Law Times Office.

Lord John Russell, who was also a statesman without any special reputation as an utterer of bons mots. Sir Francis Burdett, who, as every one knows, began his life as a Radical of the newest fashion and finished it as a Tory of the oldest, thought proper, during his "second period," to sneer at "the cant of patriotism." "Mobled Queen is good;"—so was "cant of patriotism;" but Sir Francis was destined to find that it was not too good to be bettered. "I quite agree," said Lord John, "with the honourable baronet, that the cant of patriotism is a bad thing. But I will tell him a worse—the recant of patriotism—which I will gladly go along with him in repudiating, whenever he shows me an example of it." This is very happy; the bludgeon-blow is answered by a clean rapier-thrust; but the construction of the last clause in the sentence is so loose, that we think Lord John must have been misreported, for, speaking grammatically, the "it" stands for the recant of patriotism; whereas, of course, it really refers to the repudiation of it. As the words now run, they remind us of the Judge's address to a convicted criminal,—“Prisoner at the Bar, Providence has blessed you with intelligence and a good education, instead of which you go about the country stealing ducks.” Of this class we must only give one more anecdote, which every reader may not remember, though it is taken from so well-known a book as Mr. Trevelyan's Life of Macaulay. In 1829, Macaulay and Lord Clarendon were talking over the political situation, when the former expressed curiosity concerning the terms in which the Duke of Wellington would recommend the Catholic Relief Bill to the Peers. "Oh," said Lord Clarendon, "it will be easy enough. He'll say, 'My Lords! Attention! Right about face! March!'" Punch did not appear until 1841, but, had it been in existence in 1839, how grateful the Tenniel of the day would have been for such a suggestion for a political cartoon!

Everybody has felt how vivid a conception of character is often given by half-a-dozen well-selected anecdotes, sometimes by a single one; and Mr. Jennings is wonderfully successful in hitting upon just the right things. How forcibly, for example, are we impressed with the moral weight of Lord Althorp's personality by the curious story—though it ought not to seem curious—taken from Sir Denis le Marchant's biography! We read that, "Once, in answer to a most able and exhaustive speech of Croker, he [Althorp] arose, and merely observed that 'he had made some calculations which he considered as entirely conclusive, in refutation of the right honourable gentleman's arguments, but, unfortunately, he had mislaid them; so that he could only say that, if the House would be guided by his arguments, they would reject the amendment,'—which they did accordingly." The biographer might well add the remark that "there was no standing against such influence as this," and he might have gone on to say that, creditable as the incident was to Lord Althorp, it was almost equally creditable to his hearers. Much as the House of Commons has gained in many ways since Lord Althorp's time, it has lost much of the magnanimity which made a large and liberal confidence like this not only possible, but natural. Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote are both men of stainless honour; but which of them would dare to make such an appeal to-day, or, making it, would entertain the faintest hope of its success?

We will not continue the congenial task of quotation. Good as so many of Mr. Jennings's anecdotes are in themselves, they are better in his book than in our columns; for, by his admirable arrangement, they reflect light upon each other, and become not merely anecdotes, but reminders; knots upon a mental pocket-handkerchief, recalling a whole multitude of associated facts, which are not quite forgotten, but stowed away in obscure cupboards of memory. It is not every book of which it can be said that it will be in its right place either on the drawing-room table, to be taken up in the odd ten minutes before dinner, or on the library shelves, to serve as a permanently useful work of reference.

TUKE'S HISTORY OF THE INSANE.*

THE most startling chapter of the elder Mr. Caxton's History of Human Error, had that remarkable opus magnum ever seen the light, would undoubtedly have been the one dealing with the theories held and acted upon by the faculty concerning the cause and cure of mental disorders, from the dark ages until the close of the eighteenth century. From the days of Ambrose Paré, the light of common-sense began to illumine surgical and medical practice. But the treatment of insanity, as Dr. Tuke's pages abundantly show, continued to be a barbarous quackery founded upon a crude empiricism, the outcome of ignoble dread and brutish ignorance, up to a period almost within living memory. Witches, who were mostly half-demented old women, were burnt by thousands; the last of them was judicially murdered in Sutherlandshire in 1722. "It was a good plea," says Lord Campbell, in a passage quoted by Dr. Tuke from the Lives of the Chancellors, "to an action for assault, battery, and false imprisonment, that the plaintiff was a lunatic, and that, therefore, the defendant had arrested him, confined him, and whipped him." Sometimes the poor creatures were roughly physicked with purges and emetics, to expel the excess of bile which was supposed to cause the disease by the more humane practitioners; more commonly, they were regarded as possessed by a devil, or merely as innately vicious, and scourged, fettered, and dungeoned accordingly. Another remedy frequently resorted to, and not, indeed, unknown in modern practice, was the application of cold water, too often by the rough process known in the west country as "bowssening," a description of which is given by Dr. Tuke. During the last century, repeated and copious venesection was lauded as an almost certain means of cure, at which we can scarcely wonder when, in the columns of a medical contemporary, we see a distinguished physician advocating the revival of the seasonal blood-letting with which our great-grandfathers were so familiar. The treatment of the insane throughout Europe was on a level with that described by Dr. Tuke as obtaining in Britain, and the civilisation of Christianity appears, in this respect, in singular and humiliating contrast with the civilisation of the East. The followers of the Prophet regarded the unhappy lunatic as specially visited by God, and worthy rather of veneration than of scorn; while the votaries of Buddha considered him an object not of derision and torture, but of sympathy and benevolence.

Amid the darkest and cruellest superstitions, however, the light of reason and the sweetness of mercy are never entirely lost, and from time to time, clear brains and pitiful hearts came to the rescue of the "Poor Tom" of our forefathers. Dr. Borde, a Carthusian monk, born in 1490, counselled a mild and kindly treatment of the insane, though the "lunatycke" is still to "be kept in safearde in some close house where there is lytell light" with a "keeper the whiche the modde man do feare." Reginald Scot, a Kentish man, who died in the last year of the sixteenth century, and is blamed by Burton because he denied the existence of witches altogether, or, if they existed, asserted that they could do no harm, and Wiems, the disciple of Cornelius Agrippa, are also mentioned by Dr. Tuke as sharing Borde's superiority to the folly and cruelty of the age. A passage cited from Swift's Tale of a Tub shows, however, that at the beginning of the eighteenth century whips, chains, and dark chambers were still the familiar remedies of the mad-doctor. In 1744, the Legislature began to bestir itself, but rather in the interests of the public than on behalf of the poor Bedlamite. Two justices were empowered to lock-up and chain lunatics who were too dangerous to be abroad. Various measures were subsequently brought before the House of Commons, some of which passed into law, but most of which met with violent opposition, when they were not rejected, in the House of Lords, where Lord Eldon observed that there could not be a more false humanity than an over-humanity with regard to the insane. It was not until the year 1845 that, owing to the exertions of that "indefatigable reformer of abuses connected with the treatment of lunatics," as Dr. Tuke rightly designates Lord Shaftesbury, the proper guardianship and humane treatment of the insane were efficiently provided for, and the public assured against any such invasion of individual liberty on the pretext of insanity as forms the main incident—rather an anachronism than an exaggeration—of Charles Reade's striking novel, Hard Cash. Half-a-century previously, William Tuke, the kindly Quaker, ancestor of the author of this volume, moved by the condition of the lunatics confined in the York Asylum, had established the celebrated Retreat. The story of his struggles is well and sympathetically told. A contemporary of Pinel, he worked on the same lines, and achieved a like success. It is not too much to say that it is mainly through the efforts of these good and great men that the mingled dread and disgust with which the insane were regarded by our foregoers, down almost to the last generation, have been replaced by the nobler and more humane sentiments of sympathy and pity.

The most interesting portion of the volume before us is, perhaps, that which deals with the progress of reform in the medical treatment of the insane. In the eighteenth century the notion was no longer entertained that they were "possessed" by devils, who could be cast out by floggings; but they were still treated as criminals, to be governed chiefly by the fear of torturous punishment. Even as late as 1827, fetters and chains were hung up in the wards of St. Luke's, to intimidate and humble the patients. Now, restraint is of the mildest character, never punitive, and in some asylums dispensed with altogether. Authorities are divided upon the question of its total abolition,—probably, an absolute prohibition of it would be unwise, but the question seems to be mainly one of expense. Where a sufficient number of properly qualified attendants are provided, restraint need only be resorted to in the rarest cases, and then rather to keep the patient's hands off himself than off those about him. Seclusion is as little in favour as restraint; even the necessary bolts and bars are masked, and the lunatic is reminded as little as possible of the character of his misfortune.

It is somewhat disquieting to learn that insanity is on the increase. In England and Wales, there were, in round numbers, in 1859, 37,000 lunatics; in 1881, 73,000. In the former year, the proportion to population was 18·67 per 10,000; in 1881, 28·34 per 10,000. These figures doubtless are susceptible of some explanation in the hands of trained statisticians, but there can be no doubt of the fact of a considerable increase during the last twenty years. Even since 1869, the ratio per 10,000 of admissions—i.e., of new cases—has increased from 4·71 to 5·19; in 1878, it was as high as 5·36. The increase is chiefly among the poorer classes, and, like every other disagreeable social symptom, is laid at the door of drink. But a similar increase is observable in the statistics of Continental countries the populations of which have the reputation of being comparatively sober. Dr. Tuke has treated his subject exhaustively, and has produced a thoroughly trustworthy and very readable book, full of interesting and suggestive matter. At the end of the volume, he has reprinted an address delivered by him as President of the Medico-Psychological Association in 1881, in which he reviews the progress of psychological medicine during the last forty years, and notices briefly the principal modern theories upon the ætiology and pathology of mental disease. For our own part, we are convinced that the term "mental disease" is a misnomer. Whether matter and mind are separate entities, or form a sort of single duality, we hold idiocy, imbecility, and lunacy to be the effects of a diseased or defective condition of the means through which the mind or mind-element works, of the physically cognisable structure of the brain and its adjuncts. It is of the utmost importance to the insane that their malady should be regarded and treated as a lesion or defect, temporary or permanent, of the brain-substance, mainly of the grey matter, and not of some incognisable and unreachable spiritual element.

THE RELIEF OF VIENNA.*

AMONG the decisive battles of Europe, few have had more pregnant consequences than the relief of Vienna by John Sobieski, two hundred years ago, and Sir Edward Creasy certainly neglected an opportunity when he passed it by without notice. For, at the least, it completed on land what the victory of Lepanto accomplished at sea; and when we remember the universal apprehension with which Christendom regarded the approach of the Turkish Power, it will be admitted that an event which not only dissipated that alarm, but which arrested the further course of Islam, has very solid claims on the gratitude of posterity. We may not be able to agree with all the deductions which Mr. Malden feels bound to draw from the result of the siege, yet we cannot fail to welcome as both appropriate and instructive his account of the great overthrow of the Turks before the walls of Vienna. Mr. Malden is quite right in devoting his opening pages to the task of showing how different was the power of the Sultan in the seventeenth century from what it is now, and of proving that no victory was more difficult to obtain, at the same time that it was glorious and creditable, than one over the armies of the Porte. Turkey was then supreme in south-eastern Europe. The growing reputation of Russia, the chivalrous opposition of the Poles, and the consistent hostility of Austria imposed but an imperfect check on the aggressive impulses of the Porte, especially as the Christians were weakened by many internal dissensions, and by a great mass of popular disaffection and even of open hostility on the part of the Hungarians. So imperfect, indeed, was that check, that in the year 1683 a Turkish army made its way across Hungary and up the Valley of the Danube to Vienna, and for a moment seemed to threaten with extinction the fortunes of the House of Hapsburg. That Vienna was saved and the Turks were driven back must be mainly attributed to a revival in the Crusading fervour, due to the impulse of the chivalrous Polish King, John Sobieski, of which this little volume gives the salient features.

The policy of Louis XIV., and his ambition to be the chief potentate in Western Europe, had not a little to do with the revival of the power and activity of Turkey which the seventeenth century witnessed. Although Louis revoked the Edict of Nantes, to please the extreme members of the Church of Rome, he cared very little for the interests of religion if they stood in the way of his attaining any political object; and consequently, he showed himself nothing loth to make use of Protestant disaffection in Hungary, and to stir up the Porte against the House of Austria, in order to embarrass the Empire, and enable him the more easily to realise his plans. "If France had but stood neutral, the controversy between Turks and Christians might soon have been decided," said the Duke of Lorraine; but the opportunity of aggrandising France, even at the risk of imperilling Christendom, was a temptation not to be resisted. Therefore the war of 1683 commenced, and was nearly terminating with the destruction of the House of Austria. Louis was the more impelled to this step, because his ambitious inclinations were then worked upon by a sense of danger. The Treaty of Laxenburg, in 1682, showed that the supremacy of France had assumed the character of a common danger to the rest of Europe, and that the view was gaining ground which afterwards built up the Grand Alliance against her as the foe of Continental peace. Louis realised the peril in which he might stand from the combination of his neighbours, and one of the first remedies to which he had recourse was to urge on the Porte the advisability of invading the Austrian dominions. His overtures might have failed of their object, for the twenty years' truce agreed to after Montecuculi's victory at St. Gotthard, in 1664, had not quite expired, but for the civil war that broke out in Protestant Hungary. A portion of that kingdom was in the absolute possession of the Turks, in whom the Magyars recognised their natural and most efficient protectors; and the injudicious efforts of the Emperor Leopold to Romanise the rest led to a general insurrection. The Porte might have resisted the specious suggestions of France, it could not refuse to listen to the appeals of its Hungarian allies:—

"Too late," writes Mr. Malden, "in 1681 the Court of Vienna attempted a conciliatory policy in Hungary. The spirit of rebellion had been aroused, and the offers of redress and justice made by the Emperor were distrusted as a veil for treachery, or despised as the confession of weakness. Tekeli defied the Emperor, and assumed the offensive even beyond the borders of Hungary. Neither was the Porte to be propitiated. In vain an Imperial Embassy to Constantinople sought a prolongation of the truce which was on the point of expiring at the end of the stipulated twenty years. The demands of the Turks rose with the progress of their preparations. A principality for their ally, Count Tekeli, in Hungary; extension of territory, with the strongest border fortresses for themselves, a great war indemnity,—such were the terms which implied a determination not to negotiate. The ambassador, Count Caprara, was compelled as a prisoner to witness the departure of the Turkish hosts for the frontier."

This Turkish army is computed to have numbered not far short of 300,000 fighting men, and the Grand Vizier, Kara Mustapha, a nephew of the celebrated Kınprili, was entrusted with the command. Kara Mustapha, although he had acquired the influence, possessed little of the capacity of his uncle. His military incapacity was proved to be so great, that it entailed the almost complete destruction of, perhaps, the very finest army that was ever sent by a Mahomedan potentate to harry the lands of Christendom, or to exalt the glory of the Crescent at the expense of the Cross. The forces which Leopold could muster to oppose the approaching host were extremely scanty and comparatively insignificant. His allies were either weak in themselves, or suspicious and distrustful of his policy; and the embarrassment of the Austrian ruler, then as now, arose principally from financial causes. Prince Eugene, the most illustrious as well as the most honourable of all the brave men who have championed the House of Austria in the field, said of the pecuniary resources of that State, that "business men laugh at our finance, for my part, I weep over it." The only possible ally was one whom Leopold, in his heart of hearts, despised as of inferior rank, and one with whom he could not condescend to arrange any harmony of action. That ally, John Sobieski of Poland, although notoriously hostile to Turkey, was also believed to lean very much in the direction of France, and he was certainly sympathetic towards the wishes of the Hungarians. A former rival of his for the throne of Poland was the foremost and, be it added, the most capable of the Austrian Generals, Charles Leopold, Duke of Lorraine. At Vienna, however much the want of an ally might incline statesmen to look in the direction of Warsaw, there was as good reason to expect a policy of indifference on the part of Sobieski as one of practical help to Austria, and of active intervention against the Turks. But, fortunately for the House of Hapsburg, and perhaps even for Europe, the Polish King was of a different temper from the calculating monarch at Versailles; and the danger of his neighbour from the advance of the Crescent aroused in him all the nobler fury and enthusiasm of the old Crusaders. He rejected every temptation to preserve the ignoble attitude of a neutral in face of a common peril to humanity and civilisation; and, with the pecuniary aid of the other States and potentates, including the Pope, he arrayed the not over-enthusiastic nobles of his country to proceed against the Moslim.

The advance of the Turkish host had not been hindered by any similar dissensions to those which prevented the States of Central and Eastern Europe from uniting against a common foe. The forces of which the Duke of Lorraine could dispose were quite incapable of arresting its progress, and the precipitate flight of the Emperor and his Court to the Bavarian fortress of Passau was followed by the arrival of the Sultan's army at the gates of Vienna. There was small ground for hope that the capital itself could hold out until relief came, and among its inhabitants there was a deep disgust at the bigotry of Leopold, whose Jesuit policy had lost Hungary, and provided the hordes of Asia with an easy road into the heart of the empire. "The fortifications were old and imperfect, the suburbs encroached upon the works, the number of the defenders was small. Thirteen thousand infantry, supplied by the army of Lorraine, and seven thousand armed citizens formed the garrison; and besides these, about sixty thousand souls were in the city. The command was entrusted to Ernest Rudiger, Count Starhemberg, an officer of tried skill and courage." A warrior-prelate, the Bishop of Neustadt, shared with him the danger and the glory of the defence. The Turkish army took up its position outside the walls on July 14th, and the bombardment, which commenced as soon as the batteries were placed, continued with unabated fury until the relief of the city, two months later. If we only consider the immense superiority of the besiegers over the besieged, and the uncertainty in the minds of the defenders as to whence any effectual aid could come, we can but arrive at the conclusion that the siege of Vienna was in all respects the most remarkable of modern sieges, or if equalled, then by that of Saragossa alone.

The blunders of Kara Mustapha opened the way for the triumph of Christendom. He wasted his opportunities before Vienna, and he neglected the many means in his power to retard, if he could not repel, the approach of Sobieski. Four days after the arrival of the Turks at the gates of Vienna, Sobieski left Warsaw for Cracow. A month later he was on the frontiers of Silesia, at the head of his incomparable cavalry and a certain number of poorly accounted infantry, who had, however, as their leader wisely declared, "sworn to dress themselves better in the spoils of the enemy." On the last day of August he effected his junction with the forces of the Duke of Lorraine to the west of Vienna, and without the least attempt to make difficulties by standing on his dignity as a sovereign, hastened to concert with Lorraine a plan of action for effecting the relief of Vienna, now reduced to the last stage of distress. The passage of the Danube represented the first obstacle to be overcome, and its successful accomplishment was only due to the apathy or ignorance of the Turkish commander, who steadily refused to believe in the reported arrival of the Polish King. The crisis in the siege had indeed arrived, for the relieving forces had scarcely been arrayed on the Tullner Feld south of the Danube, when the last despairing message carried by a swimmer up the river from the beleaguered city arrived from Starhemberg,—"No time is to be lost; no time indeed to be lost."

The same military incapacity which had allowed Sobieski to march unhindered the whole way from Poland facilitated the execution of his plans in front of Vienna. The chances of victory were at the end of August wholly on the side of the Turks. The relieving army mustered less than eighty thousand men, the garrison of Vienna was reduced to such extremity, that it could barely hold its last defences. To a vast superiority in numbers, Kara Mustapha added all the advantages of the stronger position. When his over-confidence lost him the latter, the former proved of but little avail; and as soon as Sobieski had scaled the heights of the Kahlenberg, and surveyed the Turkish positions extending below, he is reported to have exclaimed, with the happy insight of a good soldier "This man is badly encamped; he knows nothing of war; we shall beat him." Mr. Malden gives a very clear and spirited account of the battle, or rather of the series of encounters outside Vienna, that were fought throughout September 12th, 1683. Up to the last, the Turkish commanders were disposed to disbelieve in the reported arrival of Sobieski, and to consider the attack as little more than a diversion on the part of Lorraine to encourage the despairing garrison. Mr. Malden thus describes their discovery of the truth:—

"Re-forming after their brief delay, the Polish cavalry in gorgeous arms came flashing from the woods and defiles near Dornbach on his left. Those who had before fought against him knew the plumes raised upon a spear point, the shield borne before him, the banderolles on the lances of his body-guard, which declared the presence of the terrible Sobieski. 'By Allah, but the King is really among them,' cried Gieray Khan, of the Crimea; and all doubt was at an end as the shout of 'Vivat Sobieski!' rolled along the Christian lines, in dread and significant answer to the discordant clamour of the Infidels."

The Turkish troops fought with their accustomed valour, but, badly led, their defeat was assured beforehand by the apprehension caused throughout their ranks by the presence of the victor of Choczim. Their loss in men was enormous—barely fifty thousand in all are credibly affirmed to have regained Turkey—but it was surpassed by the loss in matériel:—

"I cannot conceive," wrote Sobieski, "how they can carry on the war, after such a loss of matériel. The whole of the artillery of the Turks, their munitions, and their baggage were the spoil of the victors. Three hundred and ten pieces of cannon, 20,000 animals, 9,000 carriages, 125,000 tents, 5,000,000 pounds of powder are enumerated. The holy standard of the Prophet had been saved, but the standard of the Vizier, mistaken for it, was sent to the Pope by the conqueror; while his gilded stirrups were dispatched at once to Poland, to the Queen, as a token of victory. Never perhaps since Alexander stood a victor at Issus in the tents of Darius, or the Greeks stormed the Persian camp at Platæa, had an European army entered upon such spoil."

Although we cannot attempt to enter here upon the many interesting speculations which Mr. Malden's volume excites and goes far towards solving, we can express our sense of the very useful service he has rendered by recalling, and so well describing, the picturesque and important episode in the history of Europe that centred round the siege and relief of Vienna. Although the day has completely passed away when Turkish aggression was the most formidable menace to the peace of Europe, we cannot be too often reminded of the circumstances which had such an important part in shaping the policy, and even in moulding the form, of the States of Central and Eastern Europe. Personally, Sobieski derived little advantage from his brilliant achievement. The Poles obtained no equivalent recompense for the danger they had incurred in behalf of the Austrian dominions, and the ingratitude of Leopold was as rudely expressed as it was inexcusable. He could not avoid, although he postponed as long as possible, a meeting with his deliverer; but then he addressed him in a few cold words in Latin, although Lorraine had recommended that he should receive him "with open arms, since he had saved the Empire." But the sullen pride of the Hapsburg ruler could not obscure from his contemporaries, and certainly has not blinded posterity to, the magnitude of the service Sobieski had rendered to Europe and to Christendom. On the one hand, it was proclaimed from the pulpits that "there was a man sent from God whose name was John," and Queen Christina of Sweden wrote that "the Empire of the World was his due, if Heaven had intended it for a single potentate." And on the other hand, the preparations now in progress at Vienna for the celebration of its two-hundredth anniversary show that the Austrians of to-day are not insensible of the timely aid they received from the chivalrous King of Poland, at the moment when they were reduced to the last gasp, and when their fairest provinces were overrun by an Asiatic soldiery. Of that event, too, and its consequences, Mr. Malden's essay will be for the English reader a useful reminder.

WHAT Tito Melema was in the grand life of Romola, Mr. George Moore's very cleverly drawn "modern lover" is, in the several lives of three women who love him, trust him, and sacrifice themselves to him, each in her different way and according to the opportunities afforded them by his various needs at the time. Of the refined and poetical tone and atmosphere of the book that gave us an unrivalled picture of moral good-for-nothingness in old Florentine days, there is no trace in this essentially modern story; they are replaced by plain prose, and realism which, while it is not coarse, and, unlike the tone of the "naturalistic" writers (for whom we suspect Mr. Moore of an admiration much to be deplored), does not offend, takes the gilt off the gingerbread of sentiment, and ignores romance in a more thorough style than we are accustomed to, except in the utterances of professed cynics. The author of A Modern Lover is not a cynic; he not only recognises, but he respects goodness, purity, and disinterestedness, and although the story he tells is all about the woeful waste of those feelings upon a person absolutely unworthy of them, he is quite alive to the pity of it, and gives his readers the notion that he really would have liked to make Lewis Seymour a better fellow, if he could. He cannot, however, for A Modern Lover is not a bit of a built-up story; it has a very uncommon note of spontaneity; it tells itself, and its faults are the defects of its qualities of moderation and sincerity. The book has more power than the story; the characters have more interest than the incidents; the first volume is the best as a conception and a composition, but the third is superior to it as a picture of society: it gives a clever evolution of character without exaggeration, and a view of modern life which, while it is tinged with pessimism, is not scornful or bitter, but on the whole tolerant and good-humoured.

The "naturalism" that Mr. Moore occasionally affects does not come to him by nature. Certain passages of his novel make us aware that he admires and would fain imitate Zola and his odious school; but we venture to predict that he will never succeed in doing this. He has to combat two powerful obstacles to an achievement so much to be regretted; they are the faith of a Christian and the instincts of a gentleman. If M. Zola, or any of the hogs of his sty, could write such an episode as that with which the story opens, that of the first woman who sacrifices herself to save the penniless artist, an episode in which the keynote to the character of Lewis Seymour is struck, we should have as much hope for them as we have confidence in Mr. Moore's future work;—even they might yet "purge, and live cleanly." It would be difficult to praise too highly the strength, truth, delicacy, and pathos of the incident of Gwynnie Lloyd, and the admirable treatment of the great sacrifice she makes when, in his utter destitution, and under the influence of his threat to commit suicide, she consents to sit to Lewis Seymour for the nude figure of Venus. The incident is depicted with skill and beauty. The author does not again reach that point; his later materials are more common-place. Here is the key-note passage:—

"'For goodness' sake, don't cry like that, Gwynnie!' said Lewis, with tears in his eyes; 'I am sorry I asked you; let's say no more about it.' At the sound of his voice the girl stopped crying, and, looking up at him, said, 'I will sit for you, Lewis, since it is necessary; but I'm not a bad girl, nor do I wish to be; but it cannot be right to see you starve or drown yourself, when I can save you.'—Lewis did not speak. He knew that she suffered, although he didn't exactly know why. His was a soft, sensuous nature, that instinctively took the easiest road to walk in, without a thought whether it was the right or the wrong one."

How the girl, a humble, little, Methodist shopwoman, accomplishes her task, what her horror is when she sees upon the canvas the naked figure that is herself; how she feels that what she has done for him must part them; her flight, and the ease and readiness with which, when the pinch of poverty is taken off him, he accepts her absence as a very good thing, and reflects that she might have been a clog and a nuisance to him; and how strictly consistent with this the future conduct of the favourite of fortune and the spoilt child of society is,—the reader will learn from a story in which there is nothing strained or distorted. The author depends for his tragedy not upon violent vices, but upon the mere ordinary, inevitable development of a man's unprincipled selfishness, and, without any grim catastrophe, leaves him prosperous, comfortable, successful, and found out by the three women who, among the multitude of his flatterers, have really and truly loved him.

* A Modern Lover. By George Moore. London: Tinsley Brothers.

And the women? Mr. Moore is not so successful in his portraiture of Mrs. Bentham as in that of Lady Helen; the former is rather shadowy, we do not feel that the author himself knows her very well, or has her always clearly before him; but the outline is a fine one, and the infatuation that makes such a woman love so absolutely poor and self-engrossed a creature as Lewis Seymour, is even less intelligible than in the case of Lady Helen. We do not, however, question its truth to nature and the society of the time. Conceit, effeminacy, and affectation have gained a footing in this generation which every observer is forced to recognise. There is a great chasm between this time and the "north-easter" days of Yeast and Westward Ho! There was not a little affectation about the muscularity and the manliness of those days too; but the ideal women of their poetry and their romance were women of a higher type than any novelist who is not to be contented with mere success would now venture to draw, and the aim and scope of their fiction were as different from the aim and scope of the fiction of this time as the Pyrrhic phalanx from the Pyrrhic dance.

Mr. Moore's is, then, not an ideal novel; it is a study from life, and lifelike,—more's the pity! It is faulty, but always interesting; it has both pathos and humour, and it is pervaded by a frank, revealing spirit that tells of observation of men and things, intelligent, not malicious, and commonsensical. The world and its way neither take in this writer, nor do they disgust him; he sees the poetry of things, but he knows that it is the prose of them that lasts; he is just as much "up to" the jargons of humanity as ever was the thunderous philosopher of Chelsea; but he does not thunder,—he listens, smiles, and makes a note of them. Art jargon, the affectations of criticism, and the huggermugger of Art Societies have not been better exemplified than by his Mr. Harding, Mr. Thompson, and other members of Seymour's social world. All this portion of the book is characterised by judgment; it is not overdone, it is not offensively personal, it is amusing and true. The author's style leaves much to be desired. He passes from English into French as abruptly as Dick Swiveller passed into scraps of verse, "as if they were only prose in a hurry," with the incoherence of a man who is accustomed to think in either language indifferently; and he has not looked after the printers' errors in his French. His sentences are occasionally, let us say, haphazard; not exactly ungrammatical, but wanting in accuracy. The literary method is defective, but the work is one which will make its mark,—the best sort of mark for an author, for it means that its readers will look with expectation for its successor.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Church Quarterly Review, July. (Spottiswoode and Co.)—The first article in this number, "Church Organisation in the Royal Navy," treats of practical Church work. From its sensible and moderate recommendations, few, we think, will be found to disagree. On a kindred topic, we have "The Work of the London Lay Helpers' Association." In theology, we have a very able article on "Our Lord's Human Example." Its main object is, of course, to magnify the Sacramental doctrine. "The sturdy Sacramentalism of Scripture" is a phrase which the author, not without some boldness, uses against his adversaries. Sacramentalism is not, however, the only alternative to the teaching of a mere historic example. It is possible to believe in a Presence of which the Sacraments are the constant witness, but which is not limited to them. Communities which, like the Friends, have no Sacraments, and those which on the reviewer's principles have quite ineffectual pretences of them, may be partakers of this Presence. Whence, otherwise, do they get their results of Christian life, results often admirable, both from the theoretic and the practical point of view? By a natural sequence of thought, an account of Le Courayer, the learned champion of the validity of Anglican Orders, follows the article of which we have just been speaking. An excellent account it is. Le Courayer, indeed, was one of the best friends Anglicanism ever had, though personally he always thought it a schism. But the validity of its Orders is a matter of life and death to it. The merest suspicion of a flaw must send a logical Anglican to Rome. Another contribution to historical theology is the review of Mr. Watkins's "Studies of Arianism." In controversy, we have "The Nomenclature of English Dissent" and "The Catholic Side of Anglicanism." We may remark that the great Church Societies had their beginning in the time of Broad-Church supremacy, which the writer places between 1688 and 1760, and describes as being a time of rampant irreligion. His golden age is "the High-Church time of influence confined to the reigns of Charles II.

and James II.," when "Dissent was all but extinguished by peaceful means." "The invidious Acts of Charles II.'s Parliaments directed against Nonconformists were purely civil and political," the writer explains. Exactly so; just as the "secular arm" put heretics to death, the "spiritual power" confining itself to peaceful means. The other articles in the number are "The Legal and Historical Value of the Study of the Canon Law," M. Renan's "Souvenirs," and "Our Duty on the Marriage Question."

The British Quarterly Review, July. (Hodder and Stoughton).—Most readers will turn at once to the interesting recollections which Mr. E. A. Freeman has here given us of John Richard Green. These recollections go back to an early date, when "Johnny Green" was a clever little boy at Magdalen College School. Mr. Freeman brings out with characteristic force the municipal side of his friend's habits of thought. He was eminently a citizen of Oxford, to whom the University was an upstart and an intruder. And this same way of regarding history he retained more or less throughout life. It is a most able and sympathetic account of Green's character and work that we have in this article. Mr. J. Scott Keltie's Essay on "Some Characteristics of Mr. Green's Histories" is an appropriate pendant to it. The first article in the number is one which, though dealing with a professional subject, "The Relation of Drugs to Medicine," is so written that a non-professional writer can appreciate it. We are not sure that the writer does not exaggerate the decline of the curative use of drugs. The number of new preparations is something enormous, and must tax the business aptitude of the retailers to keep pace with it. The enormous use of bromide of potassium, to take but one instance, is by itself a most important matter. Mr. R. Heath's "Religion of the Paris Ouvrier" is a remarkable instance of the wider views of theology which now find entrance at least, if not acceptance, in orthodox circles. French Protestantism—which, by the way, in its outward form closely resembles English Congregationalism—is pronounced wholly unfit to deal with the difficult problem of the Parisian working-man. The analogy between his republican faith and the dominant ideas of Catholicism is very well drawn out in this essay. The valuable "Discovery of Pithom Succoth" is made the subject of another article; and we have also the programme of the Liberation Society, which is to attack in succession the Scotch, the Welsh, and the English Establishments. The other contents of this excellent number are "The Classification of Ideas," "The Tao Teh King," and a "Political Survey of the Quarter," with the customary review of contemporary literature.

Fairs, Past and Present. By Cornelius Walford. (Elliot Stock).—In this volume, the paper and printing of which are appropriately suggestive of antiquity, Mr. Walford has collected a vast amount of curious information. He gives us a chapter about the origin of fairs, suggesting several causes, and probably coming very near the truth when he says that "fairs took their origin in passing events, without any special authority, and that upon later occasions charters were obtained." "Early Regulations concerning Fairs" supply the subject of another chapter. (Why, by the way, the eccentricity of "Magna Carter"?) Then we have "Legislation for Fairs;" then "Modern Legislation;" and then, very properly, as things of the kind are best seen in the concrete, long accounts of the two chief fairs in England, or rather of what used to be the two chief fairs, Sturbridge and Bartholomew. Sturbridge fair still exists, though but the shadow of its former self. Bartholomew has passed away altogether; except, indeed, that the Rector of St. Bartholomew the Great still receives the sum of 8s. 6d. for a proclamation which no longer takes place. Of all the curiosities which a book like this contains, nothing is more interesting than the lists of the prices. Here are some, for articles purchased at Sturbridge Fair in 1577 for the household of Lord North:—"A feather-bed, 19s.; a jack (presumably a meat-jack), 2s. 2d.; 20 lb. of 'raisins,' 5s.; 20 lb. of 'corants,' 7s. 6d." Gunpowder was, it seems, about a shilling a pound, and sugar rather more.

POETRY.—Julian the Apostate. By Christopher James Riethmüller. (Virtue and Co.).—Mr. Riethmüller has not been excessive in his demands upon the attention of the public. It is, we think, more than twenty years since he published his poem of Teuton. This drama of Julian the Apostate has, indeed, less need than most poetry of the day to excuse its appearance. It is really a work of solid merit. In the first place, it is distinctly readable, a quality which, as far as our experience goes, dramatic poetry commonly lacks. It represents a careful study of authorities, and a vivid conception of the time. There is, indeed, little of the true dramatic character in the play. There is no central point of interest in it, though such a point is certainly suggested by the subject, in the last struggle between Paganism and Christianity. It is tolerably clear, indeed, that with all his respectable literary power, Mr. Riethmüller is somewhat wanting in force. When the occasion seems to invite it, he fails to rise to the expected height. The death of Julian, for instance, is a scene which affords scope for the exercise of great powers, if such powers exist. Our author is distinctly tame, when he comes to it. Even the famous

"Galilean, thou hast conquered!" with a strange lack of dramatic feeling, he puts into the mouth of a minor character, making it the last and, we venture to say, the worst line in the whole play:—

"The cause is lost. The Galilean has conquered."

Generally, Mr. Riethmüller's verse, though wanting in variety of pause, and never rising to any great height, is evenly good. Here is a specimen of it, from the dialogue in which Basil (the Great) and Gregory Nazianzen discourse of the dead Emperor. Basil speaks:—

"I loved this Julian.
He was the friend and comrade of my youth,
As you were, Gregory. I have not forgotten
The happy home at Athens, the bright hopes,
The common studies, pleasures, fancies, thoughts,
And all the promise of our golden morn;
And this sad ending of a tragic story
Fills me with deepest sorrow. That a man
So gifted, and so raised above his fellows,
Endowed with almost every human virtue,
Should so have missed his way, and spent his force
On a vain struggle against right and truth,
Is to my mind a source of genuine pity,
More doleful and pathetic than the tale
Of Œdipus and all his fated line."

—Faith, and other Poems. By James Warlow. (Longman).—Mr. Warlow writes his Faith somewhat after the manner of Thomas Campbell's "Pleasures of Hope." Unfortunately, there is a difference. We can say nothing more in favour of his verse than that it rhymes and scans, one or two exceptions being allowed for, as, for instance,—

"Intelligence Eternal, pervading,"

where we find that the emphasis has to be put on the "ing" of the last word, making it rhyme with "thing" in the next line. The language is not always very happy. A knife may possibly be said to "drink," but hardly to "sip" the life-blood of a victim, even though "sips" is a convenient assonance to "lips." As to the matter, there is little to be said. Mr. Warlow is very severe upon priests in general, and Rome in particular. He does not think much better of any Protestant sects. "For," as he poetically puts it,—

"Thousands who themselves Christ's followers call
Are blind idolaters, in Satan's thrall."

Mr. Warlow's creed is expressed by a line which is as good as any that we can find in his volume:—

"Have faith, be just, and Heav'n will ask no more!"

—The True and Romantic Story of Colonel and Mrs. Hutchinson. By J. Antisell Allen. (Elliot Stock).—Mr. Allen has some talent for verse-writing, but does not display it to the best advantage in the form which he has chosen for his present work. There is not a single thing in this somewhat tedious drama which might not have been put without difficulty in the much more pleasing shape of a narrative. The story of John Hutchinson's sudden passion for Lucy Apeley, a passion first conceived before he had seen her, and developed by her presence, is as good a subject as could be found for an "idyll," but we see nothing specially dramatic about it. And the interruptions of "First Gentleman" and "Second Gentleman," which the dramatic form suggests, if it does not necessitate, are distinctly tedious. Here are a few lines of Mr. Allen's verse:—

"My heart and all my pulses throb with joy,
And, oh! to think such love was in reserve,
When I stood trembling on the very verge
Of that deep, yawning chasm, where buried lie
Such myriad bankrupt hopes; and shuddering looked Into its yawning depths, nor could withdraw My fascinated gaze; and all things looked Wintry, and ghast, and horrible; but now
The sun is on the hill-tops of my soul,
And perfumed Spring, vocal with song, flower-crowned,
Enfolds the radiant world for evermore!"

—Hesperus, Rhythm and Rhyme. By E. W. Edmonds. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.).—Mr. Edmonds needs to learn much, in the matter both of rhythm and of grammar, not to speak of thought, before he can write verse:—

"An old strain
Will through my silent chamber steal,
And rain down harmonies on my lone meal."

"She says she has forgotten quite, and it must be a great mistake, So hideous an object ne'er one thought from her could scarcely take,"

are about as clumsy expressions as are often to be found. The best thing in the volume is "Our Elsie;" perhaps the worst, "The Foundering of the 'Cyprian,'" where a really tragic story is utterly spoilt by the feebleness of the telling.—The Empress Charlotte, and other Poems. By Peter Southmead Glubb, B.D. (London Literary Society). "The profits arising from the sale of these poems are devoted to charity." On the strength of this statement, we shall not be doing wrong if we wish the volume a success vastly beyond its merits.

THEOLOGY.—Sermons Preached in the Chapel of Harrow School, and Elsewhere. By the late Rev. T. H. Steel, M.A. With a Prefatory Memoir by Henry Nettleship, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.).—Mr. Steel, after highly distinguishing himself at Cambridge (he was Second Classic and Twentieth Wrangler), was content to give up his life to Harrow School. He had come near to being elected at King Edward's School, Birmingham (when Dr. Prince Lee was chosen). In 1834 he went, by the invitation of Dr. Wordsworth, to Harrow. Afterwards came an interval (1843-1849) of parochial work, into which he threw himself with characteristic energy; then a return to Harrow, where he continued till within six months of his death. The two-and-twenty sermons here published strike us as being of considerable value. "His Christianity," says a friend who knew him well, "seemed to be drawn direct from the New Testament, restrained by the trammels of no ecclesiastical school." Accordingly, we find that a characteristic of his teaching is its simplicity and distinctness, the thoroughly natural character of its appeals and arguments. Another noteworthy feature in them is the happy illustrations from natural phenomena. Here is a specimen of his manner, an extract from a peculiarly happy discourse on "Gathering up the Fragments":—"See, too, here, as in an allegory, that the sun himself, no unworthy symbol of God's genial providence, rejoiceth to typify the same universal law. See how, as he sinks to rest when the storm is over, and the opening clouds suffer at last his level rule of streaming light to struggle forth, and his rays are broken and reflected by their thousand varying surfaces, see how he gathers up the fragments, as it were, and decks with them, as with purple and gold, the gorgeous tissue of the pavilion in which he seems to be sinking to repose; or, shooting forth across the whole expanse of heaven, pieces together in a more regular order the broken hues, and sets his painted bow in the dark background of the eastern sky!" "Our Treatment of Strangers" is a specially good sermon, and one that should have spoken very directly to the hearts of those to whom it was addressed.—The Calling of a Christian Woman. By Morgan Dix, S.T.D. (Appleton and Co., New York.)—Lectures delivered last March, that have already reached a fourth edition, come anyhow with the recommendation of success. Nor in this instance do we wonder at the success. These are direct, plain-spoken appeals to the consciences of men and women, such appeals as are always listened to not only with respect, but with a certain enthusiasm of attention. Antioch thronged the Church when Chrysostom lashed its popular vices, and always listened, if it did not always reform. So it is in London; so it is also, it would seem, in New York. In his fifth lecture, Dr. Dix touches on the painful subject of divorce, as it is now in the United States. In New York, it would seem, divorce a vinculo can be granted only for the cause of adultery; but then divorces and remarriages in other States, where the law is greatly relaxed, hold good in New York; and in some of the New England States, there are nine sufficient causes. The sixth is entitled "A Mission for Women," and is a practical and, for the most part, we think, a true statement of the situation. We would fain hope, however, that the movement for the advance of women is not so closely connected as Dr. Dix thinks with unbelief.—Are Miracles Credible? By the Rev. John James Lias, M.A., and Does Science Aid Faith? by the Right Rev. Bishop Cotterill, both published by Hodder and Stoughton, are two volumes of a new series of "The Theological Library," which is to include both apologetics and expository divinity. Mr. Lias's is in particular a calm and reasonable statement of the believer's case. With regard to the miracles of the sun standing still and the shadow returning on the dial, he is inclined, we gather, to get rid of them, though he holds that they were not impossible. His chapter on "How Do We Distinguish False or Supposed Miracles from the True?" is one of the best in the book. We find nothing sophistical in it. He acknowledges difficulties, and grapples with them to the best of his power. He allows, for instance, that the miracles at the tomb of the Abbé Paris are, in one sense, just in the same category as the Gospel miracles, as having been wrought, not like mediæval miracles in confirmation of an established system, but on behalf of a persecuted sect. Generally, we may say, that this new series has made a good beginning.—We have also received the first volume of the series of Present-Day Tracts, by Various Writers (Religious Tract Society), the subject of the six tracts contained in it being "Christianity and Miracles at the Present Day," by Principal Cairns; "Christ, the Central Evidence of Christianity," and "The Success of Christianity," by the same author; "The Historical Evidences of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ," "The Existence and Character of God," by the Rev. Prebendary Row; and "Christianity and the Life that Now Is," by the Rev. W. G. Blaikie, D.D.—Christianity and Common-sense, by a Barrister (Chapman and Hall), an effort to substitute Theism for Revealed Religion; Priestcraft and Progress, by Stewart D. Headlam, B.A. (John Hodges), a second edition; The Reasonableness of Christianity, by William M. Metcalfe (Alexander Gardner, Paisley and London); The Doctrine of Probation Examined, by C. H. Emerson, D.D. (Universalist Publishing House, Boston), a statement of the Universalist argument; The Two Gospels, by W. T. Lee (City of London Publishing Company); Biblical Theology of the New Testament, by Dr. Bernhard Weiss, second volume (T. and T. Clark); The Private Devotions of Lancelot Andrews, D.D., edited and revised by Edmund Venables, M.A. (Suttaby and Co.); and Prayers for Public Schools, by the Rev. John Fowler, M.A., a second edition, abridged (Skeffington and Son).

We have received a second edition, "corrected, revised, and enlarged," of the Highland Sportsman. By Robert Hall. (John Menzies, Edinburgh.)—There is plenty of useful information in the book. The name and extent of the chief shootings and fishings in the Highlands are given; and with these, the rent. So far, the reader will be safe; but when he comes to ask what he will get for his money, it behoves him to be cautious. The description of the obtainable sport seems to us, in one or two of the cases where from personal knowledge we can check it, to be somewhat highly coloured.—The Army and Navy Calendar, 1883-4 (W. H. Allen and Co.), gives in a compendious form, and at a very low price, the usual information about the Army, Navy, Militia, and the Volunteers.

SPECTACLES v. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have
is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 3 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age
right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland,

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Comte de Chambord died yesterday, at the age of sixty-three. He has been a Pretender all his life, and yet never a Pretender at all in the English acceptance of the word,—unless his acceptance of the title of "King" in 1871 made him one. A more dignified spectator of political struggles never existed. He seemed to think himself necessary to France, and yet to feel quite sure that France was absolutely unconscious of her own need of him. "My personality is nothing," he said, "my principle is everything;" and his principle was that he would not give up a flag to gain a crown. There is something fascinating in the spectacle of so much disinterestedness at the heart of so much dignity. And we believe that in losing the Comte de Chambord, Europe has lost a kind of ideal,—the ideal character of that sort which, with an inordinate respect for its own hereditary position, combines the most absolute freedom from fussiness, and perfect indifference to power.

On August 15th the French received a second severe check in their advance on Hanoi, and have been further annoyed by the overflow of the Red River, which has inundated the country which they occupied. It seems clear that the Anamese troops against which they fight are very good, and are reinforced from China. The French will succeed, of course, in time, if they choose to make the requisite sacrifices. But these sacrifices are severe, and even severer in Europe than they are in the East.

Prince Bismarck's semi-official organ,—as it is called,—the Nord Deutsche Gazette, has given Europe a fright this week, by a manifesto against the anti-German tone of the French Press, and a warning that such displays of temper in France, if not controlled, will sooner or later lead to war. The truth seems to be that the better organs of the French Press have not been at all bitterly anti-German, but that a few of the less weighty papers have been indulging in anti-German diatribes, especially a little paper recently set up expressly to attack Germany, which the new Press law in France did not permit the Government at once to suppress. Whether the Nord Deutsche Gazette's article is really due to a wish to prevent international quarrelling, or is the kind of warning which the wolf gave to the lamb that was drinking beneath him in the same river, is not at present very clear. But Germany cannot really wish to kindle a war, for the excellent reason that such a war, unless positively forced upon Germany, would be so unpopular in Germany, that even brilliant results might be fatal to Prince Bismarck's power there. Doubtless, there is some reason for the tone taken by the Nord Deutsche Gazette, but whether that reason be found in domestic policy or foreign policy,—we suspect, the latter,—is a problem that will for some time remain unsolved.

Further intelligence from Madagascar proves that the death of Consul Pakenham was in no way due to the high-handed proceedings of Admiral Pierre. The Consul was already dying and unconscious when the French orders were issued, and whatever they may have been, his death had nothing to do with them. On the other hand, the mode of dealing with Mr. Shaw, the Missionary, was certainly very high-handed, and, in all probability, very unnecessary. Still, the French dealt with him, even if they did exceed their rights, only as many Englishmen urged the Government to deal with M. de Lesseps at the time when he put obstacles in the way of our occupation of the Suez Canal. And it would be very unwise and imprudent for us to take a hectoring and arrogant tone in relation to Mr. Shaw's case, until we know exactly both how he is treated, and what is the character of the asserted evidence against him. Probably he has been unjustly imprisoned, but we must not always begin with assuming that Englishmen can do no wrong. The attempts to badger the Government into premature protest are a mistake. Lord Palmerston's example has done us all harm, in dealing with complications of this kind. None the less, we note with great pleasure Mr. Gladstone's statement on Thursday night, that the French Government "will do everything in their power to put an end to this incident,"—which we interpret to mean that they will order Mr. Shaw's release. Nothing could illustrate better the wisdom of the reticence of Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. Healy has been the political prize-fighter of the week, and some of his blows have certainly been unworthy of any fair pugilist. Thus on Thursday week, he dragged into his speech an accusation against the wife of a Sub-Inspector of Constabulary, which came to this,—that she had lived with her husband before she had been married to him, an attack on a woman quite unexampled in the House of Commons, and which Mr. Trevelyan did not characterise with more vehement censure than it deserved. On Saturday last, Mr. Healy revenged himself on Mr. Trevelyan for the scornful condemnation passed on this unparalleled intrusion into private life, by declaring that if the Irish Constabulary were to return to the practices of Cromwell's time, and to spit babies on their bayonets, the Chief Secretary would have got up and defended the practice with just as much aplomb as he had shown in defending the other abuses of the Irish Constabulary. "The Irish Members," said Mr. Healy, "were the exponents of the state of feeling which existed in Ireland, and which inspired the great mass of the people of Ireland with hatred and contempt of her Majesty's Government."

This outrageous speech of Mr. Healy's brought up Mr. Gladstone, who, in words of great eloquence, dignity, and even pathos, pointed out the certain tendency of such language to inflame every feeling of antipathy which exists between England and Ireland to the highest point, without answering any conceivable political purpose or carrying any Irish end. Since it had been the duty of the present Government to deal with Ireland, it had been their object to do everything and to say everything which tended to mitigate, and if possible extinguish, national hatreds. "We have not been slow," said Mr. Gladstone, "to place ourselves in conflict with English prejudices when we believed it to be in our power to minister to this sacred work." If justice ought to be administered in Ireland, words ought not to be used which tend to render the administration of true justice almost impossible. If for the purpose of detecting crime, the evidence of criminals is ever to be used,—and it would be impossible to punish crime without it,—these vehement attacks on all who use the evidence of criminals are as mischievous as they are unreasonable. Mr. Healy's exultation that none but criminals could be got to give evidence against crime, though not justified by the facts, was an exultation that directly tended to produce reluctance to assist the ends of justice, and therefore rendered the administration of justice more and more difficult. Ireland had been restored to peace and order by the courage and laborious efforts of a class of men whose patriotism could hardly be exaggerated; and even if they had made occasional slips in that difficult duty, they would be entitled to forbearance and respect. Mr. Gladstone lamented these fierce and passionate diatribes, not because they hurt the Government, but because they retarded or prevented the great work in Ireland for which the Government had so earnestly laboured. His own personal interest in this question could only be one of short duration,—a remark cheered by Mr. Biggar, with his usual delicacy of feeling,—but if he were to speak for the last time in that House, he would use the language not of rebuke, but of appeal to honourable Members to question their own consciences whether they really thought it incumbent on them to use deliberately this inflammatory language, and so to retard as long as it was in their power, or even to prevent, the healing of the discords in the United Kingdom.

To this eloquent and most powerful appeal, which produced the profoundest impression on the House of Commons, the Irish Extremists returned an obstinate and even sulky “non possumus.” War between England and Ireland, they said, was only prevented by physical force, and they were determined to express in their speeches the internecine hostility, which Ireland profoundly felt. That was Mr. Healy’s own answer, all the more remarkable for the expression of personal admiration for Mr. Gladstone with which he prefaced it. It is a very strange answer. If the Irish people and the Irish Members feel all this loathing for England, and if they confess at the same time that they have no power to put an end to the connection, their plain duty is not to express a loathing which only aggravates the situation. Does a sensible prisoner continue to express his loathing for the power which took him prisoner? We confess that we do not believe the Irish hatred to be altogether serious. It is dramatic hatred, hatred at which the Irish enjoy playing, and playing with childish effusion, but it is not altogether either the ruling passion, or a passion founded on that serious conviction, which they profess it to be.

On the motion for the second reading of the Appropriation Bill on Tuesday, Sir Stafford Northcote braced himself up to a general review of the Session, which was not, however, a striking performance. He quizzed the Government for having carried only three out of eleven measures contemplated in the Queen’s Speech,—the real proportion, as Mr. Gladstone showed, was five out of thirteen,—made some rather judicious remarks on the excessive competition amongst Departments for the display of legislative energy, and its disastrous result in always encumbering the House of Commons with a number of Bills which it proves necessary to withdraw,—so that all the time spent upon them is wasted,—and repeated the old remarks on the supererogatory labour of the Affirmation Bill. He passed over the subject of Ireland,—a great implied tribute to the success of the Government there,—and then discoursed on the anxieties concerning Egypt, concerning the Suez Canal, concerning South Africa, concerning Madagascar, and concerning India, amidst which the House was about to separate.

Mr. Gladstone, after correcting Sir Stafford Northcote’s calculations as to the numbers of the proposed, the successful, and the abandoned measures of the Government, and insisting that, in spite of the difficulties of the Session, the legislative results were certainly above the average of the last fifty years, pointed out once more, as regards the Affirmation Bill, that the Government had no choice but to submit to the House of Commons the only remedy which they could approve for the very unpleasant position in which the House was placed by its refusal to allow a regularly-elected Member of Parliament to take his seat in the manner prescribed by law. Mr. Gladstone spoke of the struggle between the House of Commons and the country “as a great and serious struggle, in which every man knows which party is finally to be the winner;” and added, every man knows that the struggle will end “in the defeat of the vote which has been given.” He pointed out that the loss of four nights on that debate proved how frightfully the measure of Parliamentary talk had increased since the time when the admission of the Jews to Parliament was settled in a single night. Mr. Gladstone insisted on the principle of Grand Committees as a success, and predicted that it was by the skilful use of this principle that the House of Commons would recover its legislative efficiency. He then followed Sir Stafford Northcote into a review of the foreign policy of the Government, contending that though we are not without anxieties, we are far freer from anxieties than we were when the Conservative Government handed over the reins of office; and concluded with a hearty eulogy on the policy of Lord Ripon in India, in spite of the unpopularity which one of his proposed measures has met with among Anglo-Indians in India.

Another enthusiastic meeting of Anglo-Indians was held in Calcutta on Thursday to protest against the Ilbert Bill, in which the speech of Mr. Atkins, Secretary of the Railway Servants’ Association, who spoke for the railway employés in various parts of India, was the most striking feature. The Government at home do not seem to realise sufficiently that our position in India is utterly indefensible except on the principle that, at the present time at all events, the English race is centuries in advance of the races of Hindustan, and that if that assumption be true, it involves some perfectly inevitable corollaries,—such as this, that a European’s honour, if placed at the mercy of native witnesses, without the guarantee of a European Magistrate for the justice of the sentence, may very often be in extreme danger. The Europeans acknowledge clearly enough the mischief of withdrawing the cases in which Europeans are implicated from the jurisdiction of all the Native Judges. Of course, it often practically deprives natives who cannot find the means for a prosecution at a distance, of their remedy against European injustice. But you cannot remedy that evil without introducing a corresponding evil, and one that may eventually, as the European railway servants in India feel, risk our empire altogether by rendering Anglo-Indians unwilling to take service in India. We hope Lord Ripon will consider frankly this danger, and introduce such modifications as may satisfy the more moderate Europeans of their safety.

On Friday week, the House of Lords threw out the Cruelty to Animals Amendment Act Bill, which would have put an end to the cruel and completely unsportsmanlike pigeon matches by which the country has been disgusted, rejecting it by a majority of 30 against 17. In the House of Commons, it had been carried by a majority of 155. But in the Peers there was a good muster of young men of no note, who care a good deal more for the amusements of the country than they do for its duties. Lord Granville and the Duke of Argyll both supported Lord Balfour of Burleigh in defending the Bill, as one aimed at a sport altogether ignoble,—indeed, the attractiveness of it consists chiefly in the betting to which it gives rise, and the little skill which it requires,—and only Lord Redesdale amongst the Peers of weight opposed it. The real argument in favour of the Bill is, as Lord Granville said, just the same as the real argument against cock-fighting, which has been put down in England,—that it degrades those who take part in it, and gives rise to all sorts of cruelty in order to bias the direction of the pigeon’s flight. The House of Lords however, is very Conservative of low amusements, and not at all anxious to improve the tone of English recreation. The Prince of Wales might, perhaps, have saved the Bill; but, unfortunately, he did not intervene.

The House of Lords hardly ever acted worse on a comparatively trivial occasion than in rejecting the Irish Registration Bill, for no reason at all, except that the Irish Home-rule party liked it. The Bill does nothing except remedy two gross injustices, by which in England we are not affected with regard to the mode in which the list of electors is made up, and not a single Peer who opposed the Bill found anything to say against its principle. It is, indeed, impossible to pretend that an elector ought to be disqualified simply because some one takes an arbitrary objection to his name, for which objection he can give no prima facie reason, just at a moment when, either through indisposition or more important professional engagements, the voter whose name is objected to is quite unable to attend personally and refute the objection. Yet this is the law in Ireland, and to remedy this monstrous injustice was the chief object of the Irish Registration Bill, which the Lords rejected on Tuesday by 52 votes against 32, after most convincing speeches from Lord Carlingford and Lord Fitzgerald in its favour. What the hostile Peers, headed by Lord Kilmorey, said, was that it would add to the influence of the Home-rule party in Ireland, which is possible enough. But if that be intrinsically objectionable, quite apart from the justice or injustice of the mode in which they are to obtain that influence, Lord Kilmorey and Lord Salisbury should introduce a measure striking off arbitrarily a number of persons otherwise fully entitled to the franchise, in order that they may diminish the influence of the Home-rulers in Ireland, and not effect their purpose by this shabby, indirect trick. The majority in the Lords do not, unfortunately, object to trickiness. Mr. Gladstone, in the House of Commons, expressed very strongly his sense of the injustice which the Peers had refused to remedy, and promised another Bill of the same kind an early place in the business of next Session, if it were not included in a general Reform Bill.

The Lords also threw out on Tuesday the Local Government (Scotland) Bill with more excuse, as Lord Balfour of Burleigh moved its rejection, and Scotch opinion seems to be by no means fully united in its favour. Lord Salisbury, however, cordially supported its rejection probably as another snub to the Government. He never misses an opportunity of rejecting in August any Bill whose loss the country at large will not, he thinks, be much disposed to resent. The Tramways and Public Companies (Ireland) Bill,—the Bill for assisting migration and emigration,—and the Labourers (Ireland) Bill, their Lordships did not venture to reject.

The House of Lords have passed the Bankruptcy Bill, after adopting only formal alterations suggested by the Lord Chancellor, but they did not do so without raising bitter complaint of the Government for its treatment of the Upper House, in which, of course, Lord Fortescue's wail was the shrillest of all. And doubtless it is very unfortunate that such a Bill as this should not have been thoroughly criticised by the legal Peers in the Upper House, who are some of the best draftsmen, as well as some of the best lawyers of their time. There is, however, no remedy that we can see while the Upper House contains so few men who represent either popular feeling or commercial experience. A Bill originated in the Upper House would never have pleased the Commons, and a Bill of this magnitude and difficulty could not well have been passed by the Commons in time to secure the advantage of the legal acumen of men like the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cairns, Lord Fitzgerald, Lord Blackburn, and Lord Bramwell.

The House of Commons agreed to that amendment of the Lords on the Agricultural Holdings Bill which extends the provision against compensating the tenant for improvements causing an increased return,—so far as the increase is really due to the intrinsic qualities of the soil,—to the boning, manuring, and other operations included in the third section of the schedule. But they disagreed with the amendment to the second clause, which would have had the effect of leaving in full force every agreement already in existence between landlord and tenant that the tenant should not be entitled to be compensated for any special class of his already effected improvements. To this the Commons demurred, although any valuable consideration given by the landlord would be taken into account under the Bill, as against the compensation for these improvements. Lord Salisbury, nevertheless, insisted on his amendment, though the Duke of Richmond and Gordon opposed him, and Lord Salisbury was only saved from defeat on an equal division by the rule of the House, which makes it necessary to reject a proposal on which the vote is even. When it was next proposed to carry Lord Salisbury's amendment substantively, an additional Tory vote was found, and it was carried by a majority of one. The Commons, of course, declined to defer to this majority of one, and we were not able before going to press to hear how the controversy was settled. Doubtless, Lord Salisbury has given way. He could hardly defeat such a measure with a majority of one only at his back, except at the cost of his whole influence with the country.

The discussion of the sentence of the court-martial on Commander Heron for failing in his duty in looking after the stores in the hulk which he commanded at Aberdeen—the 'Clyde'—came off on Monday, and the feeling of the House appeared to be very strong that the charges brought against Commander Heron by his subordinate,—the gunner whom the court-martial had sentenced to be dismissed and disgraced,—might very well prove not to have been sufficiently corroborated from unimpeachable sources to justify the sentence; and, at all events, that the finding of the court-martial and its justification ought to have been submitted to the legal advisers of the Admiralty for their opinion. And Mr. Gladstone accordingly, to the great satisfaction of the House, promised that the legal point at issue,—the question of the adequate corroboration of the charges brought by a man of no character, by other evidence of a trustworthy kind,—should be submitted to the revision of the legal advisers of the Admiralty. This is all for which the friends of Commander Heron have asked, and their request is a thoroughly reasonable one.

Murders of the deliberate kind appear to breed each other. Only last week we remarked on the singularly deliberate murder of his five children by the blacksmith Gouldstone at Walthamstow. On Sunday night, at Thornton Heath, Croydon, James Cole murdered his little son, three years old, by deliberately taking hold of his legs and dashing his head against the floor. The child lived until Monday morning, not apparently in a conscious state, and then died. The man was not under the influence of drink, but he has been repeatedly imprisoned before for violent assaults, and his wife and children seem to have felt the greatest fear of him. The evidence proved that Cole had been reading the story of the Walthamstow case all the Sunday, and had told his wife that he would settle his own children in the same way. Gloomy cruelty is infectious.

Baron Malortie, writing to Monday's Times, gives very strong support to the view of Dr. Mouat, which we reported last week, and to our own conjecture published six weeks ago, that the epidemic in Egypt is not Asiatic cholera. He quotes a letter from Dr. Abbate Pasha, the chief physician to the Khedive, in which the latter says that the epidemic is quite certainly not Asiatic cholera, but choleroïde, an endemic local disease presenting similar symptoms. The Khedive's physician scoffs at the notion of the disease being imported from India, and declares that he is preparing a memoir on it for the Medical profession.

King Charles of Roumania has been staying at Potsdam, and acting as sponsor to the second son of Prince and Princess William of Prussia, the great-grandson of the Emperor of Germany. The German Court has been making a great fuss about King Charles, as has also the Austrian Court about the King of Servia, who has been staying at Vienna. Evidently, the little Sovereigns of this part of the world are just now in request, for the Prince of Montenegro has been staying at Constantinople, where the Sultan appears to have done all in his power to reconcile to himself his ancient foe. The German Powers are anxious to secure their influence in the Valley of the Danube and the Balkans, and to counteract the supposed designs and intrigues of Russia. But whether Prince Nikita's interchange of courtesies with the Sultan is suggested by Russia or by Germany, it would at present be difficult to decide.

Two very well-earned political distinctions have been conferred this week by the Government. Sir Thomas Acland, M.P. for North Devon, has been made a Privy Councillor; and Mr. Farrer, the Permanent Secretary of the Board of Trade, has received a baronetcy. There is not in the whole Liberal Party a more wise, staunch, and thorough Liberal than the former,—a model for county Members, a landed proprietor who cares for his tenants as he cares for himself, a great squire who can understand Mr. Gladstone as only a squire who is as much an Oxford man as a squire ever can understand him. Mr. Farrer, or Sir T. H. Farrer, as he will now be, has managed a very complex department with consummate ability, and everything he has written has been marked with the same grasp and lucidity as his administration of the Department under his charge. He is, indeed, one of the best representatives in all the Government Departments, of that ability, energy, fidelity, and exact knowledge, to which the Empire really owes more than half the confidence and credit accorded to us in all portions of the globe.

The pension granted by the Government to Mr. Matthew Arnold for his services to English Literature will do them the highest credit in the eyes of all true lovers of literature. It is, however, only equal in amount to the pension awarded to Prince Lucien Bonaparte; and useful as Prince Lucien Bonaparte's philological services have been, they are a trifle to the services of certainly the second poet of our day.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE EFFERVESCENCE ON THE CONTINENT.

PRINCE BISMARCK is evidently so exultant over the political mistakes of the French Government, that he is warning France, with almost imprudent frankness, of the nature of those mistakes, even before, perhaps, it is quite too late for France to correct them. The article in the Nord Deutsche Gazette, which has caused such a sensation this week, against the anti-German spirit of the French Press, has been compared to the stream of water which the firemen apply to an incipient conflagration; but where there is no incipient conflagration to extinguish—and it is evident that in this case there was none—we must look for other reasons for turning on the stream. So far as we can judge, the anti-German excesses of the French Press have been limited to insignificant papers of no influence at all in France, which the present condition of the French law on the Press does not enable the Government to stop. Prince Bismarck knows this well enough, and does not direct his semi-official organ to scatter anxiety over Europe, only in the hope of bridling the licence of the least important of the French prints. Probably he thinks, as the Duc de Broglie evidently thinks, that France is now too completely committed to the false step she has taken in Anam and in Madagascar—to say nothing of her cumbersome engagements in Tunis—to take warning effectually by any shock which he may inflict on France; and, so thinking, he is well pleased to give a new stimulus to the general drift of his diplomacy in South-Eastern Europe, by exhibiting somewhat ostentatiously to the whole Continent the helplessness and isolation of his former foe. That he really contemplates striking a fresh blow at France, we should be very slow indeed to believe. The German people resent nothing more gravely than the great sacrifices which a mobilisation of their Army must entail upon them; and the mobilisation of the Army for a plainly aggressive war would be a step which even Prince Bismarck would hardly dare to take. But, no doubt, he is watching with intense satisfaction the growing impression in Europe that in the German Foreign Office is the directing brain of European diplomacy; and it may very well facilitate his plans for the centralisation of all its threads in Berlin, to give Europe this unexpected thrill through the medium of the inspired Press. There are rumours that General Thibaudin, whose very name is abhorrent to the Germans, since they accuse him of violating his parole in the Franco-German war, is talking of mobilising a corps on the eastern frontier of France, as a sort of test of the efficiency of the Army organisation. This proposal is, of course, especially offensive to Germany. It looks like a kind of tentative challenge; and to say the very least, it would be a sign of growing self-confidence and self-reliance in France. Now, Germany does not approve of such signs from France, and the cold-water which she throws is not meant to reduce inflammatory symptoms, but to extinguish any reviving symptoms of hope and self-respect. Prince Bismarck has just been convincing King Charles of Roumania and the King of Serbia that if they want to prosper, they must cultivate the good-will of the German Powers, fraternise with Austria, and testify their loyalty to Berlin. The success of this policy would be more or less endangered by anything like the growth of a belief that France is recovering her old position. And especially would the growth of such an impression at St. Petersburg, be annoying and embarrassing to Prince Bismarck. Accordingly, he finds it timely to administer a sudden and humiliating snub to the self-esteem of the French Government. He is aware that at present there are little difficulties with England in relation to Madagascar, to say nothing of the permanent divergence of view with regard to Egypt, and that these difficulties make France more than usually reluctant to take needless offence elsewhere. Then there is this unlucky policy in Anam, where France is engaged with a considerable Power, behind which stands a very formidable Power. The latest news shows that the French are not prospering in their operations at Hanoi, and that if they are to succeed in what they are attempting there, they must despatch very considerable reinforcements,—no one knows how many, if China should once openly avow her hostility. All this Prince Bismarck knows, and he could hardly have chosen a safer moment for a very sharp snub to France. The hands of France are, as it were, tied; and Prince Bismarck is very conscious that if he can make all Europe feel how completely tied they are, he will prosper in his diplomacy beyond all that he has yet effected.

For our own parts, we are not quite sure that Prince Bismarck has not played his last card too soon. We have no very high opinion of the sagacity of the present French Government, but M. Jules Ferry is an acute man, and whether M. Challemel-Lacour is so or not, M. Ferry will feel the significance of this move of Prince Bismarck's, and if he is wise he will profit by it. Perhaps we may have already had a foretaste of the result, in the very satisfactory assurances mentioned by Mr. Gladstone on Thursday night in relation to Admiral Pierre's high-handed dealings with Mr. Shaw. That is, no doubt, a small matter, but a straw will show how the wind blows, and if the wind blows strongly from the quarter from which, as we hope, it is now blowing in France, we shall see more important results yet of Prince Bismarck's warning. If M. Jules Ferry is a really wise statesman, he will do more than release Mr. Shaw, and draw the ties to England closer in every other possible way. He will insist on settling all this foolish business in Anam, even at some little sacrifice to French dignity, and in a way that is absolutely satisfactory to China, and on drawing out of all other disagreeable complications in the East as fast as possible. As for Madagascar, he will give up all idea of further conquest there, and make a treaty of peace with the Hovas, on terms as satisfactory as possible to the French. And then he will let the world know that he is not going to coquette any more with a policy of colonial conquest—which is not, as we believe, half as flattering to French vanity as the statesmen who planned it suppose,—but to give himself heartily to the policy of strengthening in every way the French Administration, uniting, so far as it is possible, all republican parties, improving his relations with all foreign Powers, and indicating in every possible way that France is not disposed to sacrifice a tittle of French independence and influence in Europe, for a policy of glitter and tinsel in the East. This is the drift of the comments in the shrewdest of all the French journals, and we are persuaded that it is the true lesson of the situation. As for the ferment among the smaller Powers in the Balkan, it is interesting enough to these smaller Powers themselves, and may betoken to some extent the extension of German influence,—an influence which we do not grudge, except so far as it encourages Austria in a policy which must be fatal to the independence of the Slavonic populations. But Charles of Roumania and the King of Serbia cannot threaten France; and the more steadily France holds her own in Western Europe, the more confident will the smaller States of the Balkan peninsula be in their hope of playing off the influence of Russia against the influence of Austria. The paralysis of France means the paralysis of Russia. And the paralysis of Russia would have a very unsatisfactory effect on the ambitious designs of Austria in the South-east of Europe. All that, however, does not concern France directly. What does concern her directly is to make it inexpedient and even dangerous for Prince Bismarck to threaten her openly in this humiliating fashion. For that purpose, she must surrender some of her very questionable designs in the East, and come to a cordial understanding with England on the question of Egypt,—a matter not at all difficult while Mr. Gladstone's Government remains in power. For our own parts, we hope that Prince Bismarck's warning may not be lost, and that it may have the very salutary effect which he least wishes,—that of inducing France to exchange a weak and showy policy, for a policy of calm concentration and dignified reserve.

THE COMTE DE CHAMBORD.

THE death of the Comte de Chambord is an event which has more than one kind of interest. It is least interesting, probably, from the political point of view. No doubt, it may be seen at some future day to have been important even in this way, but there is nothing to suggest any such idea at present. The Count's own life, again, uneventful as it has been for many years, is still linked with European affairs during a very eventful period, and in this way a biographer might find his materials more fruitful than he had at first thought them. The Prince, who has been the consistent enemy of an Empire, a Monarchy, and two Republics, has sustained—we can hardly say played—a part which is associated with history, though it has not made it. It is in another aspect, however, that we propose to view the Comte de Chambord to-day. He has been the representative of more than the French Monarchy, of more than the principle of Legitimacy. He has been, in a strangely typical way, the representative of lost causes generally. Causes become lost because they are embodied in men like the Comte de Chambord; yet even in becoming lost they derive from the men in whom they are embodied a certain dignity, which redeems them from the contempt with which the world commonly visits failure. In itself, what can be more foolish than the theory of a genuine French Legitimist? To begin with, he believes in a doctrine which goes against all history, which is proscribed by his own infallible Church, and is utterly incapable of any philosophical justification. The Divine Right of Kings is open to every one of these objections; yet a French Legitimist swallows them without so much as a change of countenance. Not only does he swallow them himself, but he gravely offers the dose to others. In a sceptical age, and in the most sceptical of countries, he expects that men will ignore reason, experience, and common-sense, and accept the lineal descendant of the Bourbons as the divinely appointed instrument, whether of blessing or chastisement. The more facts seem to make against his view, the more firmly he clings to it. The French people go on supplying him with conclusive evidence that they prefer any Government that can be named to a Government of the only type that he holds to be enduring, but from each fresh proof he seems to derive additional strength to resist conviction. It is no easy matter to make such a party as this respectable, but the Comte de Chambord has succeeded in doing it.

In the first place, he has been entirely free from that political fussiness which is often the characteristic of pretenders, and oftener still of those over whom pretenders exercise authority. There is nothing to show that the Count has ever been mixed up in any Legitimist conspiracy, that he has ever meditated any attack upon the powers that be, or regarded the Republic as an adversary, except in that general sense in which a good man views with disapproval the success of what he esteems wickedness. He has accepted without question the logic of facts. Other men rule where his ancestors once ruled; other ideas prevail where a Monarchical sentiment scarcely inferior to that which animated the subjects of the Pharaohs once held sway. The Comte de Chambord has never pretended to question the decrees of Providence; he has seen his country accept in turn a Constitutional Monarchy, a Democratic Empire, and a Republic which is Conservative one day and Radical the next, and he has bowed his head as meekly as though he were witnessing an earthquake or a cyclone. You may call it fatalism, if you like, but it is impossible not to recognise that it is a fatalism which is not without a majesty of its own. He whom it influences does not question the designs of the Almighty, nor fancy himself wiser than Omniscience. It may be in the purpose of God that evil shall be permitted to triumph, and, if so, he will not be found fighting against God. But, on the other hand, he does not persuade himself that he is in any way necessary to the accomplishment of the Divine ends. He has none of that feeling that he is in some way necessary to Providence which so often tempts men to do things which they think wholly wrong or only half right, because they cannot bear to see them done without them. The man who is on the side of good must often be content to be defeated, and to find himself sent to the rear as a prisoner, unable to help himself or others. But if that is his lot, he must bear it patiently, and not offer to change sides and fight in the ranks of those who were till yesterday his enemies, lest he should be condemned to inaction, and see the world go on without his having any hand in its movements. The Comte de Chambord understood all this to perfection. He saw that his credit, if not his strength, was to sit still; and he accepted the part without a murmur.

No doubt, the qualities which thus make a lost cause respectable go far, at the same time, to make it a lost cause. Men who are to bend events to their will must know how to be bent in their turn. They must be free from that majestic indifference which regards poverty as preferable to riches, unless those riches be gained and spent in one particular way. If they are fatalists, it must only be in the sense of believing that Heaven helps those who help themselves, and of resolving that they, at least, will not show themselves undeserving of Heaven's aid. The Comte Chambord had no such fancies as this. If France had come to his feet, he would not have spurned her from him, but he would give no sign that could be construed into an indication that he wished or expected to see her there. If she stayed away, the loss would be hers, not his; and if she came, the gain would be divided on the same principle. A cause which is thus officered very soon drops out of the race. At least once since the fall of the Empire the French nation might have been persuaded, without much difficulty, to give Royalty another trial. That they did not do so, was wholly due to the peculiar qualities of Royalty's representative. Even the French Royalists wanted a King who would move with the times, and they naturally asked for some evidence that he had moved with them up till then. No such evidence was forthcoming,—rather evidence of the most convincing kind in the other direction. What the Comte de Chambord had been, that he still was, and he scorned to leave this fact in any uncertainty. The acceptance by the French people of the White Flag, and of all that the White Flag symbolised, was the only condition on which he would mount the throne. Many pretenders would have surrendered the form, and trusted to fortune to preserve them the substance. The Comte de Chambord had more regard for his own character. Unless he could be sure of the form, he preferred to forego the substance.

Now that he is dead, who is there in Europe of whom such things can be said? Legitimacy has no longer any field left to it in which to move with propriety. Those who have hitherto called themselves Legitimists will still be an element in French politics; they may even be an element of more practical weight than they have yet been. But it will not be as Legitimists. They will now be merged under the general head of "Royalists," and Royalists who look to the Comte de Paris as their chief will have little in common with the party which saw its highest ideal of Kingship realised in the Comte de Chambord. The cause disappears from this moment, whatever may be the destiny of those who have hitherto defended it. It disappears, too, in precisely the manner in which all who have a tenderness for lost causes would have liked to see it disappear. The death-scene at Frohsdorf suggests no sense of failure, because failure presupposes effort. It suggests the passing of an idea, not any inability on the part of man to give that idea expression. But for the Comte de Chambord, Legitimacy might have faded away into Constitutional Kingship. He has taken care that it shall vanish like the setting sun of the tropics, with no interlude of twilight to mark the transition from the past to the present.

THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE SESSION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE did not make much of his onslaught on the Government on Tuesday for the waste of the Session. A vast deal of time has, no doubt, been wasted this Session, but by the House, and not by the Government. The House wasted a fortnight on the debate on the Address, for which a single night would have been ample; and another fortnight,—so far as regards Government nights,—on the Affirmation Bill, for which, considering the reiterated previous debates, a single night would have been more than ample. Again, the Session was delayed a fortnight by the unfortunate necessity for an Autumn Session to discuss the Procedure Rules, so that the Government lost no less than six weeks of its usual resources from causes over which it had no control, and has, nevertheless, passed five out of thirteen very important measures promised in the Queen's Speech, and one other measure of first-rate significance, not mentioned in that Speech, besides several other measures of considerable, though inferior, utility. The Corrupt Practices Bill, for vindicating the purity of elections and curtailing the expenses of elections; the Bankruptcy Bill, for discouraging dishonest bankruptcies and liquidations, and putting a brand on the fraudulent trader; the Patents Bill, for encouraging inventiveness without depriving the public of the gain of inventions; and the two Agricultural Holdings Bills, for securing to tenants the value of their own improvements, and for encouraging agriculture by giving them security for all the money which they sink judiciously in their farms,—together make up a thoroughly good harvest for a single legislative Session. But that is not all. The provision made for redeeming within twenty years a very substantial portion of the National Debt is a great step gained in recognition of the claims of posterity, and of the duty that lies upon us to contribute something towards repairing the blunders of our ancestors. We should have been glad, indeed, to have seen the Government of London Bill amongst the trophies of the Session; but if that had been also carried, Mr. Gladstone would have rivalled in 1883 the marvellous legislative achievements of his previous Administration between 1869 and 1872. Under the present conditions, that was hardly to be hoped for. But barring the great four years 1869-1872, few Sessions of recent times have surpassed the one which ends to-day in legislative fruitfulness.

And certainly, without any exception at all, never was so much achieved against such overpowering difficulties. The swarms of trivial questions, which have consumed from an hour and a half to close upon three hours of the time of the Government on Government nights,—the deliberate adjournments of the House when talk had fallen to its neap tides, in order to provide in cold-blood for the too probable return of spring tides of talk not at all more beneficent,—the bitter complaints urged by the very persons who had allowed independent Members' motions to be counted out night after night, of the encroachments which the Government made on their subsequent nights,—the complete indifference to the urgency of public business betrayed by the most waddling of these independent Members,—and most serious of all, the deliberate and organised onslaughts of the Irish party on the Government, have all attained a climax this year such as had no parallel at all before the Session of 1881, and only then as regarded Irish Obstruction. The steady friction against which all the work that has been achieved was accomplished, brings the achievements of the Session up from what we should otherwise call a high average, to the level of a marvel of energy and constancy. A key that has so often been turned heavily in the lock, in spite of the accumulated dust of Wartons, Ashmead-Bartletts, Gorsts, and Randolph Churchills, not to mention a dozen other Members, in its various wards, speaks for the firmness and vigilance of the warder's hand. If the country is disappointed that more has not been done, let the people see to it that the blame falls in the right place. Let them demand the abandonment of that obsolete and wasteful practice,—rendered wantonly mischievous during the last three years,—of raising a debate without either drift or cohesion, on the Speech from the Throne; let them insist on the decent limitation of the right to question, so as not to rob Government nights of their best hours; and let them insist on the development of Grand Committees; but let them acknowledge that in the Session which has just elapsed, the Government have accomplished wonders in the way of rescuing all these valuable measures from the rapidly extending morass of Parliamentary debate. No Session of Lord Beaconsfield's Government yielded as much useful legislative result as the Session just expired, though there were several very useful measures passed, especially by Sir Richard Cross, during the course of that Government. During Lord Palmerston's time, we do not believe that any Session ever even aimed so high in the way of work, as this Session has actually attained. Sir Robert Peel probably effected more in his most successful Session; and the first Government elected under the great Reform Act did more, no doubt, in the year when it reformed the Poor-law. But taking the last fifty years as a whole, we doubt whether, as Mr. Gladstone said, the average of a Session's legislative work reaches up to anything like the standard of the present year. And if it does reach so high, it is only because during Mr. Gladstone's previous Government, when great measures by threes and fours were carried every Session, the standard of legislative efficiency was for the first time raised unusually and exceptionally high. This year Mr. Gladstone has not surpassed himself, but he has easily surpassed Lord Beaconsfield, the late Lord Derby, and Lord Melbourne, and has rivalled probably many of the Sessions of Sir Robert Peel. Moreover, Lord Melbourne, Sir Robert Peel, and the late Lord Derby knew nothing of the difficulties which Mr. Gladstone's Government has this year encountered and overcome, and even the Government of Lord Beaconsfield knew those difficulties only in their comparatively mild and innocent infancy. If success is to be measured by the resistance vanquished, no Government has ever been more successful than the Government which to-day prorogues the House of Commons.

THE SUCCESS AND FAILURE IN IRELAND.

THE debates of Thursday week and of last Saturday brought out both the success and the failure of the Irish policy of the Government in a very vivid light;—its success in tranquillising Ireland, and in carrying out two separate enterprises of vast difficulty, of enormous extent, and of immeasurable importance, with extraordinary, if rude, efficiency, in an incredibly short time; and its complete failure, so far as the smallest conciliation of the people of Ireland is concerned,—a country where it is evidently far more conducive to popularity to utter against the Government the coarsest and most baseless abuse that the imagination can devise, than it is to recognise in the most reserved and frigid language the different temper displayed towards Ireland by this administration from that of any administration which has preceded it. It was hardly possible that either the success or the failure of the Government in Ireland could be brought out in stronger outlines than those in which the recent debates enable us to present them.

First, Ireland has been pacified. Instead of the state of things which existed in the early part of last year, when in the month of May, for instance,—by no means the worst month,—there were 396 agrarian outrages, including two murders, against only 93 in this last May, none of which were murders, Ireland is really a safer country for the mass of the people now than England itself. Instead of murder on the scale of the winter before last, instead of incendiary fires in almost all parts of Ireland, instead of intimidation on such a scale that no one knew whether it were safe for him to perform the ordinary duties of life, Ireland is now a quieter and more peaceable country than probably any other part of the United Kingdom; for agrarian crime has always been the worst part of Irish crime, and outside agrarian crime Ireland is a country singularly free from crime.

In the next place, the Government have effected,—very likely rudely, for a new resettlement of such a country as Ireland accomplished within two years and a half from its commencement cannot but be rude,—the labour of a political Hercules in relation to the revision of rent. Mr. Trevelyan gave a brief outline of the facts in his speech of Thursday week, and this outline is borne out fully by the returns presented to Parliament. Of 98,614 applications for the fixing of a fair rent up to July 31st last, no fewer than 61,354 cases had been disposed of; and taking into account also the number of agreements made out of Court, 109,000 cases had been disposed of. Mr. Parnell remarks, in depreciation of this extraordinary achievement, that there are in Ireland over half a million of holdings. No doubt there are. But many of them are held by the same tenants; and besides, a great many of them are held by tenants who are quite satisfied at present, and do not wish their rent revised by a Court of any kind. The only way to estimate the progress towards a successful resettlement of the land of Ireland, is to estimate the amount of work done in proportion to the work demanded; and as we can say that three-fifths of the work required is already done, and that the work of the Land Commission is going on at the rate of 137 cases a day, it is but fair to expect that by the end of the year, or at any rate by the spring of next year, the whole of this huge task,—excepting only the appeal cases, which are not at present being decided at a satisfactory rate,—will have been fairly achieved, and this with results that sufficiently show, as against the allegations of the Lords, that there has been no great caprice and no great variation in the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners. As Mr. Trevelyan told us in his speech, the average reductions of rent have varied from 18 to 23 per cent., and show a very fair uniformity of something like a general average of 20 per cent. The reduction of rent had amounted in all to something like £350,000 a year up to the end of last July, a reduction which holds good for fifteen years. Nor was that anything like the whole effect produced, for landlords all over Ireland had been anticipating the action of the Land Act, and had thereby immensely increased, indirectly, the effect of the Land Act. The Arrears Act, too, has been worked with the utmost efficiency, so that almost all the advances authorised have been already made, and a very great number of poor tenants enabled thereby to avail themselves of the beneficent effects of the Land Act. We doubt whether a measure of such gigantic importance has ever in any country been carried out in better fashion, or with more substantial justice. The result is, as we have said, that Ireland is pacified, and that she is availing herself heartily of the new provisions which Parliament has passed for securing something very like fixity of tenure to her farmers.

These are great results, against which we have, however, to set off a no less startling failure. Nothing can be more remarkable than the contrast,—the strange and striking contrast,—between the achievement of the Government in satisfying and pacifying Ireland, and the failure of the Government in the effort to win the smallest vestige of confidence from the Irish people. The Sligo election this week only showed what the Wexford election had showed a few weeks ago, and the Monaghan election a few days before that,—that no trace of confidence in, or even respect for, the Government is felt in Ireland. But this is not the worst. No Member of the House of Commons knows what he is about better than Mr. Healy. He knows exactly what is popular in Ireland and what is not popular, and he regulates his speech in Parliament accordingly. When he told Mr. Trevelyan on Saturday last that if he had been in office in Cromwell's time, he would have got up with just as much aplomb to justify the spitting of Irish babies on English bayonets, as he now showed in defending the action of the Constabulary, Mr. Healy was not, we believe, speaking in passion or striking out wildly, but deliberately counting on the delight with which these savage words would be read in Ireland, and the willing credulity with which they would be received. The extreme Irish party are, no doubt, justly convinced that the Irish Constabulary often act with great violence and with great injustice. The truth is, that without its being any special fault of theirs, the Irish Constabulary are some of the worst instruments for preserving order which any Government could have. They have been trained on a military system, which is the worst system conceivable for a police. They are Irish in their variability of temper, and while they are all hand-and-glove with the population at one moment, they will break out into furious passion with the population at another moment. Under a slack hand, they do their best to conceal crime and connive at the escape of criminals. Under a strong hand, they find themselves compelled to arrest criminals; and when that embroils them with the people, they get furious, and often attack when they ought to wait in the coolest way for any attack upon themselves. We do not at all deny that Mr. Healy and his friends have just reason to complain of the Constabulary; and we hope with all our hearts that Mr. Trevelyan may make the reorganisation of the Irish Police one of the first of his objects during the Recess. But Mr. Healy and his friends know all the difficulties of the situation as well as Mr. Trevelyan himself, and know, moreover, as well as Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan know, that never was there an administration in any country less desirous to hound on the Constabulary to unjust accusations, than the present. It is simply for the sake of the popularity produced by their hostile attitude in Ireland, that the Irish Members affect to believe Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan to be bloody-minded men, anxious to instigate the Constabulary to violence, and ready to defend any act, however shocking, even to the spitting of babies on bayonets, which the Constabulary may please to be guilty of. It is because the more just the attitude of Parliament becomes towards Ireland, the more delight the Irish seem to take in the invective hurled at England, that Mr. Healy and his friends launch at the present administration those coarse invectives, which suggest to the Irish people that no more malignant rulers than the present were ever charged with the Irish Government, and that all that the Government have done in the concession of justice has been forced from them by the Secret Societies and the Land League, and the basest fear of Mr. Parnell.

The impressive and touching speech in which Mr. Gladstone urged on the Irish Members the unpatriotic character of the effort they are thus making to render Ireland and England absolutely irreconcilable by their passionate and violent outbreaks, did apparently produce some effect in Ireland itself. At least, it elicited from the Freeman's Journal an appeal to the Irish party to consider the danger and the mischief which this super-heated language may produce. But it did not soften Mr. Healy. He persisted in it that war between England and Ireland was only prevented by the hopelessness of the struggle; that the state of feeling in Ireland towards England is simply a war feeling; and that that war feeling is justifiable, and can never be removed by anything but the measures for which he and his party contend. We have no doubt that so long as Ireland chooses such representatives as Mr. Healy and his friends, this will be so, for it is in their power,—and they use the power freely,—to persuade the Irish that they ought to hate the English, and that they do hate the English with a perfect hatred; and that that hatred is even intensified by the attempts to do justice which England has lately made. It is this last fact which seems to us the disastrous feature in the case. If we do justice absolutely, and put down crime at the time we are doing justice, we shall have a perfectly tranquil Ireland. But we shall not, apparently, have even an approach to a loyal Ireland; nor could we, in our opinion, ever gain a loyal Ireland by giving up Ireland to the whim of Home-rule; indeed, we believe that in that case we should soon have a very much more disloyal Ireland than ever. The only hope is that by doing justice steadily, as Mr. Gladstone has taught us to do it, and ignoring with equal steadiness the disloyalty of Irish Members so long as they keep within the limits of the law, we may, at the cost of a considerable succession of weak Governments, always liable to be upset by Irish cabals, at length tire out the disloyalty of the Irish people, and teach them that they will gain nothing and lose much by always affecting to believe that we wish them harm and grudge them a reasonable local independence. But, as yet, only half the problem is solved. We have found the secret of pacifying Ireland. We have not found the secret of gaining over Ireland to any sort of co-operation with the rest of the Empire. For the present, Ireland insists on sulking and indulging illusions, only because we cannot give her the moon for which she cries.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

THE passing of the Bankruptcy Bill has enabled the Government to add at least one measure of first-rate social, if not political, importance to the Statute-Book. The main credit of this result must rest with the Government, and particularly with that Member of the Government who framed it, brought it in, and carried it through with such conspicuous ability, energy, and tact. But the Standing Committee on Trade, the House of Commons at large, and even the House of Lords, each and all, deserve some share in the credit of the work. For once the Second Chamber confined itself to the legitimate functions of a revising body, and passed "at sight" six pages of amendments intended to make the Bill clear and consistent with itself, which were propounded by the draftsman of the original Bill through the Lord Chancellor. The Leader of the Opposition wisely abstained from letting loose his legions on the Bill, notwithstanding the usual complaints of want of time for consideration, and so forth. The Law Lords were chiefly conspicuous by their absence. In sparing the House and the Bill "the string of amendments" with which he had been supplied, and the "sixty-seven notes and queries" which he had made on the Bill, which he could not pronounce "good or bad, because he had not had an opportunity of reading it," Lord Bramwell exercised a continence and a wisdom which his zeal in defence of Liberty and Property has not always allowed him to exhibit. The Grand Committee in the House of Commons also deserves the negative credit of continence in letting the greater part of the Bill alone, as well as the positive merit of having, according to its author, improved it by two months' "cutting and carving." Considering the ultimate results, indeed, one may venture to express a doubt whether two months was not an excessive time to devote to the operation, and to hope in the future the Standing Committees may get through more than two Bills during the Session. But, on the whole, the Government certainly have cause to congratulate themselves on the result of the experiment, and to look forward to an extension of the labours, and an increase of the fruits of the labours, of the Standing Committees in the future.

When the Bill is examined in detail, it is curious to see how little it has been altered in substance between its first introduction and its final stages, and how slight the actual changes are in the existing Law of Bankruptcy. The bulk of the Bill is simply a re-enactment of the Bankruptcy Clauses of the Act of 1869. In thus preserving the present law, Mr. Chamberlain showed not only an amount of common-sense which his supporters have always claimed for him, but also an amount of constructive Conservatism which his opponents have been rather apt to deny him. The fact is that it is not the Bankruptcy part of the Act of 1869 which has proved a failure. The real causes of the break-down of that Act have been the two sections which permitted liquidation by arrangement and composition. The "new way to pay old debts" pointed out by these sections was not discovered by the many till two or three years after the passing of the Act. But once discovered, the number of those who trod it advanced by leaps and bounds, and as the number increased the amounts paid by way of composition diminished, till it became the exception to pay more than ten shillings, while those who paid under one shilling were more numerous than those who paid over seven shillings and sixpence in the pound. Any debtor, if he could get the assistance of a sharp solicitor and a not wholly artless accountant, was thus enabled to defraud his creditors with ease and comfort if his gambling should turn out adversely. By the new Bill this primrose path will be stopped up, or at least will have a very strait gate placed at the entrance. Compositions may still be made, but they will be placed under the supervision of the Court. The proxies, which were the means by which the trustee and the debtor between them controlled affairs, are to be lodged with the official receiver, instead of with the trustee, and the Official Receiver is to make a report to the Court as to the debtor's character and affairs. It will rest with the Court instead of the creditors to give the debtor his discharge, just as under a bankruptcy. It will no longer be possible, therefore, for the debtor and trustee between them to juggle away the assets and liabilities at their own sweet will. The eye of the Court will be upon them, and if they are caught straying from the right path, the hand of the Court will be heavy upon them.

The Act, however, aims rather at prevention than at cure. It does, indeed, hold out to the fraudulent debtor a greater certainty of punishment than hitherto. Not only may the Court commit him for trial, but if it does, it is the duty of the Public Prosecutor to prosecute. But the best precaution is likely to be that, in case of certain acts of misbehaviour on the debtor's part, the Court is not to be able to grant a debtor his discharge; while for certain other acts it may only grant a conditional discharge. An effort is thus made, as under the Act of 1849, to distinguish between avoidable and unavoidable bankruptcies. Under the old Act, the Commissioners were to give one of three classes of certificates of discharge; one certifying that failure was due wholly to misfortune; another, that it was due partly to misfortune; and the third, that it was due wholly to causes other than misfortune. But this last was a brutum fulmen. Equally with the other forms, it operated as a discharge, and though it was intended to affix a stigma, yet as no evil results followed, the stigma was disregarded. But now the discharge is not to be granted at all, or only granted subject to conditions, if the bankruptcy has been caused "by rash and hazardous speculations, or unjustifiable extravagance in living," and so on. Not only, therefore, is a stigma affixed, but disqualifications, disabilities, and disadvantages follow. Moreover, if an undischarged bankrupt incurs a debt of £20 without stating that he is undischarged, he commits a penal offence, so that his status must needs be known to all with whom he has dealings. Even the most brazen-faced insolvent would feel the shame of revealing his own insolvency, when at the same time the insolvency is known to have resulted from improper conduct. By removing the possibility of paying a fraudulent composition "on the quiet," and by marking with the mark of the Beast the criminal and quasi-criminal bankrupt, the Act should do a great deal towards the discouragement of the lax tone which has lately sprung up in dealing with insolvencies.

It is not, however, the debtor alone whose power of getting round his creditors has to be guarded against. He would be comparatively powerless without the trustee. The Act, therefore, aims at diminishing both the temptations to the trustee to collude with the debtor or any section of the creditors, and also his power to do so, if he gives way to temptation. The first object is sought to be attained by providing that the payment of the trustee shall be by commission or percentage, partly on the amount realised and partly on the dividends distributed, instead of being left wholly to the discretion or interestedness of the creditors; and the minority of creditors may get the Board of Trade to disallow the payment allowed by the majority, if too large. The chief inducement to adopt the profession of bankruptcy wrecker, has been not so much the salary, as the indirect profits which could be made by keeping the balances got in, and employing them for the trustee's private profit. There were stringent provisions passed in 1869 to prevent this, but they had to be enforced by the Court, and, unhappily, they were held not to apply to cases of liquidation. They are now re-enacted, but the enforcement of them is placed in the hands of the Board of Trade, instead of the Court, and they will apply as much to compositions as to regular bankruptcies. The trustee will, therefore, have to pay interest at 20 per cent. on outstanding balances over £50; he is expressly prohibited from paying any moneys whatever into his private account; he must pay them into the Bank of England, unless (owing to an unfortunate amendment introduced by Sir John Lubbock, in the interests of Bankers) the Committee of Inspection authorise his keeping an account with a local bank. His accounts, too, are not to be audited by the Committee of Inspection, and merely forwarded once a year to the Comptroller, who has no power to disallow them, but they are to be audited by the Board of Trade twice a year. Perhaps the regulation which more than any other will tend to keep down illegitimate profits by the trustee is that when one person is trustee of several estates, if the Board of Trade thinks that the aggregate balance on all the estates in his hands is larger than is required, they may order him to pay over the surplus to the Bank of England. There is reasonable ground for hoping that under these regulations trusteeship in bankruptcy will become a less profitable trade, and that the office will, in a large number of cases, be left in the hands of the Official Receiver. He, as the salaried agent of the Board of Trade, will look for his reward to promotion in his Department earned by the ability and energy with which he conducts the bankruptcies committed to him, instead of to the protraction of lucrative operations with the balances got in by him.

A further check is put upon waste and loss by provisions as to the summary administration of small estates where the total amount realisable is under £300, which have been hitherto the most fruitful sources of scandalous compositions and illegal profits to trustees. A great relief to small debtors who owe altogether under £50 is afforded by enabling a County-Court Judge to make an order-for-payment into what is practically a bankruptcy order. The working-classes will, therefore, now be able to have the benefit of that white-washing which has hitherto been reserved for sins or misfortunes on a larger scale. It has been very hard on working-men that hitherto, if once they got into debt, they could never remove the millstone from round their necks. This clause should do more for their emancipation from the small money-lender and shopkeeper than the prohibition of bills of sale, or any other paternal protection of that kind which can be devised. A similar step is taken in imitation of the Scotch law, by the transfer of the administration of the insolvent estate of a dead man to Bankruptcy, to the great relief of the Chancery Division and the great benefit of the creditors.

Such are the most salient points of the new Bill. In one sense, they may be said to be a return to the officialism of the Act of 1849. But there is this essential difference. Under that Act, the official assignees, as they were called, had the appearance of control, without the reality. Moreover, they were legal officers, and necessarily acted with the slowness and the timidity which characterise the action of Courts of Law. The great novelty of the present Bill lies in its separation of the legal from the administrative officialism. The official receiver will rather be amicus than minister Curiae. He will advise, report to, and set in motion the Court, but he is the servant of and responsible to the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade replaces the Comptroller in Bankruptcy, but it can not only examine and report, but act on the result of its examination. Under two such heads as Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Farrer, there is little danger of its functions not being carefully, freely, and swiftly exercised.

It is possible that the new Act, notwithstanding all the skill and care with which it has been framed, may prove a failure, like those which have preceded it. It is possible that no Bankruptcy system can be satisfactory. It may be that the speedy release of the unfortunate debtor, and the sure punishment of the fraudulent or reckless debtor, are irreconcilable objects; and that when the third object, of speedy recovery of such debts as can be recovered for the creditors, is added, that the attainment of all three objects at once is beyond the power of any legislation. It may, however, be fairly claimed for this Act that it so courageously attempts innovation where innovation has been shown to be necessary, and so carefully preserves all that has worked successfully in the past, that it deserves success.

THE HARVEST.

SINCE writing on Harvest prospects, six weeks ago, the vicissitudes of a somewhat extraordinary season have led to great changes in the appearance of the crops, now rapidly falling before the scythe and the reaping machine over the greater portion of the country. For the greater part of the interval that has elapsed the temperature has been abnormally low for the time of year; a considerable quantity of rain, including some heavy downpours, has fallen; and there has been a great lack of sunshine. The effect of such weather upon the wheat crop especially has been very injurious. At the period referred to, although the crop was generally rather thin and all very short in the straw, the ears were of a goodly size, and looked like filling well. The wet and cold weather of the latter half of July, however, caused rust to prevail extensively, and prevented the full fructification of the crop. Red maggot and other injurious grubs and insects, too, have caused more or less barrenness; and the result of fungoid and insect injury combined is that the ears are badly filled, a large proportion of the grain is under-sized, and the quality is not at all satisfactory. The straw has grown to its usual length, and yet, where the crop is cut, the shocks are further apart than they were expected to be, the wheat being thinner on the ground than was supposed from an off-hand inspection while it was standing. Instead of a crop nearly up to average, then, as was fairly to be expected in the middle of July, a yield of from ten to twenty per cent. below average is all that the best judges expect. This depreciation in the crop has been to some extent caused by the lodging of the comparatively few heavy pieces of wheat, especially in the Midlands and other parts of the country where heavy storms of rain have been most common. Out of several hundreds of reports upon the crop now before us, we find that 10 per cent. only represent it as over average, 24 per cent. average, and 66 per cent. under average. As some of the reports were written a fortnight ago, when the depreciation was not sufficiently noticeable, we may take these per centages to be rather too favourable than otherwise. As the acreage of the wheat crop—fortunately for the farmers—is a short one, 13 per cent. below that of last year, the English yield will be one of the smallest on record.

We are glad to be able to report more favourably upon the other cereals. It is true that barley has not come up to its great early promise, chiefly because the best crops are all badly laid. There is a full crop of straw; but weight and quality have been lost, to a considerable extent. With such a deficiency of sunshine as we have had this summer, it has been impossible for any of the cereals to mature and ripen in a normal manner, and a preponderance of thin and coarse grain is inevitable. Still, the reports before us are about 35 per cent. over average, 41 per cent. average, and 24 per cent. under average; quantity alone being referred to. The oat crop has improved as materially as the other cereals have deteriorated, the rainy weather having supplied it with the moisture for which it was languishing, after the drought which prevailed from the middle of June to the middle of July. Therefore, instead of being the decidedly short crop which its appearance six weeks ago indicated, it has now come up abreast of barley, the per-centages of the reports being 35 above average, 43 average, and 22 below average.

The pulse crops are decidedly satisfactory, and the bean crop may be pronounced the best of the season, while peas come up to average. In fact, for peas, the per-centage of the estimates represent an exact average, and for beans there are 40 above against 20 below, with 40 average. The root crops, again, are excellent, Swedish turnips being particularly luxuriant. Mangolds are thin in places, but generally large for the present stage of growth, and white turnips are nearly as good as swedes. In short, the root crop, which is now out of danger of serious damage, is one of the most abundant of recent years. Potatoes have looked remarkably well all through the season, having been sown in a rare abundance of dry moulds. Disease has appeared in many parts of the country, as it always does more or less; but after so moist a time as we have had recently, the wonder is that the parasite has not shown itself far more extensively. If we should be favoured with dry weather for another month, there can be no doubt as to a very heavy crop of tubers being realised. The hay crop, which was very light in the early districts, has bulked up fairly as the later cuttings have been secured, but on the whole is still a small crop. The quality has been injured by rain to some extent, but not more than is usually the case with a crop that is being harvested in one place or another during the whole of the summer.

Recent reports from the hop districts detracted somewhat from the exuberantly sanguine expectations previously entertained; but the hot and sunny weather of the past ten days has caused a great improvement. There has never been a more luxuriant growth of bine; but until hops are actually fit for gathering, no one can tell, even approximately, what the yield will be. The crop is not out of danger yet; but it soon will be, and the chances are greatly in favour of one of the best yields on record.

In Scotland, Harvest prospects are about on a par with those of England, except that turnips are not so good; while in Ireland they were better, on the whole, until discounted by heavy storms of rain quite recently. In European countries, and in the United States, the wheat crop seems to be more or less deficient; but other farm produce is as generally abundant. The world's stock of wheat is at present sufficient to prevent any anxiety as to an abundant supply for the coming winter, however deficient the new crop may be,—a fact that is obvious from the lowness of market prices.

A great deal of corn has been already cut in the southern and eastern counties of England, and some has been safely stacked or housed. The weather day by day is watched with the greatest anxiety, and although the South of England has been greatly favoured for most of the time since harvest commenced, Ireland, Scotland, and the North of England have been visited by heavy rains, which have done much damage. We have at least the certainty of a finer harvest than that of last year, as about half the work is done in the early districts; and the hot weather, which farmers, at least, may be said to have enjoyed, has ripened the crops so rapidly, that the scythe and the reaping machine are now at work generally throughout the greater part of England, and in all but the backward districts of the rest of the kingdom. On the whole, then, agricultural prospects are decidedly cheering; and if the harvest is not quite so golden as it promised to be when we last wrote about it, there can be no doubt that the produce of our fields is more abundant than it has been for many years. We might feel called upon to except last year from this comparison, if it had not been for the wet harvest, which destroyed an excellent prospect. The crop returns recently published in the agricultural papers represent the harvest as scarcely up to that of last year; but it is explained that last year's reports, given just when the corn was ready to be cut, were heavily discounted when results were reckoned up. There is good reason to hope that no such falling-off will have to be recorded in the present season, but that the generally fine crops, wheat being the only exception, will be secured in fine condition. In that event, although prices are low, our long-trying farmers may be fortunate enough to retrieve some of their past losses, and to prosecute their useful enterprise with renewed faith and courage.

WHY ARE JEWS PERSECUTED?

HOW are we to explain those outbreaks of hatred against the Jews which occur periodically in different parts of the world, and which at this moment are only kept in check in Hungary by military force? We have discussed this question on a previous occasion, and, after discarding the usual explanations, have suggested the separatism of the Jews as the real cause of the dislike in which they are, as a class, generally held. Wherever they are they constitute a foreign element, which refuses to intermingle with and be absorbed into the life of the nation. They remain a separate nation, and accentuate their separateness by difference of food, of the weekly day of rest, sometimes of dress, but chiefly by refusing to intermarry outside their own race. These peculiarities naturally expose the Jews to suspicion and dislike, especially among an ignorant population, like the peasantry of Russia, Galicia, and Hungary. But antipathy to the Jews is not confined to ignorant populations. The recent crusade against them in Germany included all classes and all professions, and the agitation in Hungary, although it began among the peasantry, spread rapidly through the whole population. It seems, therefore, that the fact that the Jews are a foreign element in the midst of every population where they dwell will not alone account for the bitter hatred which now and then breaks out into open violence. The true explanation, we take it, is that which is suggested in a despatch from a British Consul in Southern Russia, and which has been elaborated in some articles in "Modern Thought" by Mr. Laister. In Russia, says Consul Wagstaff, the Jews "are compared to parasites that have settled on a plant not vigorous enough to throw them off, and which is being gradually sapped of its vitality." It is not simply that in imperfectly organised communities the Jews are the bankers, money-lenders, innkeepers, and middlemen; but they are all this not as separate individuals, but as a highly organised guild of foreigners, spreading its tentacles over the whole country till all its material resources are at last in its grasp. It is impossible to realise the ruin and misery wrought by this system in countries where the Jews are numerous and the civilisation rudimentary. "There exists among them," says Consul Wagstaff, "a system of boycotting," which works as follows. The produce of a farm or vineyard is put up to auction. The Jews draw lots for it, and the man on whom the lot falls is thus secured against all competition, and can fix his own price. In parts of Russia, Roumania, and Austrian-Hungary, this Jewish trade-unionism pervades all the transactions of life. You cannot sell a horse or a pig except on the terms which the Jews choose to offer; and in Galicia, Bessarabia, and many parts of Russia, the very labour of the peasantry is mortgaged to Jewish money-lenders; so that if you wish to hire a labourer or tradesman, you must resort to the Jew in whose debt the peasant happens to be. "If the peasant," says Consul Wagstaff, "gets into the hands of this class, he is irretrievably lost. The proprietor, in his turn, from a small loan, gradually mortgages and eventually loses his estate." In this way a great deal of landed property has passed into the hands of the Jews. In the last Fortnightly Review Captain Conder, of Palestine Exploration celebrity, supplies incidentally an illustration of this Jewish system in Palestine. The Jews who have gone thither from Russia and Austria have established a cordon round Jerusalem, by means of which they intercept all the vegetables brought in by the country people and re-sell them at an exorbitant price. Doubtless they will gradually extend their ramifications till they have got the peasantry in their grasp, and then we shall probably hear of an outbreak against the Jews in Syria.

This tribal exclusiveness and solidarity of the Jews, and not religion, has been the main cause of the persecutions to which they have been at various times exposed. "In the twelfth century," says the friendly and liberal Milman, "the Jews had a hold upon almost all the estates in the country; they had mortgages on half Paris, and scarcely any one but had some article in pawn." "Husbandry was ruined by the usurious exactions of the Jews." The result was popular outbreaks, ending in the expulsion of the Jews. The same thing happened in England and other European countries. We recall these facts for the purpose of showing that the persecution of the Jews has always been due in the main to other than religious motives. When religion has been alleged, it has been the pretext rather than the true cause. An excited populace will readily believe any calumny against the object of its hate. The hatred against the Jews is not due to a belief in their murdering children; the ready belief in their murdering children is begotten of the hatred caused by their system of accumulating wealth. And this hatred is older than Christianity. It existed in Pagan Rome and Alexandria, and in the cities of Asia Minor. It has always existed, in fact, wherever the Jews have congregated in considerable numbers. This shows that it is not the Jew as a man, or as a religionist, who is hated, but the Jew as a member of a commercial "ring," cosmopolitan in its character, and refusing to amalgamate with the national life of any land. Thus it happens that the Jews as a race remain unpopular, even when the Jews as individuals may be extremely and most deservedly popular. It is also a fact that Jews have at various times and in various countries entered with passionate patriotism into the struggles of national life. Nevertheless it remains true that the Jews in the mass are everywhere a foreign people, maintaining a separate life, existing apart from the nations among whom they sojourn, and making common cause now, as of old, against the Gentiles.

Certainly this fact does not justify the hatred and persecution to which the Jews have been at various times exposed. It presents, however, a curious and perplexing problem. Probably the majority of educated Jews have given up all expectation of any literal fulfilment of Messianic prophecies, and have no thought of a restoration to Palestine. But the mass of the Jews are still the Jews of the Mosaic Dispensation and the Talmud. That, and not the history of the countries in which they dwell, is the lore on which their minds are fed. To them the Jews are still "a peculiar people," a nation dispersed among the Gentiles, lying under a mysterious destiny for the present, but dowered with the promise of a glorious national life in the future. It is impossible that a people nurtured on such traditions, and who believe themselves predestined to a great career, can mingle on equal terms with other races, or suffer themselves to be assimilated into any other national life. It is commonly supposed that the special characteristics of the Jews, especially in the choice of occupations, have been forced upon them by Christian persecution. Mr. Laister combats this theory, and offers a formidable mass of Old Testament and Talmudic evidence to show that what is supposed to be due to persecution is in reality derived from purely Jewish sources. "The Christian," he says, "could not love the Jew as a neighbour, for he would not be neighbourly; and the Jew, on his part, could not be neighbourly, because his creed, while it permitted him to make all he could out of the Christians, forbade him to have anything in common with them." That is a strong way of putting it, but it is certainly not stronger than can be justified out of the Old Testament and Talmud.

So evangelical a prophet as Isaiah promises the Gentiles for a prey to the Jews: "Ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves." "And strangers [i.e., Gentiles] shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vine-dressers." The Jew was forbidden by the Mosaic Law to lend on usury to one of his own nation; but he was permitted to take usury ad libitum of the Gentile. Dr. Adler offers the following very ingenious explanation of this, in an article contributed to the Nineteenth Century in April, 1878:—"Had the Israelites been allowed to lend to one another at interest, their lands would have been encumbered, and their energies as agriculturists would have been crippled. . . . But this danger would not arise from lending to the foreigner. No Mosaic principle was infringed by charging him interest." It is odd that Dr. Adler should not have seen that the "danger" from which the Mosaic Law protected the Jew was inflicted by the Jew in all its bitterness on "the foreigner," who occasionally took the law into his own hands, and turned savagely on the strange community whom he saw prospering at his expense. And the case was all the harder from the fact that the Christian Church, till comparatively recent times, prohibited the practice of usury to all her members. So that the Jewish money-lender had the field all to himself. It is on the Talmud, however, rather than on the Old Testament, that the character of the ordinary Jew is moulded; and Mr. Laister quotes passages from the Talmud to show that it sanctions the robbery of Christians by Israelites. Cultivated Jews would, of course, repudiate all such teaching. Consul Wagstaff says emphatically that the educated Jews in Russia loudly condemn the occupations and practices of their lower brethren. The mass of educated Jews in this country probably know as little of the Talmud as the mass of other educated persons. But it is from the Talmud that the ordinary Jew gets his ideas of the duty which he owes to others; and the Talmud draws a sharp line between the duty which the Israelite owes to the Israelite and the duty which he owes to the Gentile. Paradoxical as it may seem to say so, this explanation ought to raise our opinion of the Jew who oppresses and robs the Christian, even while we condemn his conduct. If he believes himself justified by his religion, he is by no means so debased and immoral as the man whose sin is far less gross, but who sins against conscience. But what is to be the outcome of it all? We can see no solution of the problem so long as the Jews generally believe themselves to be bound by the Mosaic polity, as expounded in the Talmud. While they hold to this belief they must continue to exist as a separate people among the nations. On one point, at least, we heartily agree with Mr. Laister, namely, in thinking that much mischief is done by the large number of Christians who encourage the Jews in the belief that they are still the peculiar people of God, kept providentially apart from other nations, and reserved for a triumphant future. So long as the Jews cling to that belief, no effective reply can be made to writers who argue that they cannot, in the true sense of the word, be patriots. Nor is there anything disgraceful in the accusation. Patriotism can render no divided allegiance, and a Jew who really believes in Judaism can no more be an English or French patriot than a Frenchman or an Englishman can be a Russian patriot. The Jew must be a Jew first of all, and an Englishman or Frenchman afterwards. And this is very much to his credit, so long as he believes himself to belong to a higher and holier polity than any existing State. The error is in his so believing, not in his conscientiously acting up to his belief.

THE HEAD MASTER OF CLIFTON COLLEGE ON THE THEORY OF INSPIRATION.

THE Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has seldom done either a better or a bolder thing than its publication of two remarkable lectures by the Head Master of Clifton College,—the Rev. J. M. Wilson,—on "The Theory of Inspiration." It has never done a bolder thing, because these lectures face the difficulties of the Bible in a much freer and franker spirit than the Councils of our various Religious Societies can usually persuade themselves to sanction and approve. It has never done a better thing, because these lectures do not rationalise and explain away Revelation into a mere human evolution, but are well calculated to vindicate the faith in a divine power in almost the only way in which in our day it can, as we believe, be triumphantly vindicated, as a faith justified and even required by the study of history—which contains constant proofs of a power perpetually conversing with man, and sustaining, indeed, as one of the minor prophets terms it, “the Lord’s controversy” with him,—a power especially reflected in the history of the Jewish people, and receiving at last its perfect human embodiment in the life of Christ. Mr. Wilson begins by contrasting the extreme reticence not of one Christian Church only, but of nearly all the greater branches of the Christian Church, as to the true definition of Inspiration, with the desire of Secularists and Agnostics so to define it that they may confute the Christian revelation, as it were, out of its own mouth. He contrasts impressively the language of two different authorities on this question. One of these says, “The purely organic (i.e., mechanical) theory of Inspiration rests on no Scriptural authority, and, if we except a few ambiguous metaphors, is supported by no historical testimony. It is at variance with the whole form and fashion of the Bible, and it is destructive of all that is holiest in man and highest in religion.” The other authority says, “It will not do to say that it [the Bible] is not verbally inspired. If the words are not inspired, what is?” And then Mr. Wilson explains that the former authority, who protests so strongly against verbal inspiration as inconsistent with historical testimony and fatal to what is highest in religion, is Canon Westcott, of Cambridge, one of the most learned of our living Biblical critics; and that the latter authority, who is eager to tie the Bible down to verbal inspiration, is the well-known American Secularist, Colonel Robert Ingersoll, who really contends for verbal inspiration as the only intelligible kind of inspiration, in order that he may explode all inspiration altogether. “Do you, then, ask me,” says Mr. Wilson, “can I become a Christian without having first believed in the divinely-guaranteed accuracy of the Bible? A thousand times I answer, ‘Yes.’” And then he proceeds, in a passage of great beauty and wisdom, to explain himself:—“The truth is, that the belief in inspiration is not the portal by which you enter the temple: it is the atmosphere that you breathe when you have entered. You may become a Christian,—most men do become Christians,—from finding in the life and sayings and death of Jesus Christ something that touches them, something that finds them, something that is a revelation of divine love to the human heart. Men find that there is something in them dear and precious to God. And then love springs up in them, and a new life begins. They look out on the world with larger and more loving eyes. They see God in their brethren, God in Nature, and God in their Bibles. In their Bibles they read of the Christ whom they love. Those pages are filled with power that moves the soul; never man spake as this man; never book spake as this book. And this, and this only, is the theory of inspiration that Christians must needs possess. It is primarily an internal question among believers, not an external question with the world. It has little or no relation to the convictions which make and keep a man a Christian. It is not a question which I or any one would care to talk about to one who is not already drawn to Christ. It is premature to talk with others of the exact limits of inspiration. Let them first read the Gospels, read them as they would read any other book, with any theory of inspiration or with none, with the one aim of learning the truth about Jesus Christ, of finding in the book what is pure, and noble, and elevating; let them first learn to admire, to love, to copy, to serve Jesus Christ; and I care not what theory they may form of inspiration; they will have got the thing, and then they will not be over-anxious to define it.” In a word, to be a Christian, all you have to believe is that a real power infinitely higher than man manifested itself to man through the series of historical causes which prepared the way for Jesus Christ, and most perfectly of all in Jesus Christ himself. Believe this, and the antecedent improbability of miracle vanishes at once, while the mind is prepared to accept as historical events, physical marvels which are plainly asserted to have happened in close association with what is super-human on the spiritual side; but as regards all individual miracles, you are free to weigh the evidence for them individually and on their own basis; they do not all “stand or fall together,” but,—so, at least, we should interpret Mr. Wilson’s meaning, though we are now speaking for ourselves, and not for him,—those miracles which are most closely implicated, most absolutely in harmony, with the spiritual marvels of revelation, will stand most firmly; while those completely separable from those spiritual marvels, and standing in what may seem accidental relations with them, will remain on a distinct plane of evidence of their own, and we shall feel perfectly free to say in our own minds, ‘Whether that really happened exactly as it is there declared to have happened, is a question on which we do not feel called upon to profess any decided opinion, nor are we even capable of forming such an opinion. We can only say that the sufficient evidence on which we should be ready to believe it is hardly in existence; and that whether it was a miracle or a natural event glorified by the halo of popular tradition, makes absolutely no difference to the substantial truth of the history of the divine education of Israel, or to the culmination of that education in the life and death and resurrection and ascension of Christ and in the descent of the Holy Spirit on his disciples.’

Thus far goes the drift—as we understand it—of Mr. Wilson’s first lecture. The second lecture, on the moral difficulties of the Bible, insists on the view that the divine inspiration of man is necessarily relative to the actual historical condition of the race by whom that inspiration is received. All that is needful to compel the belief that a divine agency external to man is engaged in his education and purification, is the evidence that whatever his actual condition, he finds within him, and especially within the hearts of his best religious teachers, a power which constrains him, against the grain of his nature, to become holier and purer than he is;—no matter whether that which to one century is far holier and better than the spiritual life of that century, seems to us looking back, after the better experience of thirty or forty centuries more, less excellent than the best spiritual life of our own day. “We must judge of a divine command in the Old Testament by the following considerations. The voice spoke in the heart, not outside it, and was but the voice of the conscience enlightened up to its then standard, and receiving from the ever-present, ever-acting Spirit of God, such fresh enlightenment or inspiration as it could bear. Did the voice seem wrong to them? Was it not in general a call to something higher, to some fresh duty? Could it have been intelligible, if given in the modes of thought of this century, so widely separate as they are? and why of this century rather than of any other, past or to come? To my mind, the only intelligible revelation is the gradual, historical, accommodated revelation. Such commands or permissions are only so far given to us as they are applicable to our conditions of society and morals; and here is the function of intellect, an ample sphere for our keenest moral judgment and most trained insight.” And Mr. Wilson illustrates his meaning by saying of the command to Abraham to take his son Isaac and to offer him as a burnt offering:—“I, for one, can only interpret this as in any sense a command from God by the help that I get from the historical view of revelation that I have been setting forth. The inner voice of God in our hearts and later revelation, tell us this command is wrong to us; if the outer voice tells us that it is right to us, the contradiction is intolerable, and even maddening. But the question is not what the inner voice in our hearts now says, but what it said in Abraham’s, nearly four thousand years ago. And to understand this we have only to reflect that, strange as it may seem, the offering of the first-born was then common; that it was no moral shock, only a sorrow and trial to Abraham; and that the command was used,—its importance is that it was used,—not to sanction, but to abolish human sacrifices, and to look forward by a long series of types to the perfect sacrifice of will and life that Christ made on the Cross.” That is finely put, and we wholly agree with the view expressed, but we should like to add to what Mr. Wilson says, that the only reason, so far as we can judge, why the command addressed to Abraham is “wrong to us,” and would be simply incredible to us as a divine command, is not in the least because we may not be required rightly, and in numbers of cases, to give up to death at least as certain as ever Abraham destined for Isaac, those who are as dear to us as ever Isaac was to Abraham, but solely because in his revelation of himself as a father, God has taught us to cherish the deeper human affections, and what they suggest to us, as truer and more decisive revelations of himself than any sort of external voice which would merely and blankly command the severing of those relations. We may be, and often are, commanded by the interior voice of duty to do what hazards the continuance of these relations on earth, and what ends, perhaps, in as complete a severance of them as that for which Abraham showed himself to be willing at God's command. But the difference is that since Abraham's time anything like a direct outrage on the sacredness of these affections has been forbidden, and that we have been taught, what Abraham till then had never been taught, that God reveals to us more of himself through the life of these affections,—and by that reverence which the Fifth Commandment especially enjoined,—than through any outward teaching of any other kind. Instead of representing,—as the religion of the Phœnicians represented,—the jealousy of God as if it were a jealousy felt by him of the existence of human affections, as if it were a jealousy felt by one who regarded himself as competing with human love for the exclusive devotion of his worshippers,—his revelation has explained the true divine jealousy as requiring the highest fidelity and purity in human relations, for the very purpose of educating us towards fidelity and purity in our relations to God. The relations of father and son, and of wife and husband, instead of being depreciated as in rivalry with religious worship, have been surrounded by his revelation with infinite mystery, and treated as training us to the truest conceptions of what our love for God himself ought to be. It is not that Abraham's lesson as to God's claim upon us for the willing surrender even of our dearest earthly treasure has ever been cancelled or reversed, but that it has been taught in a different manner,—first, by the careful forbidding of everything which outrages those deeper affections and tends to lower and degrade them; and next, by teaching us to consecrate these affections with all the mystery and glory of religious associations. The sacrifice of Isaac, seemingly accepted, but really forbidden, and thenceforward made the starting point of a new teaching as to the fatherhood of God and the revealing character of the higher affections of man,—a teaching developed till, as Mr. Wilson says, it culminated in the sacrifice of the Cross,—seems to us to furnish one of the noblest illustrations in history of the evolution of the highest religion out of a creed which, once significant but rude, was rapidly falling into a corrupt and cruel superstition when it was suddenly rescued from that degradation and expanded into the highest of all religions, by the supernatural providence of God.

JULES CLARETIE.

M. CLARETIE may be taken as the embodiment of what is best in contemporary French literature. While the author of "Le Million" is inferior in talent to no one of the younger French writers, he surpasses them all in width of range; as a playwright of some promise, a historical writer of real talent, a novel-writer of the first class, M. Claretie has been eulogised respectively by Théophile Gautier, by Michelet, by Sainte-Beuve. Besides all this, he is one of the ablest of French journalists, and his private character is most estimable. Yet neither is his many-sided talent so eminent, nor his goodness of heart so singular, as in themselves to entitle him to the notice of Englishmen, were it not that in virtues, as in shortcomings, he is a peculiarly good representative of the best tendencies of his race in our time. Now, just as we were compelled to notice, when defining the position of Challemlacour, that he was obliged to find a door of escape out of the individualistic philosophy of Humboldt, so, before speaking of M. Jules Claretie, we shall be forced to remark upon the individualism of the first half of this century in its influence upon literature. For M. Claretie represents far more completely than does M. Challemlacour the break-away from the past and the power of a new current of influence. In France, as elsewhere, the tide of feeling is now making towards equality, and not, as in the past, towards liberty; patriotism is beginning to restrain selfishness.

That the old belief had been pushed too far, that the isolation of the individual has resulted in universal dislocation fast becoming anarchical, is now a truism in social politics; but the influence of the old mot d'ordre upon literary and artistic productions, though just as obvious, is not so generally acknowledged. Yet the egotism of the individual in social matters finds its counterpart in literature in naked realism, and the earliest professor of the realistic analysis of character was Balzac. But, taking it for granted that the individual is a separate world complete in itself, and that his sensations, emotions, and thoughts should be presented as realistically as possible, it is still necessary, were it merely for the sake of true perspective, to decide whether the animal instincts or the reason should be looked upon as the mainspring of the human mechanism. The authoritative decision in favour of the animal was the next step; and this step, too, Balzac was the first to take. Speaking of his last novel, "Les Parents Pauvres," Sainte-Beuve, after noticing it as a new departure, says, "Vice is the mainspring and social depravity the subject-matter of this novel. Here the current of the impure overflows its banks." But in "Les Parents Pauvres" there were still "a few elevated and pathetic scenes which might move to tears," and such scenes were held to be idealistic and absurd by the immediate followers of the great novelist. "More realism!" was the cry; and the "Madame Bovary" of Flaubert supplied the demand. It was reserved for our day, and for M. Zola and his disciples to go lower still, and to describe nothing but greeds, desires, stupidities, and hates; to depict all women as vile, all men as bestial. The literary style, too, of the school would be disgusting, were it not ludicrous. It was in Figaro, we think, that M. Zola was pictured as a pion or usher, teaching a crowd of children in a village school. "Go to the blackboard, and write the word porc according to my method," is the order. The boy goes and writes cochon. "Very good!" exclaims the usher; "now write chair." The boy obeys, and viande is the result. These self-styled naturalists seem to think that all excellence of style consists in using "le mot propre d'autant plus volontiers, qu'il est malpropre."

But before these depths of absurdity in style and of sensuality in subject-matter were explored, the reaction had already set in. It will be doing no injustice to the purity and tenderness of feeling of Victor Hugo to point to the works of Renan as the first-fruits of the better time. But these works did not, even in France, exercise the influence for good that might have been expected from them. The time was not fully ripe. Frenchmen had to drain the cup to its very dregs before even the abler men among them would acknowledge that the moral law cannot be transgressed with impunity. For fifty years selfishness had been preached as the only commandment, and the lesson was carried into practice during twenty years of wide-spread corruption. Then came national disaster and national disgrace, and the new generation learnt by suffering what the preceding one had refused to learn of reason. Since 1870, the individual is required to abate something of his demands, for patriotism is recognised as being a condition necessary to national existence. Clearly, too, this sentiment has come to emphasise the teaching of Renan, that love must fill a larger place in the social life of the future. The consequences of this change of feeling are everywhere to be noticed. In literary productions the ideal is now respected, instead of being ridiculed as absurd, and writers are no longer ashamed of depicting men and women who aim at conquering their lower nature. In very many points, M. Claretie belongs to the new era. For instance, his own words may be cited in evidence of his patriotism. Speaking of his treatment of historical subjects, he says, he has followed Michelet in trying to depict "the very soul of the fatherland." "I would," he goes on, "give proof, if needs were, of chauvinisme; it is an honourable failing." Nor is his desire to portray character idealistically less pronounced. "I have composed novels," he writes, "for the purpose of putting in high relief all that is consoling and progressive in realism." To ask how far he has succeeded in this aim would be to attempt a criticism of all his works, for which there is here not sufficient space. It will be enough to consider briefly his latest and best novel, "Le Million." It is a description of the consequences of the present individualistic form of society, of the effects of extreme competition upon the character and the morals of a nation. On the one hand, Claretie introduces us to stockbrokers, and depicts the unbridled greed of the Bourse; we see the successful promoter or speculator winning immense sums, and courted of nearly all men. On the other hand, a bourgeois family is sketched, the head of which is brought daily nearer to bankruptcy by the fluctuations of commerce. Destitution as the reward of labour and honesty, riches obtained by cunning and dishonesty,—the contrast is somewhat too complete, even for purposes of art. But it must be remembered that the book was written immediately after the crisis on the Paris Bourse which was caused by the failure of the Union Générale. The character-drawing is in the main excellent, and shows a great advance upon any previous work of the author. Louis Ribeyre may be taken as the best type of the modern Frenchman; the laugh of Figaro has become somewhat sarcastic, if not bitter, in our modern struggle for existence. Généviève

Ribeyre is an almost perfect picture of the Parisienne of to-day. In her the longing for luxury and ease constantly tempt a somewhat sensualistic nature; she resists, but does not drive the temptation from her, and yet her affection for her husband is strong enough to win pardon for her weakness, when her punishment is taken into account. Emile Guillemand, the "promoter," is well drawn, as is his daughter, la cousinette. The language, too, of the book deserves praise; although somewhat too realistic for our taste, it has conspicuous merits of simplicity and clearness. Yet, high as this novel stands among contemporary productions, it only affords additional proof of the assertion that a chef d'œuvre of art is not to be looked for at present.

To-day is the day of the practical hero, of him who transmutes ideas into realities. No man can escape what must be called the necessities of the age. M. Claretie's novel is really an essay on social politics. As might be expected, when a man so mistakes his real function, the work done is inferior to the workman. It is as a man, and not as an artist that Jules Claretie is most interesting. He tells us that in his youth Janin advised him "to try to merit a grand burial;" and he takes the counsel seriously. For, "to merit a noble burial," he writes, "is to have merited by the dignity of a life's labour the regret of those who outlive us; it is to have been loved and esteemed, never to have repulsed an outstretched hand, nor disappointed a trembling hope, never to have closed the ear to the appeal of weakness, nor the door to any misfortune; it is to have encouraged all beginners, to have given pity to all the conquered." Just as the tendency of our time is towards equality, so its practical mission is to raise the lower classes, to aid the weak, to console suffering. It is M. Claretie's peculiar merit that, in his own line of work, he has been one of the first, as writer and as critic, to carry this creed into practice. "To me," he writes—and every one who knows the man or his works will attest his sincerity—"kindliness is one of the proofs and one of the forms of talent." Exactly as self-assertion belonged of right to the individualism of the past, so sympathy is the key-note of the nationalism of to-day. Self-respect is the distinctive virtue of the one creed; respect for others, the distinguishing feature of the other. Our age must aim at preparing the way for the reconciliation of the two in a higher unity, which shall include the merits of both; its proper and peculiar task is to embody in practice, and so realise, this feeling of sympathy for others which makes for equality, by raising the poor, aiding the helpless, reinstating "the dispossessed." Among the most notable in this new order of chivalry, the motto of which may be taken from Erckmann-Chatrian's last drama, Les Rantzau, "L'amour est plus fort que la haine,"—among the most notable, and not the least worthy, is M. Jules Claretie.

THE CLOSING OF THE SCOTTISH HIGHLANDS.

THE stress and strain of modern life have grown to a great intensity. Men live in restless anxiety, under constant pressure, with quickened brains and fevered pulses, until life has become a burden almost beyond endurance. Thus modern society has felt, as people of a more leisurely time never felt, the necessity of change and of relaxation. The need of change is not confined to any one class of society. It is general. Our wearied legislators are scattered wide over sea and land, are pursuing grouse or deer in the Scottish Highlands, or are further afield after other sorts of game. Clergymen, doctors, lawyers, men of literature and of science, seek to breathe the keen air of the mountains, and strengthen themselves for a new campaign. Working-men, too, seek to get a day among the hills, or at the sea-side. For all sorts and conditions of men, an opportunity of a holiday is highly desirable, and it is for the good of all that the opportunity should be easily found. As the years pass on, the difficulties in the way of relaxation constantly increase. We do not here speak of the growing pressure of business, and the increased value of time. We refer specially to the sad fact that the great bulk of the population are being more and more shut out from visiting those places of our land which, from their very nature, are peculiarly fitted to strengthen and reinvigorate man's decaying energies.

No doubt, the competition is keen with regard to such places. We should be the last to deny to our wearied men of wealth the needful quiet and seclusion. They also need the quiet of the hills, and the keenness of the mountain air. But they most certainly do not require, what they at present demand and take, many square miles of country for this purpose. In the Highlands of Scotland, a few moneyed families have possession of vast districts of country, from the use of which all their fellow-men are rigorously excluded. Tracts of heath and mountain, health-giving and bracing to wearied mortals, are visible in the distance; but the health-seeking traveller has to keep the beaten track, lest his rash foot should disturb the repose of grouse or deer. No fence or boundary meets the eye, and the unaccustomed tourist, thinking no wrong, joyfully starts to climb a hill and enjoy a larger prospect, when suddenly, like the followers of Rhoderick Dhu, a gamekeeper starts up, with the unwelcome information, "No road this way: this hill is preserved." Formerly, the unenclosed hill-sides were open to every comer, and no damage was done; in fact, it was not possible to do any damage to mere stone or heather. But of late years, the mania for the preservation of grouse and deer has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. It is true, no doubt, that the number of those who seek the hill-sides in summer and in autumn has multiplied to an extraordinary degree. Hundreds are now to be found where a short while ago no human foot strayed. It is also true that the number of "shooting tenants" has vastly increased. The increase in both cases is due to the pressure of city and of business life. The causes which induce those who have the power, to pay some hundreds or thousands of pounds for the right of shooting over some few miles of moor and mountain, are identical with those which urge a poorer man to explore our Highland glens or climb the Highland mountains. And the question becomes urgent, more urgent every year, whether the few can continue to exclude the many from those vast, unenclosed, and uncultivated regions of the country. It is one aspect of a great and manifold problem, the solution of which will tax the wisdom of our statesmen to the uttermost. In speaking of national parks, we lately suggested that no additional right should be allowed to accrue to the present owners and occupiers of the Lake country. We are afraid that the suggestion comes too late with regard to the Highlands of Scotland. The public are already shut out from the greater part of the Highlands. In the uplands of Perthshire, scientific botanists are sternly shut out from the mountains,—"A wooden hut has been erected, on the track to Speyside, to contain a watcher, to see that no one leaves the track to trespass on Cairntoul or Ben Macdhui." Visitors at Braemar—one of the most celebrated of the health resorts of Scotland—cannot obtain leave to cross the Dee during the shooting season, and only grudgingly at any time. These are only samples of the kind of thing which is being done all over the Highlands of Scotland, at the present hour.

The disgust and anger of many people at this state of things are very manifest. They are finding vent in speech and in print, and they will grow from more to more. Already the growl has become terrible in its intensity. If the holders of privilege do not make timely concessions, the result will be far from agreeable. At present, they may buy the Sybilline leaves at a low price. Liberty to stroll through the forests, to climb the mountains, freedom to roam over barren moors, without being checked and bullied by the underlings of the shooting tenant, will give contentment. But let the encroachment go on for a little more, and the right of exclusive solitude on the part of the few will be ruthlessly taken away. No one grudges them a reasonable amount of seclusion. Let them, however, be reasonable, and only take what they need.

In this connection we cannot but think of the effects of the present system on the underlings themselves. The permanent gamekeeper or forester may be a decent member of society. But the development of the demand for shooting moors has led to the evolution of a kind of character which is fatal and disastrous. A good many men and lads find employment for a few months during the shooting season. They are overworked, over-fed, and over-paid for about two months of the year. They idle and loaf about for the rest of the year, and become utterly useless for any honourable industry. It is curious to reflect on the degenerating effect of work and toil which ends only in the pleasure of others. A lad hired to carry the clubs of a golfer seldom learns a trade, or gives himself to steady work of any kind. And a young man who is hired to carry a game bag scarcely ever turns out well. Billiard-markers are usually among the offscourings of society. In all cases in which the pursuit of pleasure is turned to a business, and in which men are hired for no profitable work, but only for the promoting of the pleasure of others, with rare exceptions the men so hired are utterly ruined. In them there is no serious aim in life, no weighty responsibility, nor any hope of progress. It is with grief, therefore, that we witness the development of a system which is largely based on selfishness and disregard of the interest of other people, and which issues in the demoralisation and ruin of a large number of human-beings.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE STATE OF EGYPT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Since I last wrote to you six weeks have elapsed, during which cholera has been sweeping with a heavy hand over Egypt, an event surely calculated to call forth any vigour that might exist in the Government; an event which has called forth at the best apathy, at the worst obstruction.

I have no intention of distressing your readers with an account of the miseries of Damietta and Mansourah, perishing and starving inside a cruel police cordon. They have heard all about that already. What I wish to lay before you is the action of the Government, and what may be inferred from that action. The action of the Government!—better say the inaction. Sir A. Colvin left for Europe on June 26th. Since that date not a single meeting of the Council has been held. A few of the Ministers are in Cairo. The Khedive, Cherif Pasha, the President, and some others of the Cabinet are in Alexandria. That city, thanks to the purging by fire which it underwent last year, and probably to its constant sea breezes, has so far only slightly suffered from cholera. But its zealous citizens have taken other means to keep off the dreaded enemy. When cholera appeared in Cairo, now more than three weeks ago, Alexandria cut itself off by a cordon from all the rest of Egypt. All trains were stopped, and a strict quarantine put on every one wishing to enter the town. So that if I had a matter of the first political importance to communicate to Cherif Pasha, I should have to wait seven days on the outskirts of Alexandria before being admitted to his presence.

Now, no one accuses either the Khedive or Cherif of being cowards. But, really, it is unpleasantly hot in Cairo, and it is disagreeable to be constantly meeting funerals. And it is much cooler at Alexandria, and so there they stay, cut off from their country, and—this is the main point—perfectly contented to leave the Government of the country at a critical period in the hands of English strangers. For the one prominent subject is cholera, and General Stephenson and Surgeon-General Hunter will tell you that all they ever expect from their Egyptian colleagues, in the Sanitary Council which has so successfully grappled with the disease in Cairo, is not to be thwarted.

In my last letter, I said we English had not done much to make ourselves popular in Egypt. We have done something now, and the quarter of the community from which that something has come is not, perhaps, where it would have been looked for,—it is the Army. When Italians, Greeks, and Levantines were fleeing the country in abject terror, when one of the Cabinet Ministers was imploring to be allowed to resign office, and flee too, when Egyptian doctors were refusing to attend their dying countrymen, the brave old Guardsman who commands our Army here was going round the Arab hospitals with a kind look and a shake of the hand to the wretched patients. It was General Stephenson, who, before Dr. Hunter's arrival, in the interests of his Army summoned the Sanitary Council in Cairo, and from that date remedial measures have been taken. Cairo owes many a life to the English General.

The English Army is, of course, supplied with surgeons who have faithfully done their duty, as might have been expected. Not so Sir Evelyn Wood's Egyptian Army. In it, with one exception, the doctors are Egyptians, and they have not distinguished themselves. When the cholera broke out in the Army, Sir Evelyn himself was half-way through the Suez Canal on his way home. The next day, to the amazement of his men, he was back at his post in Cairo. The shortcomings of the doctors only proved the opportunity for his officers to show what was in them. They have doctored, they have nursed, they have fed, they have even buried their young Arab soldiers with a devotion beyond all praise; and if that Army is called on to fight, whether under the Crescent or the Cross, we may be assured it will faithfully follow its English leaders.

An old Egyptian Pasha, high in the Government service, said to me the other day that the conduct of our English Army in Cairo was a constant source of wonder to him. "Your men go in and out among the Arabs, ride donkeys, frequent the shops, and no one takes the least notice of them as strangers. All the months they have been here there has not been one single disturbance between them and the people; while," he added, "I venture to say, if it had been a French or an Italian army, there would have been squabbles every day." From which I argue, that if we succeed in attaining to popularity here, it will be first due to the conduct of our Army, from the General down to the honest lads in the ranks. But when we turn from the Army, there is little good to be reported. The Constabulary are still in a muddle, the English officers complaining of want of support from their chief, and sending in their resignations. People ask, when they see that chief, "Is it possible that this easy-going, mild-eyed Pasha was once the darling of the British Cavalry, and the General that kept Russia out of Constantinople with his famous lines?" There seems little left of that energy now.

Sir Benson Maxwell and the Belgian Judges are exactly as they were six weeks ago, and absolutely nothing has been done to start their Courts. I told you how a Commission had approved of the Berber and Souakim Railway, but nothing had been done. Now, the reason has come out. While the traffic of the Soudan comes down the Nile Valley, it is safe from foreign interference. Not so, if it finds a seaport at Souakim. Egypt has no ships to protect its Red-Sea trade. Who knows how it might be cut off, how the Soudan itself might, with this outlet, get independent of Egypt, and slip out of its nerveless grasp altogether? But if England would guarantee the Red-Sea trade, then, says the Egyptian, we will make the railway. And this is the point all is coming to. The old Pasha I have above quoted said to me, "There are some things a nation may do, and some that they must do. Now, God will force you English to take charge of Egypt, whether you like it or not." I have heard almost the same words from one of Lesseps' French engineers, from whom I should have least expected it. I have been assured by a Swiss landholder well known in Egypt that this was the conclusion arrived at by the foreign community of Alexandria. In old days, he told me, when suffering from the misgovernment of the country, that he could always go straight to Ismail, who would, on the spot, write out such an order as no Mudir would dare to dispute. That cannot be done now. The Mudir has nothing to fear from despotism. He shelters himself behind routine, offers passive resistance to all movement, and feels secure. Unhappy Egypt! Her Fellahin can send up only a dumb cry to Heaven, "Come over, and help us!" Last year she had war, then came cattle disease. A worm is eating the cotton, pestilence is raging through the land, and a wail is going up, for, as in that awful night when the Passover was instituted, in Damietta and Mansourah, Chebin and Boulak, Giseh and Old Cairo, there are not many houses where there has not been one dead. Now yet another calamity threatens the land. The Nile is rising with quite abnormal rapidity, and there are grave apprehensions of an inundation. Lower Egypt is everywhere protected by embankments, within which at present the country is one great green field of cotton, maize, and millet. It is the yearly duty of the corvées to repair these embankments, but they have been much neglected since the war. Now the Mudirs are being ordered to arouse the village Sheiks, and the wretched peasants must rise from their cholera-beds and work as best they can. Should the embankments be breached, wide-spread misery, perhaps famine, must follow.

War, blight, murrain, pestilence, floods! Surely these are misfortunes enough for one year. I challenge any fellow Anglo-Egyptian to say that I am drawing too dark a picture. And through it all, the tribute must be paid. The peasant may have to sell his all, but he must pay his share of the debts incurred by the heartless despot Ismail (who, by the way, has just bought an estate in Egypt for £280,000). The foreign Bondholder must get his dividends. Turkey must get her tribute, Turkey, that never rendered one single service to Egypt. In my last letter, I pointed out that unless we have increased our Army by a number of men equal to those serving in Egypt, we are really reducing our Army Estimates at the expense of Egypt. Can you not, Sir, lay this before England, and ask whether it is just? Supposing we were suddenly to require these men, say, for an Indian mutiny, should we not remove them from Egypt at once? Is it just, then, to make Egypt pay for them? Is the Government too much afraid of its electors to act justly to this poor little country in this matter? Are the electors so hard-hearted?

I must not write more, or there might be something to say from Egypt's side about the Suez Canal.—I am, Sir, &c.,
Egypt, August 10th. ANGLO-EGYPTIAN.

CROWN LANDS ADMINISTRATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your timely article on Crown Lands' Administration, sets out in the clearest light the serious danger to the public interest attending the theory and practice of that administration, as exemplified in the recent sales of the Southport foreshore, and the Crown manor of Esher and Escott. Indeed, the case against the Duchy Office, in the affairs of the Southport foreshore, is far stronger than might be inferred from the facts as adduced in your columns. After years of protracted negotiations between the Duchy and the Southport Corporation, the sale of the foreshore was suddenly, in April last, concluded by the former with the lords of the manor,—the Southport deputation, then in London, having been completely taken by surprise and allowed a few hours only to formulate their counter-offer. Yet that offer, so far from falling short, was actually in excess of the price accepted from the riparian owners. For the Southport people offered £12,000, cash down, for 4,000 acres, the possession of which, as being continuous with the borough boundaries, they regarded as of vital consequence to the interests of the town; whilst for the remaining portion—about 5,000 acres—they proposed to give a sum equal to 5 per cent. of the ultimate value of the land after reclamation, a sum which has been estimated as high as £26,000, and which, at the lowest computation, must have raised the total price to be paid to the Duchy far above the £15,000 actually accepted from the lords of the manor. The latter, indeed, must evidently be thinking very well of their purchase, for they would appear, from a letter submitted by their agents only two days ago to the Town Council of Southport, to be now asking for the fractional quantity of some 1,300 acres alone of foreshore, the modest price of £25,000, or a larger sum by £10,000 than the price they have actually agreed to pay to the Duchy for the whole 9,000 acres. It is not quite so clear that the officials of the Duchy can be equally entitled to congratulate themselves upon a transaction which, whilst it is pretty certain to result in the most serious injury to a large and popular watering-place, seems also not unlikely to turn out anything but a good bargain for the Crown.

On a par with the lamentable action of the Duchy in this matter of the Southport foreshore, must be accounted the not less indefensible conduct of the Office of Woods and Forests in disposing of that part of the Crown manor of Esher which comprises the beautiful Commons of Esher and Ockshott. After so questionable a performance, both Parliament and the public may be excused for viewing with natural misgiving the course taken in the present Session by this same Department in promoting a Bill (Crown Lands) with the double object of extinguishing, by the arbitrary means of compulsory purchase, the wholesome fuel-rights so long enjoyed by commoners of the New Forest, and of acquiring greatly extended powers for the leasing of foreshores,—the latter apparently in the teeth of the admirable Report upon Foreshores issued some years ago by the Board of Trade, in which any longer term than thirty-one years is deprecated for such leases.

Altogether, the experience of the present Session alone must have sufficed to make it clear that the Departments charged with the administration of Crown lands cannot be safely trusted to act at all times upon a broad and enlightened view of the requirements of the public interest, and that if all danger to that interest is to be obviated, it can only be as you suggest, by insisting that transactions such as those in question shall in no case be carried out without the direct sanction of Parliament. We may, I think, rest assured that a Resolution to that effect will be among the very first questions submitted for the consideration of the House of Commons in the new Session of 1884.—I am, Sir, &c., Southport, August 16th.

BLOCKING BILLS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the remarks of the Spectator to-day on "Blocking Bills in Parliament," the following statement is made:—"A proposal that a Legislature must, like a jury, give an unanimous verdict, has never, we believe, been formulated in any constitution. . . . However desirable it may be that minorities should make their voices heard, it has never yet been suggested that they should have a veto on legislation, still less that a minority of one should enjoy this exceptional privilege." Historically, this statement is not correct, but the chief instance which history supplies of such a veto as you describe will serve rather to strengthen your general argument. The constitution of Poland formulated precisely this principle, that the opposition of a single member of the Legislature should bar the enactment of any law; and more than this, that the veto of any single member upon the proceedings should be sufficient to dissolve the Diet on all occasions, except when it had been summoned for the election of a King. Moreover, this liberum veto was regarded as the keystone of the Polish Constitution, and the supreme guarantee of the freedom and independence of the nobility. Readers of Carlyle's "History of Frederick the Great" will remember the grimly humorous manner in which he deals with these free and independent legislators and their pozwalam. The result of this surrender of all power of united action is not unknown.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AND THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I fully agree with all you say respecting Mr. Chamberlain and the Bankruptcy Bill, but will not his decision to delegate the selection of officials to work it to Departmental Committees prove to be a mistake?

In all the counties with which I am acquainted, the Bankruptcy Courts are hotbeds of Toryism, and if the new officials are selected, as they probably will be, from these, the working of the new Act can scarcely fail to be impeded by the red-tapeism thus imported.

The new Act requires new blood to work it, and Mr. Chamberlain, having constructed such excellent machinery, should be careful to secure efficient and unprejudiced hands to direct it.—I am, Sir, &c.,

NATURAL LAW IN THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I hope I shall not be thought intrusive in offering some remarks suggested by the reply with which Mr. James Stalker has honoured my former letter. I can by no means admit that the view to which I ventured to call attention at all impairs the full significance of the Scriptural expressions concerning the new birth. Having this very view in my mind, I wrote in another paper, four years ago, "This mystic death and birth is the keynote of all profound religious teaching, and that which distinguishes the ordinary religious mind from spiritual insight is just the tendency to interpret these expressions as merely figurative, or, indeed, to ignore them altogether." Surely the evolution in consciousness of a distinct principle in man is a process whereby he may with literal truth be said to be "born again." He has thus a new basis of spontaneity, the will of another nature. Nor, looking at the express condition, a death to self, or the individual will, can we conceive this principle as other than the true being of man as such, that which constitutes the inner or spiritual solidarity of the race, making each one with all,—distinctive individuality becoming henceforward merely functional in the universal organism. That, if he is originally the "image of God," is his divine humanity. He is not said to be "dead" simply, but "dead in trespasses and sins." His true life can find no expression, is lost to consciousness, by reason of his self-assertive individual will, which, as Hinton showed, is his "death." But his humanity is a deeper fact than his individuality, albeit, according to the Christian idea, it must be organised or reorganised by a power in which it is already a voluntary consciousness. With what propriety could the word "regeneration" be used of a "conversion" similar to that effected in the physical order, where there is no pre-existing germ? On the other hand, that we are born again "from an incorruptible seed" is expressly stated (1 Peter i., 23).

The doctrine of spiritual evolution can, of course, be presented in other aspects than the Christian one. Thus, in Eastern religious systems it is supposed that the true Atma, or Universal Self, will come to consciousness in each, as the result of a radical suppression of individualism. This suppression is made the condition alike in these systems and in Christianity. But in the former it is considered all-sufficient, the sun shining out, as it were, on the dispersal of the clouds; while the Christian, less possessed with the idea that the individual Ego itself is an illusion of a false consciousness, follows another analogy of nature. The Sun of Righteousness is externalised, and its operation is represented as giving vital activity to the spiritual seed, which is already the individual form and preappointed function in the divine universal life. The best expression, I think, of this idea is to be found in the writings of Hinton; especially in the chapters on "The Self and Consciousness" and on "Holiness," in his "Philosophy and Religion."

Mr. Drummond's argument against spiritual abiogenesis is clearly directed against the usual view of evolution, which regards it as resulting from natural selection, in the sense of mere perpetuation and development of rudimentary adaptations to environment. He ignores the teleological view of it which has the authority of such distinguished naturalists as Mr. A. R. Wallace and Mr. St. George Mivart. That, in the spiritual as in the physical, would really mean a prior involution of the principles or forms to be successively manifested,—that which is most deeply and centrally buried, or involved, being the highest or most divine. What I find most admirable in Mr. Drummond's book is his elucidation of the great principle, too little familiar to even our best thought, that in physical and spiritual phenomena the very same laws of nature are at work. I may observe that this idea is also much insisted upon in the writings of Law, as in metaphysics it is the characteristic feature of Schelling's "Identity" philosophy. Whether Mr. Drummond's applications of it to theology are sustainable is of less importance than the principle itself, of which he is so competent an exponent. I believe his book will give a new impulse and direction to religious and philosophical thought. Only I must protest against Mr. Stalker's assumption that the opinion I tried to represent, and especially the authors to whom I referred, are Pelagian, since they hold the doctrine of regeneration in as real a sense as Mr. Drummond, though not that of conversion quite as he understands it. As to myself, however, it is proper to add, not to sail under false colours, that I do not profess Christianity in any doctrinal sense which I can see to be distinctive and exclusive.

Apologising for the length of this letter, and thanking Mr. Stalker for his kind mention of my former remarks, and for the notice of which he has thought them worthy,—I am, Sir, &c.,

C. C. M.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As one who has thought much and written on this important subject, which one of your correspondents did me the favour to mention, I would ask permission to be allowed to draw attention to the fact that your correspondents are in imminent danger, from Mr. Drummond's book, of erecting the misleading doctrine of Substantive Regeneration.

The leading point is, that we are to consider regeneration to be a spiritual biogenesis, according to the law of natural biogenesis, that as the mineral body becomes invested with life, so the natural man with spiritual life. Mr. Drummond says, "The change of state here is not, as in physics, a mere change of direction, the affections directed to a new object, the will into a new channel. The change involves all this, but is something deeper. It is a change of nature, a regeneration, a passing from death into life."

This doctrine, in the above sense, is not the doctrine of the Bible, which teaches a moral regeneration only, a regeneration of the moral nature, and not of the nature in itself. The Scriptures declare the unregenerated man to be dead; but, mark, they call to him, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." This death is manifestly, therefore, a moral death, voluntarily chosen, and the way out of it is by voluntarily awaking to light and life. They declare him to be in darkness, but teach this is the condemnation, that "light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light;" and declare, "He that hateth his brother is in darkness." The carnal mind, which is in enmity against God, is not a substance, or a nature in itself that hates God, which were impossible; we cannot have a moral substance of any kind. Enmity is ill-will, is a disposition of mind, and is the minding of the flesh,—viz., a voluntary committal of the mind to the desires of the flesh, and is, therefore, a guilty state of mind.

The Scriptures declare that men require to be regenerated, but define regeneration as "the interrogation of a good conscience towards God" (Revised Version) to be a washing away of sins. Similarly, the passing from darkness to light is from the moral darkness of sin, to the moral light of righteousness. There is a new creation, or a new creature; but it is in righteousness and true holiness. That the new creation and new image is only moral, and not of the nature in itself, is put beyond all doubt by St. Peter, when he writes to Christians asking them to be "obedient children, not fashioning themselves according to the former lusts." The members which have been yielded unto iniquity are not to have their nature changed, but are to be yielded unto God.

It is important to notice the logical outcome of the doctrine of spiritual biogenesis. If the biogenesis is to be taken absolutely, to be rational, we must pity only, and never blame the sinner. His nature is dark and dead, and requires to be changed. The blame and guilt which the Bible lays to his charge, and his future punishment, are, if we use our reason, in the highest degree irrational and unjust, from the point of view of biogenesis. How can he help rejecting Christ? Christ is God, and the nature of his mind is enmity against God. But, and if, we refuse to reason, then we have another bewildering mystery linked to the mystery of spiritual biogenesis. Again, the command of the Bible to repent, that is, for the man to blame himself and justify God, is honestly impossible. So that the tendency of this doctrine is either to produce hypocrisy, universalism, or atheism.

Turn we now to Scriptural teaching, and instead of mystery linked to mystery, all is intelligible. Our primitive creation in Adam placed us in purpose already in the spiritual kingdom; but in him we fell, and it has come to pass that we have given our faculties to the service of the kingdom of darkness, instead of the kingdom of light. It is not our nature in itself of which the Bible complains, but the wrong use to which we have put it. We have established psychical affiliations with wrong and worthless interests, instead of with the right and infinitely valuable interests of God. It is the affiliations that must be changed, and not the nature. We must repent, change our minds, must make to ourselves a new heart and a right spirit; and God makes them, by furnishing us with all the moral suasion, by his truth and his Spirit, necessary to accomplish these things. By his Spirit he also washes our nature from the roots of wrong affiliations, but does not change the nature. Moreover, he abides in us, not incarnate, according to the teaching of biogenesis (which, by the way, is an unadvised thing to say,—there has been but one Incarnation), but as a personal being, evermore essentially himself, and evermore holding personal and moral converse with the soul. The union, moreover, of "one spirit with the Lord" is not substantive, but moral; we can break it, can grieve or resist the gentle guest whose presence hallows and sanctifies our nature, and confers on us the fellowship of the spiritual kingdom of God.

It will thus be seen that, according to the light of Scripture, of true moral science, and of right reason, the whole fabric of the doctrine of spiritual biogenesis, according to the natural law of biogenesis (except as a beautiful parable), comes entirely to the ground.—I am, Sir, &c.,

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have not yet seen Mr. Drummond's work on "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," but I wish to mention that I am the author of a work entitled "The Scientific Bases of Faith" (Macmillan, 1873), which treats of the same class of subjects. I there maintain that evolution is true, and that the infallibility of the Holy Scriptures is an untenable doctrine; but that the new ideas about the worlds of nature and of man form a better basis than the old for Christian theology, understanding by this latter the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Atonement, eternal life, and a final general restoration. The work was reviewed in the Spectator soon after it was published.—I am, Sir, &c.,

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The recent debate in the House of Lords on the Pigeon-shooting Bill is instructive in respect of the arguments adduced both against and for the measure. One noble lord said the shooting of pigeons for sport was no more cruel than the shooting of pheasants at the end of a covert; another, that it was less cruel than the driving of grouse. The Duke of Argyll said in reply he could only defend these customs as the means of killing animals for food which could not be otherwise obtained. Would he say the same of fox-hunting, or of the chase of the deer? The latter animal is an article of food, but is there no other way of securing it than by the torture of a stag-hunt, or even by the less objectionable method of stalking? It is as well to confess the truth at once,—that the charm in these things is simply the sport, and to meet honestly the question which is sure sooner or later, as genuine civilisation advances, to find a wide and eager discussion. Do such pursuits savour of humanity and refinement, or of cruelty and barbarism? Nor am I the first to draw attention to this. You, Sir, have anticipated me, in the high probability that much of the brutality prevalent among the lower classes is due to the sporting practices of their superiors.—I am, Sir, &c., B. P. P.

ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A little illustration of canine intelligence shown by my colley, "Dido," may be added to those which have lately appeared in the Spectator. The dog was lying on the floor, in a room in which I was preparing to go out. An old servant was present, and when I had given her directions about an errand on which she was going, I said, "You will take 'Dido' with you?" She assented, and the dog directly got up to follow her down-stairs. I then remembered that I should want a cab; so I asked the servant to send one, and not to leave the house till I rang the bell. On her leaving the room, "Dido" resumed her quiet attitude on the floor, with her nose to the carpet. In rather less than ten minutes I rang the bell, and the dog at once sprang up and ran down-stairs to join her companion. I had not spoken a word after asking the servant to wait for the bell. Was this word-reading, or voice-reading, or thought-reading?—I am, Sir, &c., S. E. DE MORGAN.

"A SOLDIER'S LIFE & WORK IN SOUTH AFRICA."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your review (4th inst.) of the above work, a remark is made about "corroboration" of what a captain of the 24th Regiment, who marched out with the General's force from Isandhlwana, on January 22nd, 1879, said:—"Neither Lord Chelmsford nor his Staff left any orders, but that, when miles away from the camp, Lord Chelmsford asked what orders had been left for Colonel Pulleine." If the matter be of any interest to your readers, I beg to offer the following corroboration, which has but lately come to my knowledge.

On January 27th, 1879, the Editor of the Natal Witness wrote to Colonel Crealock, Lord Chelmsford's Military Secretary, asking (amongst other queries) about the General's orders; to which Colonel Crealock replied,—“No written orders or spoken orders by General were issued; Colonel Glyn gave his own orders.”—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

"ACROSS THE ESTUARY, SOUTH DEVON."

VAGUE sounds are stirring in the outer world,
Which wake an echo in the world within me;
The frowning mists across the valley hurled
To saddened musings by the casement win me:
And on my rushing thoughts are borne along
The waves of sudden and unpurposed song.

But now, the Sun painted in artist-splendour
The varied outlines of the sea and shore;
The sloping woods were bathed in hues so tender,
That master's canvas ne'er such glories wore;
Yet where enrobed in purple gold shone they,
Now spreads a monotone of lifeless gray.

The great Enchanter's momentary wand
Darkens the landscape and the mind as one;
The headlands face me o'er the bay beyond
Robbed both of us together of our sun;
And out of unguessed caverns creeps the rain,
To touch the spirit with a nameless pain.

Yon white and flickering sail, which flashed but now
Across the bright waves blue as Brenda's eyes,
Droops wet and wearied o'er the vessel's prow
On hueless wastes caught by a swift surprise,
Which clouds engendered of the vaporous sea
Bring o'er the startled scene to master me.

Like beacons on the world's uncertain course,
Fair homes set gem-like in the further trees
Seemed whispering of untired Love's quiet force,
A silver girdle linking ours to these;
And for Home's message to that shore from this,
The lapping waters bore a greeting kiss.

But now—and so but now—Life seemed to wear
High purpose for a marriage-robe of power,
And all her pulses and her will to share
The sun-enkindled promise of the hour;
Till, as the mist wraps the far shore from view,
It falls as heavy on my spirit too.

Is this, then, Life? its pledges sharply broken,
Even at their fairest and most golden link;
Do they the fate of rosy dreams betoken,
Those emerald ripples turned to sullen ink?
And were it wiser anchorless to roam,
Than nail high hopes to the frail walls of Home?

Off with such burrs of thought! the very spell
Which bids me throw these fancies on the page
Awakes new chords and brighter songs to swell
The happy burden of on-coming age,
And Cloudland's fretful shapes to soar above
To the fixed firmament of God and Love.

Out and beyond the steady light is shining,
Which from the steady heart no mist can veil,
Bright beyond man's divinest of divining,
Where all his mists of thought must melt and fail,
And, as e'en now the clouds roll off the shore,
Obscure the homes of promise nevermore.

HERMAN MERIVALE.

HORÆ PETRINÆ.*

THERE is hardly, we think, enough that is new in this book to have justified its publication in its present form, so soon after the appearance of Dr. Howson's lectures on "The Evidential Value of the Acts of the Apostles," a work which contains by far the most important part of the substance of this little volume. Especially are we disappointed in not finding in it any such discussion as we should have expected of the authenticity of the Second Epistle of Peter, for which this was clearly the place. We are far, however, from saying that this little treatise is valueless. To those who have not read the book published last year, it will appear of considerable interest. But the title suggests more than the book actually performs. Moreover, there are passages in this little book which look like what Lord Wemyss spoke of the other day, in relation to a resolution of his own, as mere "padding,"—the following, for instance, on the fifteen days spent by St. Paul with St. Peter, on St. Paul's first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion:—

"It is remarkable that by those who have meditated and written carefully on Holy Scripture so little stress has been laid on this fortnight spent together by these two apostolic men. Hardly any period of the same duration can be named more full of interest and more suggestive of thought. The exact specifying of 'fifteen days' has something in it to attract attention. It reminds us of that specifying of 'seven days' which we find more than once, and in connection with very various places, in the Acts of the Apostles. Probably St. Peter and St. Paul spent two Sundays together, joining with other Christians on those days in prayer and in 'the breaking of bread.' But it is the personal communion of the two men, and the influence exerted by each upon the other, to which our attention is, under present circumstances, chiefly directed. Peter would discourse of his Master and of the things of which he had had a loving and living experience; he would speak of Galilee and of the Resurrection: and perhaps we may trace the effects of these days in St. Paul's mention of Galilee, when preaching at Antioch in Pisidia, and in his manner of writing to the Corinthians concerning the Resurrection. Certainly he seems to speak of himself in this matter as having been destitute of a privilege which 'Cephas' and others had possessed. 'Last of all He was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time.' And, to turn to what is most to our purpose, to speculate upon the permanent results which may have been produced in St. Peter by this precious time of close companionship with St. Paul, is it not reasonable to believe that the theological training of the latter, his strong logical faculty, his intimate 'revelations' in the Gospel, may have had their effect, ever afterwards, in the teaching of the former? Divine inspiration made use of such opportunities, as of other opportunities. By certain destructive critics the resemblance of St. Peter's teaching in his First Epistle to the language of St. Paul in some of his epistles has been mentioned as a suspicious fact. What if, through the natural consequences of this memorable companionship at Jerusalem, vague suspicion of fraud is turned into reasonable evidence of truth?"

Why has the exact specifying of fifteen days something in it to attract attention? And why does it remind us of the exact specifying of "seven" days, more than any specified period of days would remind us of any other exact specifying of days, whether in ancient or in modern times? This is the kind of remark which, by its laborious and unmeaning emphasis, injures writings on evidence. And as for the "may-have-beens" and "what-ifs" in the latter part of this passage, one is forced to say that evidence which consists in "may-have-beens" and "what-ifs" is not evidence at all. However, this is one of the weakest pages which Dr. Howson's little book contains, and we are bound to say that very few of the 160 pages or so which we find in it are nearly as empty of substance as this. It is a pity that he should have swelled the little volume with even a few pages as feeble and helpless as the passage we have just extracted.

As a specimen of better work, where Dr. Howson points out a real, though only a latent and quite unconscious connection between the incidents in the Gospel which specially affected St. Peter, and his teaching and action after the resurrection and ascension of Christ, we may take the following remarks of Dean Howson on the adaptation of the Galilean training of St. Peter to produce the teaching which we find in his First Epistle, and to produce also the most original part of his apostolic policy in the early years of the Church at Jerusalem:—

"The miracle of the coin in the fish's mouth is unique in its nature, and it is connected, by all the features of a most marked individuality, with this Apostle. Those who received the customary tribute money for the Temple 'came to Peter and said, Doth not your master pay the tribute?' And Peter, with his usual impetuous haste, answered 'Yes.' He could not bear the thought that his Master should be thought defective in regard to any religious and loyal duty. But 'when Peter was come into the house, Jesus prevented him.' This singles him out from among the rest; and still more is such the effect of the concluding words, 'Take the piece of money, and give it unto them for Me and thee.' It would be well worth while, if general edification were our purpose, to dwell on all the instruction contained in the remarkable words addressed by Christ to Peter on this occasion, as, for instance, on the one hand, that he was Lord of the Temple, and the injunction, on the other hand, that we cannot be too careful to avoid placing stumbling-blocks in the way of the ignorant. But another part of the instruction is more in point here. The duty of paying tribute, whether secular or religious, is most clearly inculcated in the story of this miracle. Now St. Peter not only says in his First Epistle, 'Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake; honour all men; honour the king;' but he adds that we are to do this 'as being free,' and yet not using our freedom so as to do harm. And Christ said to his Apostle by the side of the lake, 'Then are the children free; notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast a hook.' Can we fail to see in this part of the epistle a reflection of the Lord's Galilean teaching, especially when we remember the words that were spoken in Peter's hearing on another occasion, 'Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's?' And if incidents connected with the Sea of Galilee had elements of powerful training for this Apostle's future life, we can still more definitely localise sacred influence of this kind in the city of Capernaum. This was the Lord's 'own city.' It also became the home of St. Peter. If we place these two facts together, they give to us a result full of meaning. Let us briefly employ two miracles to illustrate this general statement. It is difficult to think of the centurion whose servant was healed at Capernaum without calling to mind another centurion with whom Peter, a few years afterwards, was in close intercourse at Cæsarea. The admirable character of the two men must have left a deep and permanent impression upon his mind. The testimony, too, of the Jews was remarkably similar in the two cases. In the former instance they besought the Lord earnestly that he would grant the centurion's request, 'saying that he was worthy for whom he should do this: for he loveth our nation, and he hath built us a synagogue.' In the latter instance the messengers who come from Cæsarea to Joppa bear testimony to Peter that Cornelius is 'a just man, and one that feareth God, and of good report among all the nation of the Jews.' Nothing could be more likely to prepare Peter for the work which he was destined to do afterwards at Cæsarea than the occurrence which took place at Capernaum. He had heard his Lord say of a heathen soldier that he had not 'found so great faith, no, not in Israel,' and that 'many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven.' Such words must have found a lodging among Peter's thoughts, though they waited long before he was conscious of their full power. The silent loosening of prejudice is often imperceptible to the prejudiced mind itself."

That, so far as it goes, is genuine criticism. It brings out the connection between St. Peter's early and his later life, in cases where there was evidently no conscious reference in the mind of the later writer to the words of the earlier writing, though we can hardly think it possible that St. Peter would have written or acted as he did in the latter part of his life, if he had not passed through the earlier experiences to which the Dean of Chester refers us.

To take another illustration of the same harmony between St. Peter's memory of our Lord's teaching and his own subsequent teaching, Dean Howson holds that the fifth verse of the fifth chapter of his First Epistle, "All of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility," translated in the Revised Version, "Yea, all of you, gird yourselves with humility to serve one another," embodies an implicit and unconscious reference to Christ's action in girding himself with a towel and washing the disciples' feet at the Last Supper, though the word used by St. Peter is a word implying (as it ought to imply) a much more constant and habitual wearing of humility, than the word in St. John's Gospel implies in relation to the towel with which our Lord performed the temporary office of washing the Disciples' feet:—

"The word used in this latter phrase is very singular. The use of any word describing 'clothing' would hardly be expected in describing humility. Unless some special thought were in the writer's mind, humility would more naturally be spoken of as an inner growth of grace in the heart, as, indeed, it is elsewhere spoken of in this very epistle, where we read of 'that ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.' But the word itself is, as has been remarked, very singular. It denotes a servile garment purposely employed for a menial task—an article of dress adapted and fastened on for the occasion. Even if it were otherwise, it would be difficult to believe that St. Peter could have written this without remembering how the Lord washed his disciples' feet, and what he said on that occasion, and specially to Peter himself. If any reader of these pages had been Peter, could he have written it without this recollection? The Lord put on a servile garment for the occasion—he 'girded himself' before he addressed himself to that menial, gracious task, which was a parable in action never to be forgotten. This being so, how much force, how much life, is given to St. Peter's admonition! When his words come to us loaded with this loving, overwhelming remembrance, they bring to us all the weight of what our Saviour did and said on that sacred evening before the Crucifixion."

These are instances of the value of this little book, but we must say that if Dean Howson had given us less repetition of what he published last year on The Evidential Value of the Acts of the Apostles, and more careful criticism of the two Epistles of Peter, especially of the Second, on which, though he appears to incline to its genuineness, he says hardly anything, we should have thought the book a great deal more appropriate to the title given to it, and more worthy of the Dean's critical reputation. Nor can we say that we feel perfectly satisfied with such fragments of criticism of the two epistles as we do get. Take the criticism on the question whether the Babylon of St. Peter's First Epistle is the true Babylon, or the metaphorical Babylon of the Apocalypse,—in short, Rome.—Dean Howson quotes the dedication,—"Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia," and remarks upon it thus:—

"Now, in approaching the question, on which so much has been written, whether it was really the literal Eastern Babylon, or the great city of the West described under an allegorical name, from which St. Peter sent this letter, we have a strong prima facie argument, in the geographical order in which at the outset he ranges the Churches addressed by him. He begins with the north and sweeps round to the west. This would be quite unnatural in the case of one who was writing from a city of the West; but it would be an easy and obvious order to follow, when writing from a city of the East to residents in the provinces distributed according to this succession. This may seem, at first sight, a somewhat trivial argument; but it is really a strong one, because it rests on an obvious naturalness in the style of writing."

Now, no argument can be weaker than this. Whether a writer who writes from the east or from the west would find it more natural to begin with the north, and sweep round to the west, must depend, wholly, surely, on the natural bias of his own mind. Some would think of the more distant Churches first and of the nearer last, others would think of the nearer first and the more distant last; but who can say which would be the more natural to any given writer, unless he had before him a very great number of instances of the usual leaning of that writer's sentiment in matters of this kind? That argument seems to us to come to nothing. The next passage has more force in it. It refers to the closing verses of the First Epistle,—namely, "By Sylvanus, our faithful brother, as I account him, I have written unto you briefly, exhorting and testifying that this is the true grace of God: stand ye fast therein. She that is in Babylon elect together with you, saluteth you. And so doth Mark, my son. Salute one another with a kiss of love. Peace be unto you all that are in Christ." On this the Dean writes:—

"A still stronger argument in favour of the literal interpretation of the word 'Babylon' in this verse is the fact that an allegorical interpretation is altogether out of harmony with the tone and tenor of the passage, and of the whole epistle. Sylvanus is a literal messenger, definitely described by his true name. We should expect the same kind of language to be used of the places of writing. The epistle, too, deals with doctrinal statements and practical exhortations, and is altogether destitute of that mystical character which makes the metaphorical use of the word so evidently natural in the Apocalypse."

This is strong, so far as it goes, but as St. John, who was St. Peter's great friend, habitually speaks of Rome in the Apocalypse as Babylon, St. Peter may well have contracted from him—even if he did not know the Apocalypse—the habit of giving to Rome this name, especially in close contrast with "the elect." We should have supposed ourselves that a great deal must depend on the criticism of the Second Epistle, which, if it be attributable to St. Peter, would tend to give considerable support to the notion that St. Peter had adopted a good deal of the phraseology of the Apocalypse. The two Epistles, taken together at all events, would, if they were from the same writer, suggest a familiarity, if not with the Apocalypse itself, at least with usages of speech which, though among the quieter and simpler phrases of that imaginative book, are still very characteristic of the Apocalypse. In the First Epistle there is the passage (v., 8) "your adversary the Devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour," with the intimation following it that these trials can last but "a little while," which at once suggests the passage in the Apocalypse (xii., 12),—"the Devil is gone down unto you, having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time." In the Second Epistle, there is the passage (ii., 4) about angels committed to "pits of darkness," which directly suggests the Apocalypse; the passage (iii., 8) about a thousand years being but as one day, which, though it may recall the 90th psalm in the first place, has also, as it seems, a secondary reference to the thousand years of the Apocalyptic vision; the passage about "the new heavens and the new earth," after the dissolution of the old, which directly suggests the passage in the Apocalypse (xxi., 1); and the passage about the "day star rising in your hearts" (i., 20), which, again, suggests the morning star of the Apocalypse (xxii., 16). Our own judgment, then, would be that if both these Epistles proceeded from the same hand, it might well be that Babylon, in the First Epistle, was used by St. Peter in the sense of St. John, since the two Epistles together distinctly suggest a certain amount of familiarity in the writer with the usages of language in the Apocalypse. But whether the most sober criticism would or would not attribute the Second Epistle to St. Peter, the present writer would not like at present to express any opinion. If it would, the Second Epistle would be a signal illustration of the influence of St. John's richer imagination on his friend's mind. If it would not, then probably Babylon in the First Epistle ought to be accepted in its literal sense, as the name of the great Eastern city. These are matters of which we earnestly wish that Dean Howson had given us a more elaborate study.

ANOTHER BIOGRAPHY OF PENN.*

No one would say, after reading the works published by Dr. Stoughton, including his, in many respects, excellent volumes on Religion in England from the Opening of the Long Parliament to the End of the Eighteenth Century, that he is profound, or even profoundly erudite, either as a historian or a theologian. He strikes one rather as, in the Emersonian sense, a reporter, though a very agreeable and even skilful reporter. He can read the ordinarily available literature on any subject in which he is interested, and make a very readable précis of it. A Nonconformist, with much sympathy for Nonconformists in their historical struggles, his reading has been far too catholic to allow his writing to degenerate into bitterness. His style may not reach the high amenity that has marked some of the more thoughtful and artistic utterances of that other literary Congregationalist, Dr. Allon; yet, in his latest writings, Nonconformity, in the partisan sense, is a pleasant though quite decided aroma, rather than anything else. Dr. Stoughton's Life of the Founder of Pennsylvania, published in connection with the two-hundredth anniversary of his landing in America, is deserving of notice even quite as much for the writer's sake as for Penn's. It was, of course, hardly possible for Dr. Stoughton to bring to light facts bearing on Penn's life that have escaped the notice of Clarkson and Hepworth Dixon on this side of the Atlantic, or of the various historians of Penn and Pennsylvania in America itself. He has, however, come across and utilised some unpublished correspondence; and a visit he paid to the United States ten years ago, and inquiries he made there, have evidently helped him much, by freshening and mellowing his views. But if Dr. Stoughton has little that is positively new to tell us of Penn, his repetition of the old story is excellent in spirit and tone. His style is, however, somewhat unequal. Is there not the ring of the pulpit, if not of the platform of the Sunday-school "social meeting," in this account of Penn's birth?—"In the autumn of that year, October 14th, 1644, a little boy was born in the court adjoining London Wall, filling the house with joy and gladness." What can we say of the "little boy," or "filling the house with joy and gladness," but that it is literary "gag"? Take, again, such an expression of opinion as this:—"In reviewing the history of religious opinion, surely we should appreciate whatever may be true and good in forms of conviction and feeling which we are far from adopting entirely as our own. It is not requisite that people should be Roman Catholics in order to see what was beautiful in the character of Francis of Assisi, or Lutherans to see what was grand in the Saxon reformer, or Quakers to see what was profoundly spiritual in the founder of the Society." How very true, but then how very commonplace! Besides, why should Dr. Stoughton adopt a half-apologetic tone in defending catholicity of view, at least in days like the present, when we are tolerant enough to have satisfied even Jacobi, who contended that true tolerance consists in our being tolerant of each other's intolerance. On the other hand, take this, on Giulienna Maria, Penn's first wife, who seems, indeed, to have been as charming as she was pious and refined:—"A portrait of her exists, in which she appears with sweet face, light hair, a little black hood, a white kerchief, a deep, graceful stomacher, a silken dress with short sleeves, and delicate hands, the whole realising Charles Lamb's ideal of 'the shining ones.'" As a sketch, conceived in Burns's spirit—and a better spirit there cannot be—of "gently scanning your brother-man," still gentlier, sister-woman—this is perfect, and nothing could be happier than the introduction of Lamb's ideal. It somehow recalls the only two genuinely poetical lines in Hobbes's version of Homer, those which describe the infant Astyanax at the scene of the parting of Hector and Andromache, in the Sixth Book of the Iliad:—

"And like a star upon her bosom lay
His beautiful and shining golden head."

But it would be alike uncharitable and unfair to suggest that the felicity of Dr. Stoughton's description is, like Hobbes's, but a lucky accident.

In once more championing Penn, as the friend and adviser of James II., against the attacks of Macaulay and smaller critics, Dr. Stoughton displays much judgment. He is thoroughly impartial. While he shows the absolute absurdity of explaining Penn's conduct at a crisis in the history of British liberties, alike political and religious, by the theory that he was a Jesuit, while he demonstrates that it must have been George, not William, Penn, that played "the broker lackey" in the scandalous Court transactions in which both the Maids of Honour and "the maids of Taunton" were mixed up, he allows that to say the least, his hero may have been imprudent in his interference between James and the Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford. The truth, no doubt, is that Macaulay was as incapable of understanding Penn's character, with its mysticism, its inwardness, its tenacity of purpose dissociated from dogmatic fanaticism, as Penn's own father, the irascible Admiral. Penn, indeed, predicted his own fate, if he did not reveal his own character and creed, when, in 1678, he pleaded before a Committee of the House of Commons in favour of the right of Quakers to make an affirmation instead of taking the oath, with a view to their sharing in the relief then proposed to be granted to English Dissenters. "Reading, travel, and observation," he then said, "made the religion of my education the religion of my judgment. My alteration has brought none to that belief; and though the posture I am in may seem odd or strange to you, yet I am conscientious; and till you know me better, I hope your charity will call it rather my unhappiness than my crime." Penn was a sincere Friend and mystic; what he did, still more what he wished to do, for Fox and other of the brethren, and his own family ostracism, sufficiently prove this. But study and travel, while they left the religion of Penn's judgment substantially the same as the religion of his "conversion," seem to have rubbed off fanaticism to a remarkable, if not incalculable, extent; he was a mystic, perhaps, much as Carlyle was, or at least as he wished his wife to be when he wrote her, with almost grotesque intensity, "Be a mystic, dearest." Penn may be said to have been a fanatical devotee of perfect freedom of conscience, much as the late Dean Stanley may be said to have been a fanatical devotee of latitudinarianism. Although the ruling Quakers of Pennsylvania, in formulating their final scheme of religious toleration, drew the line at Christianity, and so fell short of the religious fearlessness of the charter-makers of Rhode Island, Penn as Proprietor took different and higher ground. In one of his letters—if Dr. Stoughton has noticed this letter, the fact has escaped us—he said, "I went thither to lay the foundation of a free colony for all mankind that should go thither, more especially those of my own profession; not that I would lessen the civil liberties of others because of their persuasion, but screen and defend our own from any infringement on that account." It is at least possible that when Penn returned from America to England, he sought to turn James's Roman Catholicism and personal liking for himself to good account, by securing through them a victory for perfect toleration. If instead of James becoming his tool, he became James's, that should surely be considered, in his own words, as his unhappiness, rather than his crime.

Dr. Stoughton gives, as the frontispiece to his biography, a copy of the original picture of Penn, painted from life in the year 1666, when he was twenty-two years of age. His face must have been a very fine one, yet the large eyes suggest an Aurelian or melancholy thoughtfulness—derived, perhaps, from his Dutch mother—rare at such a period in life, and prophetic of trouble to come. And, in truth, Penn was a man of many sorrows. They began with his quarrels with his father over his Quakerism, and even his last years were clouded by the pecuniary misfortunes consequent on the misconduct of his son and the rascality of his agent, in the great colony which owes so much—its prosperity no less than its constitutional freedom—to his wisdom. He was familiar with prisons, he was for years in hiding, and there can be little question that the trouble he fell into as the result of his dealings with James, and from which he did not emerge till 1692, hastened the end of his devoted Giulielma Maria. That same year, "she gently expired in my arms, her head upon my bosom, with a sensible and devout resignation of her soul to Almighty God." But, until his son "fell off," Penn appears to have been happy in his domestic life. His eminently practical second wife played her part as well, and was, in her way, as devoted to him as even Giulielma Maria; he, in turn, was a model husband, if not also father. Penn took a genuine delight, too, in his work in Pennsylvania, in framing a Constitution, in negotiating with Indians, in doing a good and lasting, even if a necessarily imperfect, work in the interests of toleration. Above all, he had much more than the ordinary Englishman's, or even the ordinary politician's, share of "that ancient English dower of inward happiness," which, let us hope, exists in fact, and not merely in the patriotic imagination of Wordsworth. A subtle inwardness—a very different thing from the heart-on-the-sleeve subjectivity which was willing to stand and deliver at the somewhat brusque bidding of a Macaulay—was Penn's secret. It was more, and better,—it was his support, his stimulus, his religion.

TWO "STUDIES" IN FICTION.*

THE two novels we have bracketed together are, in some respects, as dissimilar as they well can be. Arthur Tregarthen, the tragedy of whose life Mr. Christie Murray tells in his new work, and Antoinette Raynor, the "misguidit lassie," introduced to us by the young lady—we say young lady, after due deliberation—who styles herself "Percy Ross," have each what the other wants, and so markedly, that a very skilful artist would have contrived to marry them as certainly as Mr. Hardy united the solid Oak to the skittish Bathsheba. It is, too, a very far cry from Mr. Murray's smoky literary Bohemia off the Strand to the breezy Highland respectabilities amidst which Antoinette leads her impulsive German lover such a provoking dance. Yet both stories are essentially of the single-character kind. Both are full of promise, dashed with what is known, in the critical slang of the hour, as "dangerous tendencies." Mr. Murray has arrived at a critical stage in his career. His novitiate as a craftsman—and a very tenderly-treated novitiate it has been, in spite of his truculent remarks on reviewers—is over, and it is now for him to settle whether he is to pursue steadily his own road of vigorous realism, or to follow the multitude along the parade of literary affectation. By the Gate of the Sea has in it not a little of Mr. Murray at his best, but it also seems to show that he has a hankering after being somebody else than himself. "Percy Ross," on the other hand, is only beginning her novitiate; unless we are altogether mistaken, A Misguidit Lassie is a first work by a new and young hand. There may be no depth, moral or other, in it; but there is brightness, quick perception of character, and a happy humour, ever so much better than the poor Thackeray-and-water of many modern novels which tries so often to pass, and is even sometimes mistaken, for depth. But there are also immaturities, and tendencies to burn incense before some of the false gods of present-day fiction. Criticism of both By the Gate of the Sea and A Misguidit Lassie, must, therefore, have an element of warning, if not of the didactic, in it.

Could Mr. Murray not have given us his Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark; or could he not, at the least, have given the Prince enough of the strong sense of Benedict to prevent his brain being softened and his life being shipwrecked, as he himself says, by collision with a bubble? By the Gate of the Sea is not so strong a novel as Joseph's Coat or even Val Strange. But there are some admirably-drawn characters in it,—and then there are not too many of them. Ronald Marsh, the poet, verges, perhaps, on caricature; the fur on his coat is, perhaps, a trifle too deep, and his hair is perhaps half an inch too long. But his development is well traced, and the final triumph of character over craze is sure to be enjoyed. Lorrimer, the vulgar, enterprising, but warm-hearted theatrical manager of a quarter of a century before Mr. Irving and Mr. Hollingshead, leaves nothing to be desired; and we are disposed to forgive Miss Churchill the actress everything but her husband and the weak little suppressio veri which made her lose him. But Mr. Murray should not again give his readers such a poor imitation of Hamlet as the crack-brained Cornishman, Arthur Tregarthen, with his morbid fancies, his bits of green glass, his search after the philosopher's stone. The misunderstanding that separates him from his wife is altogether incredible. Tregarthen's strong point, if he has any, is sincerity; and yet we find him, at a critical moment in his life, professing a dislike for, and a disbelief in, actresses which he only half feels. Then we are asked to believe that courageous self-reliance is the back-bone of the character of Miss Farmer, whom Tregarthen marries. Why, then, has she not the courage to tell her lover that she has been for a short time on the stage, the more especially as being there at all was a credit to her? Last, and worst, the device of inserting in the letter Mrs. Tregarthen leaves behind her, when she deserts her husband, dubious language which is taken to mean that she has been guilty of something worse than concealing from him the most heroic episode in a career of self-sacrifice, is one worthy only of a third-rate artist. By the Gate of the Sea suggests, in short, the idea that Mr. Murray wished in writing it to prove that he can write tragedy as well as other people. But he cannot. Like Mr. Black, he is at home among the humours and happineses of human life, and should do nothing more serious than welcome home discarded faith at the end of his last volume. Mr. Black does not intend to present his admirers with another Macleod of Dare or Madcap Violet—at all events, it is to be hoped so, for the sake of his own reputation—and so we trust Mr. Murray will not give us another Arthur Tregarthen. Two more words of warning. There is no humour, there is scarcely even the fun of the public-school boy, in describing an eminent writer on ethics as “the Reverend Mr. Paley.” Mr. Murray would do well, further, to cork-up his self-consciousness; certainly, he should not allow it to find vent in pugnacious prefaces and heavy-shotted dedications. There is nothing unnatural in his dedication of By the Gate of the Sea to Mr. Walter Besant, for there are scenes in it which remind one of the earlier works of the late firm of Besant and Rice. But why not dedicate it sans phrase? Above all, why tell us once more that “Nature brings not back the mastodon, nor we those times”? The Mastodon is becoming as tiresome as the Silver Streak and the Upas Tree.

There are in A Misguidit Lassie, as we have already indicated, many crudities and juvenilities. “Brave, tender Kingsley,” is a boarding-school phrase. Moralisation is not a strong point with “Percy Ross,” and fortunately she does not often give her readers information of this kind,—“A man is not necessarily what events make him; some men of strong individuality dominate their ‘kismet,’ and yet the circumstances of their sphere of action do act upon them, moulding and changing them in manner, if not in heart.” “Kismet,” by the way, is very nearly as much of a literary bore as “the mastodon.” Childish impishness, no doubt, accomplishes some wonderful feats in the way of perverting language. But,— has a manufactured and indeed rather low-comedy look. There is no plot, to speak of, in A Misguidit Lassie. Emil Rosenthal is surely too poor and boyish a character to capture such a fancy as Antoinette Raynor’s; and Helen Sinclair, whose part in the story is only second to Antoinette’s, indicates a want of Scotch pride, reticence, and “dourness,” in spite of her magnanimity, in accepting a lover at second-hand with so little ado. On the other hand, many of the characters are altogether true to Scotch nature, such as the dull-witted but not ungentlemanly Highland laird, Gordon Caerguent, and poor, unpractical Aunt Ishbel, although we are not quite sure as to the particular catechism of the Free Kirk of Scotland which she prefers to the Church’s. But the real, if not the sole attraction of this story is the English girl with French blood in her veins who gives the title to it. There is at least reality in her moods, her practical jokes, her philanthropies, and her miseries. A bright naïveté is the essence of Antoinette’s character and history; and there is such an absence of it in current fiction, that any writer who presents us with even a little deserves encouragement. Some ten, or perhaps even five years hence, “Percy Ross” should write what Carlyle styles “a real book,” provided that the bloom is not off the natural grace of her style by that time, or that no affectation has taken its place.

“There is a dreadful hell below,
I have been there, and still would go,”

MR. W. J. LINTON’S NEW ANTHOLOGY.*

If this delightful little volume had its deserts, it would not be reviewed by any critic until it had been carried in his pocket for half a year or more; taken out and opened in every interval of real leisure; read, marked, learned, inwardly digested, and made a part not merely of the reader’s imaginative possessions, but of himself. “It can’t be tasted in a sip,” said Mr. Richard Swiveller, in his eulogy of the once popular beverage, “early purl;” and of Mr. Linton’s anthology we have to take many sips—many full draughts, indeed—in order to appreciate the full charm of its delicate flavour. Unfortunately, readers will not wait to have their tasting done for them in this deliberate fashion; and they can hardly complain, therefore, if the estimates provided for them lack the subtlety of appreciation which comes only of long and intimate acquaintanceship.

The first impression left by even the most cursory survey of these “rare poems” is one of surprise that they should be rare. Of late years, the field of sixteenth and seventeenth-century verse has been so well reaped, that only a very sanguine gleaner could have hoped to pick up a few neglected ears; and yet here is a goodly sheaf, of which any toiler with the sickle might well be proud. Mr. Linton’s volume is not a selection from the anthologies with new matter added; it is, as he describes it, a “supplement,” consisting almost entirely of poems which have been either ignored by previous anthologists, or given by them in incomplete and otherwise faulty versions. That at this time of the day, the production of such a volume should be possible is surprising enough; but the surprise of most readers will be heightened when they discover that Mr. Linton’s treasure-trove has been largely gathered, not from the works of obscure or unknown authors, but from volumes written by men whose work is known to every one who has any right to call himself a student of English literature. To mention several examples out of many, Sir Philip Sidney provides thirteen poems; Drayton, four; Beaumont and Fletcher, six; Ben Jonson, ten; Shirley, seven; and even in the garden of Robert Herrick, so much frequented by the anthologists, Mr. Linton finds no fewer than eight un-gathered flowers of verse. The selection from poets more or less known fills more than half the volume, the remainder being occupied by gleanings from “Tottel’s Miscellany,” “Dowland’s Song Books,” and the various collections of madrigals, ballets, and the like, which were so abundant during the two centuries to which Mr. Linton devotes himself.

A peculiar quaintness, attractive or repellent according to the taste of the reader, is generally spoken of as the main characteristic of the poetry of this period; and to deny the presence of this quality would, indeed, be to indulge in a critical paradox. At no time, save one in which oddity and far-fetchedness were considered literary virtues, could an amorous poet have compared the “white skin” of his mistress to “curds well press’d,” or said of her flesh that it was “as hard as brawn,”—two curious figures of speech which are to be found in a charming little poem by Sir Philip Sidney. Nor would it be easy to find, either in the verse of an earlier or a later age, anything to match the extraordinary composition by John Davies, of Hereford, entitled,

“AN HELLESPOINT OF CREAM.

If there were, O! an Hellespoint of cream.
Between us, milk-white Mistress, I would swim
To you, to show to both my love’s extreme,
Leander-like,—yes, dive from brim to brim.
But met I with a butter’d pippin-pie
Floating upon’t, that would I make my boat,
To waft me to you without jeopardy:
Though sea-sick I might be while it did float.
Yet if a storm should rise, by night or day,
Of sugar snows or hail of care-aways,
Then if I found a pancake in my way,
It like a plank should bear me to your quays,
Which having found, if they tobacco kept,
The smoke should dry me well before I slept.”

But though quaintness, often, as in these lines, carried to an altogether ridiculous pitch, was abundant enough in the poetry of these two centuries, the critics have perhaps made rather too much of it. It is not the quaintness of these poets which gives their work its peculiar attractiveness, but the presence of other literary qualities of which quaintness is necessarily the occasional outcome,—their wealth of pure fancy (using the word in Wordsworth’s sense), the dainty lightness of their handling, the pleasant symmetry of their construction and style, the ingenuity of expression which gives novelty and interest to the simplest and most hackneyed motives. This last characteristic—the combination of great simplicity and even triteness of theme with a loving elaboration of treatment which hides the triteness and keeps the charm of simplicity, while adding to it the alien charm of finely wrought complexity—is, we are inclined to think, the true “note” of the poetry of this age. What could be more frankly simple in conception or more artfully artless in execution than the stanzas addressed by Andrew Marvell to a “Fair Singer” who had enslaved him, which we quote not as the best, but as nearly the briefest example of the quality to which we have referred?—

“To make a final conquest of all me,
Love did compose so sweet an enemy,
In whom both beauties to my death agree,
Joining themselves in fatal harmony:
That while she with her eyes my heart doth bind,
She with her voice doth captivate my mind.

I could have fled from One but singly fair,—
My disentangled soul itself might save,
Breaking the curled trammels of her hair;
But how should I avoid to be her slave,
Whose subtle art invisibly can breathe
My fetters of the very air I breathe?

It had been easy fighting in some plain
Where victory might hang in equal choice,

* Rare Poems of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. A Supplement to the Anthologies. Collected and edited, with Notes, by W. J. Linton. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.

But all resistance against her is vain
Who has the advantage both of eyes and voice :
And all my forces needs must be undone,
She having gained both the wind and sun.

This same quality of elaborated simplicity is to be found in such poems as Beaumont and Fletcher's "May I find a woman fair!" Herrick's dainty stanzas, "To Daisies;" the lines entitled, "Her Real Worth," by a little-known poet, Thomas Nabbes; and a score or two of others which we cannot even mention. Among those where a similar simplicity of motive is more or less hidden by obtrusive and yet attractive ingenuity of treatment are Sidney's sonnet, "My true love hath my heart;" Shirley's "Looking-glass;" Waller's felicitously-phrased apology "for having loved before;" and, most of all, in the curiously clever poem by an unknown author, the quality of which can be seen in the first stanza:—

"The longer life, the more offence;
The more offence, the greater pain;
The greater pain, the less defence;
The less defence, the lesser gain;
The loss of gain long ill doth try;
Wherefore, come death, and let me die."

The simple beauty which we care to enjoy rather than to analyse is abundantly scattered over Mr. Linton's pages. Shirley's fine lines, "To one saying she was old," have never been surpassed in graceful tenderness; all lovers of poetry will be glad to have in its entirety Crashaw's exquisite address to,—

"That not impossible she
That shall command my heart and me;"

from Lovelace is taken a poem addressed "to Mr. Charles Cotton," which contains one stanza as noble as any in the perfect lyric by which the poet is best known; and among the anonymous pieces are two, "Love and Sorrow" and "Weep you no more, sad fountains," musical with a most captivating melody. Here is the latter:—

"Weep you no more, sad fountains!
What need you flow so fast?
Look how the snowy mountains
Heaven's sun doth gently waste!
But my sun's heavenly eyes
View not your weeping,
That now lies sleeping
Softly, now softly lies,
Sleeping.

Sleep is a reconciling,
A rest that peace begets;
Doth not the sun rise smiling,
When fair at even he sets?
Rest you, then, rest, sad eyes!
Melt not in weeping!
While she lies sleeping
Softly, now softly lies,
Sleeping."

Of Mr. Linton's sensible and careful notes—neither too scanty, nor too profuse—we have not left ourselves much space in which to speak, and they do not call for lengthened comment. Mr. Linton modestly disclaims scholarship, but he has the industry and accuracy which are the scholar's best equipments. Here and there he is certainly at fault. He evidently leans to what Alexander Smith called "the pestilent heresy" of those who hold that any poem of fourteen lines may be called a sonnet, and (p. 247, lines 1 and 2) betrays a curious ignorance of a word familiar to all readers of Shakespeare and other writers of a freer-speaking age than ours. Many of Mr. Linton's proposed emendations seem to us shrewd and reasonable; for some we cannot see any possible justification, but we must not stay to argue out points of detail which are, at the most, of little consequence. We may note just one matter which Mr. Linton has missed. The phrase "a bully boy," which is commonly supposed to be a recently-manufactured American vulgarity, is to be found in the song "Three Poor Mariners," taken from the collection entitled Deuteromelia, which was published in 1609, and is therefore to be counted among the many similar phrases which are so old that they have got the reputation of being new.

A SELECTION FROM SPENSER.*

WE welcome with the heartiest good-will any book that is calculated to make Spenser better known to young readers. For them he has special charms. His imagination is boundless, his fancy inexhaustible, his purpose always noble, his purity divine. These expressions may seem extravagant to the man who is but slightly acquainted with the Faerie Queene, but let him read it through from end to end, and if he be a lover of the things that are lovely, he will feel that our words do not exaggerate its excellence. After such a perusal, the faults of Spenser as a poetical artist may not be less obvious, but the supreme power and enchanting loveliness of his verse will so take the reader captive that, forgetting to criticise, he will be satisfied to enjoy.

Spenser has been always styled the poet's poet, and the influence he has exercised on all, or nearly all his great successors, has been frankly acknowledged. How this prince of poets was loved and honoured in his own lifetime we all know, and when he died "his hearse was attended by poets, and mournful elegies and poems, with the pens that wrote them, were thrown into his tomb." "What a funeral was that," adds Dean Stanley, "at which Beaumont, Fletcher, Jonson, and, in all probability, Shakespeare attended; what a grave, in which the pen of Shakespeare may be mouldering away!" It has been said, probably with truth, that Spenser is the greatest Christian poet in the language, and we need not wonder that Milton thought him a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas; or, to come nearer our own time, that John Wesley, the most practical of men, recommended the Faerie Queene to his divinity students. A poet's teaching, however, is an indirect influence, and cannot be weighed and estimated like the teaching of a scholiast or theologian. His power is subtle, penetrating, pervasive, and like the atmosphere, it acts upon us imperceptibly. How is it possible to say what Shakespeare and Wordsworth have done for us? We know that we owe to them some portion of our lives, that they have made us think and feel as we could not otherwise have thought and felt; but how far we, as pupils, have learnt from those great masters, to what degree we should have been different men and women, had we never sat at their feet, is a question that cannot be answered. As well might we endeavour to analyse and define the influences of nature.

Miss Harrison's attempt to produce a selection from Spenser, "for home and school," is not, we think, likely to be wholly successful. Her notes are excellent, and she has spared no labour; but, in our judgment, two or three errors have been made which may to some extent interfere with the popularity of the volume. More than a third of the book consists of what, for want of a better term, must be called Spenser's minor poems. From the Shepherd's Calendar two eclogues are selected, doubtless for their historical interest; they would not have been chosen for their poetic beauty. Then follow "Mother Hubbard's Tale," "Colin Clout's Come Home Again," and ten sonnets "chosen with a view to their biographical interest;" and here, again, with perhaps one exception, Spenser's most poetical sonnets seem to be purposely omitted. He is never great, it is true, as a sonnet-writer, but among his eighty-eight poems composed in this form are several which none but a poet could have written; and, moreover, they are quite as biographical in character as those Miss Harrison has inserted, for they describe the Elizabeth both he was destined to immortalise in the Epithalamion, the wife whom he has raised upon the wings of poetry to an unexampled height in English literature. Now, we venture to doubt whether the poems above mentioned, attractive though they may be to the poetical student, will have any charm for boys and girls. Spenser's special gifts are but slightly displayed in them, and if used in school, they are not unlikely to create the feeling of repugnance which, when a boy, Byron expressed for Horace. And the repulsion will be felt all the more strongly, since Miss Harrison has reprinted her selections in the antique spelling. No doubt there are cases in which this must be done for the sake of the rhyme, and there are words also in Spenser—some of them obsolete in his own time—that will not allow of being converted to the modern form; but as a rule, the editor would have done well to follow Professor Craik's example with regard to Spenser who does not lose, as Chaucer would lose, by the substitution as far as possible of modern orthography. The reason is obvious. Chaucer's construction and spelling belong to the age and to the poet; they are not the mere dress of his thought, but a portion of it, and are also inseparable from his music. To modernise the Canterbury Tales is to translate them, and in the work of translation the aroma of a poet's song is lost. On the other hand, if a canto of The Faerie Queene be read aloud, it will be found that, in spite of a few Spenserian peculiarities, the verse moves with the smoothness of a modern poem in the same metre.

* Poems of Spenser. Selected and arranged, with Notes, by Lucy Harrison. London: Bentley and Son.

And here we observe, with regret, that neither is the Muiopotmos inserted, which Mr. Lowell calls "the most airy fanciful of Spenser's poems," nor the Epithalamion, a nuptial song transcendent in loveliness, and in its purity "white as driven snow." We do not forget that this poem, which would alone suffice to make the name of Spenser immortal, was omitted from the Golden Treasury, on the ground that it is out of harmony with modern manners. The plea has always seemed to us unreasonable. The poem contains 433 lines, and the innocent simplicity and honest frankness of about 50 lines may be unfitted for the delicacy of an age that reads Zola, and more than tolerates Walt Whitman. Be it so. Spenser's homely speech may be sometimes too homely, but the poem can be abridged, and will lose comparatively little by a process not undesirable perhaps in a selection made for schools. To omit it altogether seems to us an injustice to the great name of Spenser.

Considering the little space at her disposal, the editor has, we think, done her best with The Faerie Queene, of which she prints the first book, with slight omissions, and such a glossary as will make the reading of the poem interesting to children. Students who wish to study it more thoroughly are referred to the copious annotations of Mr. Kitchin, who has edited the First Book of The Faerie Queene in the Clarendon Press Series. From the remaining books extracts are given, and these are generally well chosen. If they fail, as all extracts needs must, to show the genius of the poet, they will prove to all who have ears for verse the richness of his music, and to quote Shelley's words, the "inexpressible beauty of the measure" in which his great allegory is written.

ANTONIO ROSMINI SERBATI.*

THE career of Antonio Rosmini, the founder of the Order of Charity, was a marked instance of what Roman Catholics call a "special vocation." Born heir to a large property, head of an ancient and distinguished family, with every opportunity ready to hand for political or social advancement, he seems consistently, from his childhood upwards, to have been completely insensible to the attractions thus held out to him, and to have had but one aim in life,—the devotion of all his talents and energies to the service of his fellow-men and to the cause of religion. When only six years old, we are told of his systematic employment of his pocket-money for purposes of charity, of his indifference to the ordinary pastimes of childhood as such, and of his constant endeavours to turn amusement and recreation into occasions for the moral improvement of himself and his companions. And although we cannot but fancy that his moral disquisitions at that mature age may have amused some of his school-fellows, who had a stronger sense of the ridiculous than of the sublime, and may have gained for him with a section of them the reputation of being something of a "prig," yet to one who studies his character dispassionately, and observes the entire absence of any trace of affectation in him, and the steady and consistent growth of the qualities thus early manifested, the records of his early childhood are not less admirable than remarkable. "He was, in fact, as Don Paoli [his Italian biographer] puts it, a reflecting child at two years of age, an almsgiving boy at five, a most studious youth at seven, a practical ascetic at twelve."

The last representative of an ancient and illustrious race, it is not surprising that he should have found it difficult to obtain the consent of his parents and relations to his renouncing all thoughts of marriage, and entering the sacerdotal state. Every possible consideration was held out to dissuade him from his resolve, but with that fixity of purpose and consistency of character to which his life and letters bear witness, he never swerved for a moment in his design. He seems, indeed, to have been dead to the attractions of a great position and of worldly society,—or rather, they appear to have been absolutely distasteful to him. To work for "the Christian cause" was not his first idea only, but his only idea. Twice in the earliest days of his priestly career could he have held, had he cared for it, a position which must have led to the highest ecclesiastical honours. He was firm, however, in his refusal to accept anything which was inconsistent with the special work which he considered to be required of him. "I regard," he wrote to the Bishop of Trent, "as one of the principal rules regulating my course, that which forbids me to assume any office likely to impede the doing of a greater work already commenced." Indeed, the priesthood meant, in his eyes, something very distinct from prelacy or the Cardinal's hat. He announces his determination to don the cassock to his friend Bartolomeo Menotti, in the following terms:—

"Oh, how grateful I feel for the excellent advice you give me, never to forget the Christian Commonwealth, for truly it is sweet and noble and just advice! Indeed, there is no wisdom here below, if it come not from the Father of all Light. You may, therefore, rest assured that the pursuit of letters has of itself no charms for me. I am resolved to become a priest, and to part with all that I have to purchase a treasure which neither moth nor rust can fret away, and where thieves cannot break in and steal. What little learning I possess, I mean to make use of, with God's help, in the work of education. (And what more pleasing task than to be useful to our fellow-men?) Nor will I suffer my body to eat its bread in idleness,—it must toil and labour; my worldly substance I shall employ in advancing the sciences and relieving the poor. These sentiments are dictated not by my intellect alone, but by my heart also. Continue to be my friend, and recommend me to our Lord."

It argued a marked individuality of character in Rosmini, to choose a career so entirely different from that which was ready made for him by his birth and position, and it may be instructive to inquire whence he gained the strength which enabled him so persistently to stem the current of external circumstances, until he had accomplished his great aims,—of developing and systematising a Christian philosophy, and of begetting what his biographer calls "a spiritual family," devoted to works of charity, in place of a new generation of Rosminis of Rovereto. So far as the work before us throws light on this question, he appears to have owed his great strength of purpose and intense conviction, and consequent influence on others, mainly to two causes,—his love and practice of solitude and meditation, and his natural powers of sympathy and friendship. These two qualities, though at first sight unlike each other, were in reality in him a part of the same temperament. They were both the fruits of a love of concentration and a hatred of dissipation. He could not endure to fritter away his time over the mere conventionalities of general society, and loved either that solitude which enabled him to pursue his own reading and meditation—intensifying thereby his aspirations and enlarging his capabilities—or the society of familiar and sympathetic friends whom he could influence for good, and who assisted him in turn by their sympathy and conversation, enlarging and developing his views by comparison and discussion, and adding to his own enthusiasm that special and potent motive-power to work which is known as esprit de corps. Both solitude, then, and this interchange of ideas with kindred spirits served the same great purpose, the furtherance of his work. What he could not endure was anything which distracted him from it, or even anything which did not positively tend to its better performance. "I am more and more enamoured of this solitude," he writes from his favourite retreat, the Casino del Monte, whither he had retired shortly after his ordination to the priesthood; "it is full of God." Visiting at the house of a comparative stranger was no more a pleasure to him than it was to Macaulay. It seemed sheer loss of time:—

"I have been obliged to go to Ala, to spend some days with a gentleman of that place. Time passed away drearily enough, I can assure you, and it seemed an age ere I got home again. Far away from all I hold dear in life, with my wonted regularity ruthlessly trespassed upon, I became almost a prey to melancholy, my only comfort the while being to snatch to myself a few hours, when I could, now and then, that I might spend them all alone in my chamber, reading or in prayer. At last I have returned, and read your letters with the greatest eagerness. They furnished most delicious nourishment, and were well calculated to refresh the weary wanderer."

So, too, when he visited Rome for the first time, in 1823—a visit which, to one with his beliefs and aspirations, was an epoch in his life—he was much harassed by the numerous visits and social duties which his position as head of his family and his reputation, great even then at the age of twenty-six, entailed upon him. "To visit the sacred shrines," writes his biographer, "and see the treasures of art and explore the venerable remains of ages long past, afforded him great pleasure indeed; but this had its drawback, in the fact that he was always escorted by those whose kind attentions oppressed him. Far sooner would he have seen all these things while alone and unknown. He had, however, to bear the burden of exalted intimacies, and to submit to be somewhat lionised." Indeed, the trial of this element of worldly society in the Eternal City was so great to his sensitive and earnest nature, that we find him writing at this time to his mother:—"In spite of the many attractions by which I am surrounded, I yearn to find myself once more restored to home retirement."

* Life of Antonio Rosmini Serbati, Founder of the Institute of Charity. By Gabriel Stuart Macwalter. Vol. I. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.

One circumstance deserves to be mentioned in connection with the assistance and strength he derived from the sympathy of his friends, and that is his intimacy with Madame de Canossa, the foundress of the "Daughters of Charity," who devote themselves to the education of the poor. What St. Scholastica was to her brother, St. Benedict, what Madame de Chantal was to Francis of Sales, that was Madame de Canossa to Antonio Rosmini. It is not too much to say that, but for her influence, the Fathers of Charity might never have existed, and she had undoubtedly much to do with the formation of the constitutions of the new Order.

The biographer's work is so far well done, that he has presented us with an interesting, fluently written, well arranged narrative of Rosmini's life, and a judicious selection from his letters. Moreover, his enthusiasm for his hero has given the sketch that touch of life which a dry narrative of events can never possess. The only criticism which we make is that he has been led too far by this enthusiasm, not so much in the general impression he conveys of Rosmini's character, as in the constant attributing of a specific providential design or a given supernatural meaning to the smallest events of his life. It would take us too long to illustrate this in detail, but it struck us again and again in the course of our reading, and gives the book a somewhat unreal character. Apart from this, it is, so far as it has yet advanced, a not unworthy biography of one of the few men of original genius whom a Roman Catholic education has produced in our days, and of a very remarkable philosophical thinker.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Free-Church Principle: its Character and History. By Sir Henry Welwood Moncrieff, Bart., D.D. (Macniven and Wallace, Edinburgh; Hodder and Stoughton, London.)—Mr. Robert Macfie in 1880 founded a lectureship called the "Chalmers Lectureship," the topic for the lectures being "The Headship of Christ over His Church, and its Independent Spiritual Jurisdiction." The first holder was the veteran Free-Church leader Sir Henry Moncrieff, who, by the instructions of the Free General Assembly, took for his first subject "The Principles of the Free Church in Connection with the Writings and Expressed Views of Dr. Chalmers." This special subject is disposed of in three introductory lectures, which deal with Dr. Chalmers's action and utterances from 1813 down to the time of the Disruption. He then deals with the general question. We are tainted, we suppose, in Sir H. Moncrieff's view, with what he calls "the Disease of English Erastianism," and shall not discuss the views set forth in this volume. Let it suffice to say that they could not have found a more able and thorough-going advocate. In this volume the most interesting section, to our mind, is the last, "The Clear Difference between Our Claim and Any Popish One." Here is a significant sentence,—“What we ask for, therefore, and have all along asked for, is a recognition of the principle set forth by Lord Kames,—the principle that the formation or dissolution of a spiritual relationship belongs exclusively to the Church Courts, even though the effect should be to separate that relationship from the civil advantages which the State intended to accompany it.” A minister, therefore, can be deprived by the Church Courts of his spiritual status, while the Civil Courts uphold his rights to his temporalities. How long will the principle of Establishment survive this difficulty? There is, indeed, an interesting speculation in the question, "When will the Free Church become Voluntary in theory, as it is already in fact?"

Recollections of the Kabul Campaign, 1879-1880. By Joshua Duke. (W. H. Allen and Co.)—This handsome volume, the value of which is materially increased by the addition of maps and sketches, contains an eye-witness's account of the advance of General Roberts through the Shaturgardan Pass to Cabul, the occupation of the city by that General, and the events of the campaign up to the relief march from Cabul to Candahar. This march Mr. Duke accompanied. He also gives his conclusions gathered on the spot shortly after the occurrence of the massacre of the English Embassy in Cabul, and of the Amir Yakub Khan's conduct with respect to it, conclusions to which General Roberts, in a letter prefixed to the volume, gives an emphatic approval. The book is thoroughly readable throughout. The author seems a careful observer, and has the gift of describing what he sees.

The Three Witnesses. By the Rev. H. T. Armfield, M.A. (Bagster and Sons.)—Mr. Armfield deserves, in any case, the praise of courage. "Lost causes" approve themselves to a certain class of chivalrous minds, and the cause of the "Three Witnesses" is surely lost. Surely, there is no need to say anything more, when we have the fact, stated with commendable candour in the preface, that "the verse is found in no one of the principal MSS. of the New Testament," more especially when we consider that it strongly favours what has been the dominant creed of Christendom. Is it credible that a verse which would furnish to anti-Arian disputants a weapon of inestimable value should ever have been permitted to drop out of the text?

For the Major. By Constance Fennimore Woolson. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mrs. Woolson is already favourably known to English readers by her clever and pleasing though rather prolix story called Anne, a work which reveals a true sense of humour and an elevated and thoughtful mind. The present slighter story is also attractive, and there is much pathos in the Major's declining state, and in the devotion of his daughter and his second wife. We must, however, decline to believe that any major in real life could be deluded into the belief that a woman over thirty-five was an ingenuous charmer of twenty-three, and continue serenely to cherish the belief during many years of matrimony. The sketches of American life and character in a remote village in the south are quaint, interesting, and read life-like; and the whole slender edifice of the story, reminding us of the paper houses of Japan, holds well together.

Readings in Social Economy. By Mrs. F. Fenwick Miller. (Longmans.)—"I cannot but think it emphatically necessary," says Mrs. Miller, in her preface, "that social science shall be written, as physical science has been already, with a special view to popular study." Now, this analogy is, we think, a little misleading, as analogies are apt to be. We all know that physical science cannot be taught out of books; there must be a laboratory, where practical work can be done. And books "written with a view to popular study" take account of this fact. They presuppose a laboratory. They do not profess to teach without it. But where is the laboratory of social science? The fact is that it is life, practical life, and this is just the thing to which the children for whom this book is written can get, happily can get, no sufficient access. We do not undervalue the book, which is, indeed, full of sound sense, and, to those who are really qualified to read it, very valuable. But we think that children are not, and cannot be, so qualified. We are convinced that no book, however well written and admirable in itself, can be of real service in that direction. But those who know something of life cannot do better than get their experiences summed up, enlarged, or corrected, as the case may be, by Mrs. Miller's capital little book.

Circe's Lovers. By Leith Derwent. 3 vols. (Chatto and Windus.)—"Circe" is a certain Lillian Desmond, who achieves a great success upon the stage, first in burlesque, then in the comedy of Shakespeare and Sheridan. Her lovers are three—to speak of those who appear in the scenes of this novel—the teller of the story, whom she pretends to love, to carry out purposes of her own; Edward Stanhope, to whom her heart is really given; and Lord Hampstead, a philanthropic Peer, whom she marries for the sake of his title, his position, and his wealth. It is not a pleasant picture, this, that Mr. Leith Derwent has given us, a woman fooling men with her flatteries and caresses; but it is drawn, we will allow, with a firm outline and in vivid colours. Circe is not a mere vulgar deceiver, trading on her beauty. There are some really subtle strokes in her character, and we find ourselves in doubt whether she is in earnest or no. We are made to see that she is even in doubt herself. In fact, we have here real art, not very pleasant, perhaps, to regard, but effective and real.

Farmer John. By George Holmes. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—There is nothing, of course, that will not be pressed into the service of the writer of fiction, and the Salvation Army is not likely to be an exception. Such we suppose to be the original of what is here called "The Heavenly Railway Company." This is a society of revivalists, which holds its meetings in Applecombe, and to which the learned vicar of that place, conscious of his inability to touch the hearts of his flock, gives his sanction. Between the enthusiasm of these people, and the charms of a young woman who is one of their evangelists, and the temper of a very disagreeable sister, and, perhaps we may add, judging from our own experience, the very peculiar dialect spoken by everybody about him, "Farmer John" is driven to distraction. This is the main plot of the story, which has the appearance of being a study from real life, but which wants the vivifying touch of art, without which real life is as wearisome in books as it often is to the actors. It is a common mistake to suppose that we produce a good picture, and one worth looking at, by simply copying things and persons that we see. All the conscientious care which Mr. Holmes has doubtless bestowed on his novel—in reproducing, for instance, the dialect—has failed to give anything but a dreary effect to Farmer John. Yet we see indications of power in it,—the gift of faithful copying is something, and may be developed into something better. If this is a first book—and we see no mention of other works on the title-page—it may well be followed by something better.

POETRY.—Sonnets. By the Earl of Rosslyn. (Blackwood and Sons.)—We have known Lord Rosslyn hitherto as a ready writer of verse that was always melodious and fluent, though showing few traces of power. These sonnets are a distinct advance. The sonnet is, indeed, to a writer who really knows the principles of his art, and has the necessary command of expression, an admirable vehicle of thought, more especially if facility is a temptation to him. The necessary compression and effort are exactly the discipline which he needs, as well as the fact, which a man of sense and culture and reading must needs recognise, that there must be a central thought in each poem, a thought, too, not unworthy of the labour which has been obviously spent upon it. These sonnets—the work, as we gather from the dates, of many years—are of course unequal in merit; but they rise occasionally, we may say more than occasionally, to a high level of merit. Here is one which, we do not hesitate to say, ought to have its place in any collection of the future :—

"OLD LETTERS.

It seems but yesterday she died, 'ut years
Have passed since then; the wondrous change of time
Makes great things little, little things sublime,
And sanctifies the dew of daily tears.
She died, as all must die; no trace appears
In History's page, nor save in my poor rhyme,
Of her, whose life was love, whose lovely prime Passed sadly where no sorrows are, nor fears.
It seems but yesterday; to-day I read
A few short letters in her own dear hand,
And doubted if 'twere true. Their tender grace
Seems radiant with her life! Oh! can the dead
Thus in their letters live? I tied the band,
And kissed her name as though I kissed her face."

There is a simple, tender pathos about this which makes it very effective. Here is another, a charming picture, drawn in a gayer mood :—

"THE WOOD-NYMPH.

The lime-trees shed their blossoms, and the scent
Filled the light air that dallied round the grove;
The honey-suckle tendrils deftly wove
A net to catch them—sweets on sweets intent.
The thyme, scarce crushed (for she a-tiptoe went!),
Breathed a faint tribute of its dying love,
Clinging about her foot-steps as they move,
And all the wood in smiling homage bent.
Fair as young birds in early spring, one hand
Led in rose-fetters a new-captured fawn,
The other held a palm leaf, from the stream
That trickled through the thicket,—like the wand
Of some enchantress, gracious as the Dawn
She passed, this Oread of a poet's dream."

—College Days; Recorded in Blank Verse. (T. Fisher Unwin.)—The author has a certain gift of humorous description, but we cannot make out that he has any gift of verse. Verse is, of course, the appropriate channel for such trifles as these, which, indeed, would hardly be written if the author were limited to prose. But then it must be of a better quality than this. Dignity it need not have, but lightness and ease it requires, and this is exactly what "Leslie Howard" seems unable to command. Here is a sketch, not without some skill, but sadly marred by the worse than prosaic verse :—

"He is an 'academic radical,'
His theories fast advancing, while he sits
In 'Queen Anne rooms,' and soothes his lovely soul
With ancient silver, old Venetian glass,
And all things which a perfect taste demands.
His greatest and most ardent wish, he says,
Is a desire to elevate and teach
The masses; not directly, it would seem.
His mission being rather, it appears,
To elevate the masses through a high,
Ennobling medium of dukes and earls.
He brings his mighty influence to bear
Upon a barbarous aristocracy,
Showing them how to lead the mob to light;
And in so doing feels himself to be A perfect benefactor of mankind."

—Songs by the Wayside of an Agnostic's Life. By Himself. (Stewart and Co.)—The writer expresses a dreary creed, or, rather, negation of creed, in appropriately dreary verse. Here is a fair specimen :—

"So grindeth on immensity,
And all are crushed beneath
Its ponderous wheel, for soon or late,
We all subside in death.
And surely it is blasphemy
For earthworms to presume
That at their whisper law should cease;
A nod—it's course resume."

Anyhow, there is no dangerous music here, as of a siren, to draw the hearts of men from the ancient paths of faith.—Lady Margaret's Sorrows, and other Poems, by Cameron Madowall (W. H. Beer and Co.), has reached a second edition, as we gather, not from the title-page, but from a page of quoted criticisms. This is praise enough. If it should attain the honour of a third, we would suggest that "wither-gather" and "sister-Easter," rhymes which we find in two successive stanzas, are susceptible of improvement.—The King of the Silver City, and other Poems. By "A. W." (Women's Printing Society.)—"A. W." writes some vigorous verse, inspired, we should imagine, from the general character of her poems, by a strong yearning for a democratic régime. Still, we are intended, we suppose, to learn from the first and longest poem in the volume that Demos is fickle, and that they who serve him must look for the reward of betrayal. There is something fine in the thought, though the expression somewhat fails, of the following (from the poem entitled "Demagogos") :—

"If the cloud has lifted for me
O'er the path our feet have trod;
If I have knelt in the secret place
And heard the voice of God;
Should I fold my hands and rest,
While ye are athirst and astray?
Shall I not lift up my voice and cry,
'Follow, this is the way!'

Not for your thanks, your praise!—
Nay, O my own, it were sweet
To slip, and stumble, be trampled down,
And die beneath your feet,

If only at last the crowl,
Pushing and pressing sore,
Should find the path and stand in the light,
Free on the glorious shore!"

—Lyre and Star: Poems. By the Author of "Ginevra," &c. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—The author, who has already given to the world some eight or nine tragedies, now brings out a volume of occasional verse, containing considerably more than a hundred poems. We must own that we have found them somewhat wearisome. The tragedies have at least a story; but the motive of these pieces is not evident. They even fail in the commonest necessary qualities of expression. Here are two stanzas, from a poem entitled "Two Spirits":—

"One, warm and radiant as the glorious sun,
That kindles up the stars to light
The heavens, when his daily course being run,
He for a time gives place to night.
The other, cold and pale as moon, that gleams
On iceberg in a Polar sea,
Where brooding frozen silence only seems To wake the ghosts of things that be."

—Strains from the Strand: Trifles in Verse. By H. S. Leigh. (Tinsley Brothers.)—There are many sounds in the Strand, and for most of them some ears appreciative. It is possible that even these rightly-named "trifles" may be read with pleasure by some, but it must be in their very idlest hours.—Beowulf, an Anglo-Saxon Poem, and The Fight at Finnsburys. Translated by James M. Garnett, M.A. (Ginn and Heath, Boston, U.S.)—This volume contains some very painstaking work by an American scholar. We cannot help, however, regretting, on behalf of the general public of readers, the choice of the literal line-for-line form. It always detracts from the vigour and beauty of a poem, even when, as in this case, the language of the original is an ancestor of the language of the translation. Mr. Garnett does not think that the shorter fragment ever belonged to Beowulf. The date of the poem he considers to be, at the latest, before 752 A.D.—Of Verses of Varied Life, by Mackenzie Bell (Elliot Stock), we cannot honestly praise more than the sentiments and intention.

We have to acknowledge a second edition of Where to Find Ferns, with a Special Chapter on Ferns Round London. By Francis George Heath. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Heath gives the particular positions, but not the exact spots, in which ferns grow. Hence the reader will have to exercise his intelligence in applying principles, and the mere collector, who extirpates wherever he goes, will be baffled. It is to be hoped that every intelligent botanist will take care that no habitat of a rare fern shall cease to be so for anything that he may do.

NOVELS.—Geraldine Hawthorne. By the Author of "Miss Molly," &c. (Blackwood and Sons.)—The first few pages of this story enable us to recognise without difficulty the work of a true literary artist. The style is pure and harmonious, the picture of the orchard and garden and of the gracious maiden who moves along their paths are delicately and effectively drawn. The story is simple, perhaps somewhat wanting in incident, but furnished with an adequate motive. There is, indeed, something more than ordinary power in the comparison between Geraldine's father, the refined student, with his weak shrinking from the practical, without energy to finish even the intellectual tasks which he sets himself, and her masterful lover, the very opposite of the other, who yet comes to a failure still more deplorable, because he lets his ambition prevail even over honour. The faithfulness of the woman still clinging to the man of whose grievous falling-away from right she fully recognises the guilt, makes a striking picture, which is thrown into relief by the contrast with its companion, Geraldine's kinswoman, Penitence.—Love, and its Counterfeit. By Alice Bernard. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—In the first chapter, we are introduced to a brutal husband and a long-suffering wife. The wife's "foster-brother" appears on the scene,—so at least he is called, though it is explained that he is "the son of her father's step-sister, who had married a German." The Count returns to England from Venice, and the husband pays court to a young lady in the neighbourhood. The history of this courtship is about the most absurd improbability that we have ever seen in a novel. At the end of the volume the wife is murdered, by the simple process of her husband's putting his foot on her train as she is going down the stone staircase, the process being assisted by the "tiny, high-heeled boots" which, the author has been at the pains to tell us, she is in the habit of wearing. In the second volume, the courtship appears to prosper, the young lady having, it would seem, the most conveniently lax notions of the morality which may be looked for in a man. But in the third, the "foster-brother" appears on the scene and explains the truth, and ultimately marries the deceived young lady. The murderer, too, is provided with another wife, and apparently suffers no other punishment than having to recognise his eldest son as the heir to his estates. Cor-

tainly, Miss Bernard cannot be accused of "pelting her bad people with the soft roses of poetical justice." Still, poetical justice is better than nothing. And if we are to have a story wholly remote from life, as this story certainly is, it is as well to have it constructed on the recognised principle that bad people are punished and good rewarded. As it is, there is nothing to make up for its absurdity. — Poppy. By Mrs. Beresford. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—Mrs. Beresford provides herself with the hero and heroine so valuable, nay, so indispensable to writers of her class. We have an ingénue, whose face is "a rare combination of sweet temper and hot passions, intense sensitiveness and keen intellect." (She is just sixteen, it should be remembered; "hot passions" visible in the face of a girl of sixteen!) And we have a hero, a blasé profligate, of whom we are told a good deal of evil, and left to imagine much more. The familiar device of an embarrassed father is called into action; and a marriage takes place early in the story, a sure sign of mischief when a writer like Mrs. Forester has the telling of it. Not content with these elements of disturbance, the author invents a pair of adventuresses, who impose themselves upon a credulous old gentleman as his nieces. One of them is the profligate's mistress, the other entraps the heroine's brother into a marriage. And so the story goes on, well intended, doubtless, but, in our judgment, ill-judged to the last degree, and certainly most ill written. Here is a sentence from the passage which describes the heroine when a horse runs away with her carriage:—"The Admiral, still more behind is a man with a white, drawn face, knowing the fruitlessness of his efforts." Who can construe that? or, without the context, would know that the next sentence, "but the quick blood was not to be chilled," means that she was not to die? — Monk's Hollow. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—Well-known characters and incidents reappear in Monk's Hollow. There is the ruined baronet, who sells his daughter to a wealthy suitor; the young woman who is compelled to sacrifice her love to the necessities of her father; the brutal and indifferent husband; the wife, who half yields to the impassioned appeal of her lover, but is saved by hearing the footsteps of her child; the railway accident, which cuts one difficult knot; and the other familiar machinery of the novelist. The speciality of this anonymous author is to be found in her millinery. She never forgets, even in the most agonising crisis of a heroine's fate, to tell us how the sufferer was dressed. "Overcome with emotion, she threw herself down on her sofa, and burst into a fit of passionate weeping." But the dinner-bell sounds, and we have the satisfaction of seeing her, "supremely lovely, in spite of the traces of tears on her pale cheeks, clad in a high cream satin, adorned with numberless frills of fine lace, and relieved by a knot of crimson roses at her throat." We are on the eve of a frightful quarrel between husband and wife, and the picture is made vivid by the description of the wife's dress:—"A deep crimson satin, high to the throat [this seems a special point], with priceless point-lace ruffles, her only ornament a string of Oriental pearls clasped lightly round her thin, white neck." It is probable that affliction is mitigated by the consciousness of having costly lace. But lace is also appropriate to happiness. The brutal husband dies, and the widow is married in "dark-blue Indian cashmere and velvet," with "soft lace about her throat," and we bid her farewell as she drives off, enveloped in a dolman, a costly affair of darkest-blue plush," &c. If there is any unmistakable note of vulgarity, it is the use of these epithets, "costly," "priceless," &c. The "meat and drink" are not forgotten, any more than is the clothing. The painful scene where the father implores his daughter to accept his creditor is prefaced by the menu of luncheon, which we hear was "a delicate repast, consisting of a Strasbourg pâté, a timbale of chicken, flanked by a bottle of Chateau Margaux and some hot-house grapes." — Estcourt. By Lord James Douglas. 2 vols. (Bentley and Sons.)—We must own ourselves to be little acquainted with the subject of which Lord James Douglas writes. We never heard of a great race which seems to go by the name of the "Billesdon Coplow," and we are not quite sure of the meaning of "poney" and "monkey," beyond knowing that both words are used in what logicians call a "second intention." We cannot say, therefore, any more than that the author seems very much at home in his subject, except it be to commend, from our point of view, the feeling which is expressed by his hero, coming back from the Franco-German war, and finding the old world of racing and betting,—namely, that this occupation is not worthy of serious men. The war scenes are described with vigour, and the story generally moves on with liveliness.

We have received The Lives of Jehan Vitrier and John Colet, translated from the Latin of Erasmus by J. H. Lupton, M.A. (Bell and Sons.)—The Elements of Logic, by T. K. Abbott, B.D. (Longmans, Green, and Co., London; Hodges, Figgis, and Co., Dublin.)—County Court Cases, by H. A. De Colyar, being reports of cases heard in the County Courts included in the Circuits Nos. 45 and 46. (Horace Cox.)—A fifth and enlarged edition of R. F. D. Palgrave's Chairman's Handbook, a handy and useful manual; Theakston's British Angling Flies, revised and annotated by F. M. Walbran. (Sampson Low and Co.)—A revised edition of Voices in Solitude, by R. G. H. (Maxwells.)—The Sea Fisheries of Great Britain and Ireland, by E. W. H. Holdsworth, one of a series of illustrated volumes on "British Industries," edited by G. Phillips Bevan. (E. Stanford.)—A fifth edition of the Rev. S. Haughton's Natural Philosophy Popularly Explained. (Cassell and Co.)—An author's pocket edition of One Summer, by B. W. Howard. (D. Douglas, Edinburgh.)—A second edition of First Lessons in Book-keeping, by J. Thornton. (Macmillan.)—Book-keeping by Double Entry, by A. Cariss. (Effingham Wilson, London; H. Young, Liverpool.)—Medical Guide to the Mineral Waters of France and its Wintering Stations, by A. Vintras, M.D. (Churchills.)—Health Resorts and Spas, by H. J. Hardwicke, M.D. (Allen and Co.)—Tourists' Guide to Swansea, Mumbles, and Gower, by J. C. Woods. (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., London; Edwards, Swansea.)—The Eastern Counties, by C. S. Ward, M.A., with Maps and Plans by Bartholomew, an addition to the "Thorough Guide Series" issued by Dulau and Co.)—A second edition of Dr. G. H. Brandl's Baths of Royat. (Lewis.)—Æsthetical Sanitation, by W. White, a reprint of papers originally published in the British Architect.—Queer Fish, by R. Overton, a reprint of character sketches originally published in magazine form. (Dean and Son.)—Third Historical Reader, "England, from 1603 to the Present Time," for the use of scholars in Standards VI. and VII.; a series of School Recitation Books, for the use of scholars in Standards II.-VI. These books form commendable additions to the capital "Educational Series" issued by Messrs. Blackwood and Sons.—Poems and Ballads for Penny Readings. (Wyman and Sons.)

We have received from Messrs. F. S. Nichols and Co. an etching, by Percy Thomas, of the old White Inn Yard, Southwark, as it stood in 1882.

—The First Female Medical Mission begun in India.

The Delhi and South Punjab Mission of the S.P.G. carries on its work among over 3,000,000 of people, and besides Delhi and its suburbs, occupies fifty towns and villages. Its work is carried on,—(1) By training native agents. (2) By philanthropical agencies, of which the most important is medical work among women and children. (3) By day and night schools for boys and young men, with 1,535 pupils. (4) By zananah missions, with 792 pupils. (5) By dividing the city and country into districts, giving each a systematic parochial organisation, for both Christians and non-Christians. The Medical Mission attended 12,953 cases, with an average of 121 sick attended daily. Owing to the growth of the work, the Missionaries are responsible for raising £1,500 a year, over and above annual grants from the Society and Government.

Subscriptions for the general work, or for the Medical Mission in particular, will be gladly received and acknowledged by the Rev. Canon CROWFOOT, Minister Yard, Lincoln; by the Rev. R. E. WINTER (Delhi); or by Rev. W. C. BROMHEAD, Kensington Palace, W.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ONE of the most violent volcanic eruptions of which we have heard for many years commenced in Java on August 26th. The particular volcano which burst out was that of Krakatoa, which sent forth an immense cloud of ashes and dust, made day almost into night even at Batavia, and overwhelmed North Bantam, while a tidal wave swept away Anjer, Tjeringen, and Telokbetong. Thousands of lives are lost. It is stated that Mount Krakatoa, where the eruption began, has disappeared completely in the sea, but that sixteen volcanic islands have appeared in its place; that the lighthouses of the Straits of Sunda,—between Java and Sumatra,—have disappeared, and that the whole navigation of the channel is changed.

Living in Java is really living over a roaring furnace from which you are separated by nothing but a thin crust of earth. Probably no volcanic eruptions in the world have been physically so terrible as some of those in Java, though the Italian eruptions have broken in more conspicuously on the art and civilisation of the world. In 1815, the volcanic eruption in the island of Sumbawa, to the east of Java, was so violent that the explosion was heard in Sumatra, a distance of near a thousand miles away, and the Rajah of Sangar, who saw the eruption, described it thus:—"About seven o'clock on the night of April 10th, three distinct columns of flame burst forth near the top of the mountain, all of them apparently within the verge of the crater, and, after ascending separately to a very great height, their tops united in the air in a troubled, confused manner. In a short time the whole mountain next Sangar appeared like a body of liquid fire extending itself in every direction. The fire and columns of flame continued to rage with unabated fury until the darkness caused by the quantity of falling matter obscured it, at about eight o'clock." The eruption in August, 1772, of the volcano called Papandayang, eighty-seven miles south-east of Batavia, is said to have broken off the top of the mountain altogether, and to have left a vast cavity many square miles in extent, when the eruption was over. Living in this volcanic region is like living at the mouth of a loaded cannon.

On Friday week, the Lords took into consideration the reasons of the Commons for disagreeing to the Lords' further amendment to the Agricultural Holdings Bill, Lord Carlingford moving that the Lords do not insist on that amendment. Thereupon, Lord Salisbury, declaring that as the end of the Session approached, "the influence of those estimable and valuable Members of their Lordships' House, whom Charles Fox once called 'the Janissaries of the Bedchamber,' increased every hour," said that he had no intention of dividing the House, but that he could not allow the question to be put without remarking on the ambiguities of the Bill, and the reason for those ambiguities. He quoted some high, legal authority,—we suppose Lord Cairns,—as entirely differing from the view of the Government in relation to the need for the amendment which he had proposed, and then amiably asked why these ambiguities were allowed to remain? This he answered by saying that the Government were compelled, by their uncomfortable position, to put two distinct faces on the matter,—one for the Conservatives and one for the Radicals,—and that it was on this account that they would not say plainly what they meant, but endeavoured to kindle hopes of the most opposite tendency. Lord Selborne, of course, warmly resented this vindictive Parthian shaft of Lord Salisbury's, and maintained that the Government had framed their Bill with no political object, but simply because they thought that the form they had given it would best do equal justice between two great classes; and he denied the ambiguity alleged, and the possibility of making the measure clearer. Then after a despairing protest from Lord Wemyss, the amendment was dropped.

On Saturday, the Houses met for a short time, to receive the Royal Assent to a variety of Bills, and to be prorogued in the usual quaint fashion by the Royal Commissioners in cocked hats, which each of them lifted reverentially when his name was read out in the Commission. The Lord Chancellor was, of course, the Commissioner selected to read the Queen's speech, which said, in relation to Egypt, "The work of administrative reorganisation, though retarded at important points by the visitation of the cholera, has steadily advanced. The aim of the temporary occupation of the country by my military forces, the considerations which must supply the measure of its duration, and the constant direction of my efforts to the maintenance of established rights, to the tranquillity of the East, and to the welfare of the Egyptian people, have been more than once explained to you, and they remain unchanged;" as also, her Majesty might have added, do the conditions which postpone the clearer elucidation of those unchanged purposes. On the Madagascar difficulty, the Queen's language was confident; and her confidence was soon justified by the event. "The negotiations with France, conducted in the spirit of friendship, will, I doubt not, lead to satisfactory results." In connection with the subject of negotiation itself, her Majesty's attention "has been, and will continue to be, steadily directed to all which may affect the rights or liberties of my subjects." With regard to Zululand and the Transvaal, the Royal speech was frankly despondent; and with regard to Ireland, sanguine. The Queen was satisfied with the improvement effected in the conduct of legislation, and referred with congratulation to the principal Acts passed, including that for the redemption of National Debt. Parliament stands prorogued at present to November 12th.

The Queen's Speech was immediately followed by the announcement that Mr. Shaw, the English Missionary, had been set at liberty by the French in the Island of Bourbon (or Réunion), and that an explanation—of the nature of an apology—of the cavalier manner in which her Majesty's ship 'Dryad' had been treated by the French Admiral at Tamatave is to be published. It is added, too, that a compensation is to be offered to Mr. Shaw for his imprisonment, but this is not yet officially confirmed. In any case, it is clear enough that Mr. Gladstone's very moderate language in Parliament, which the leader of the Opposition and others so greatly misunderstood, was merely the moderation of a Minister who had put his case strongly, though courteously, in private, and had not failed to produce the required effect. Nothing can be more foolish than to hector Foreign Governments in public, if you really wish to press your representations on them with becoming force and firmness. Admiral Pierre has been replaced by Admiral Galiber, and the French papers themselves express the opinion that Admiral Pierre has not been relieved of his command on the ground of health alone.

It would almost seem as if the French were likely to take warning by the disagreeable hints which they have lately received of the way in which great enterprises in the East hamper them at home. It looks as if they were intending to make up their quarrel with Madagascar, without attempting to press further their military and naval advantages. It is believed in France that the advance on Antananarivo has been abandoned for the present, and that France will be content if the Hovas consent to recognise her protectorate over a portion of the coast. Let us hope that public rumour does French policy no more than justice.

The check of France in one of the Anamite regions,—the chief campaign upon the Red River,—has been compensated by a brilliant victory over the capital, Hué, where a convention was signed between France and the Anamite King, on August 23rd, nominally conceding all that France could reasonably ask,—i.e., (1), a war indemnity; (2), the occupation of the forts commanding the Hué River by a French garrison, till the indemnity is paid; (3), the annexation of a province to French Cochinchina; (4), the recall of the Anamite troops from the Red River, these troops to be at General Bonet's disposal for operations against the Black Flags; and (5), the confirmation of the French Protectorate over all Anam. These terms must be satisfactory enough to France, if she could only rely on their being carried out. But the difficulty will be to assert Anamite authority at all over the region in Tonquin where the real struggle is going on,—that of the Red River. This region is distant some 400 miles from the capital, and there it is that France has to encounter a very different class of enemies from those of the Anam troops. China, moreover, is watching her proceedings in Tonquin with the utmost jealousy; and if France be wise, she will, under cover of this victory, withdraw as much as possible from pushing her advantage,—at all events, till she has come to satisfactory terms with China. The Treaty signed at Hué is quite sufficient to bring her off with flying colours. But if she presses her purpose in Tonquin, she will have no easy task, notwithstanding her victory in the south.

Mr. Bright made two speeches on the Temperance question at Birmingham, on Wednesday, on the occasion of opening a new coffee tavern, to be called by Mr. Cobden's name. In the first speech, he explained that for ten years he had never taken wine or spirits, and had not suffered in any way by that change of habit; but when he spoke of a coffee-house as a place where people cannot get anything that will do them harm, surely Mr. Bright was romancing. We doubt if there are not at least as many people whose health would be more injured by three cups of good coffee in the day than it would be by three glasses of good claret, as there are people whose health would be more injured by three glasses of good claret than it would be by three cups of good coffee. Intemperance in wine is both commoner and more dangerous than intemperance in coffee; but taken temperately, light wine is, we suspect, less likely to disturb the system than good coffee.

In his greater speech at the Town Hall, Mr. Bright was, as he himself hinted, truly Conservative in his suggestion of the best way of dealing with the Temperance question. He would, he said, prescribe by law a certain maximum in the proportion of licensed public-houses to population, beyond which no place should be allowed to go, after the passing of his proposed Act. He would also prescribe as a minimum that no reduction in the number of licences down to half the maximum should be permitted, and he would (in towns) lodge the power to diminish the number of licences within this margin, in the corporation. He would hand over to the corporation also the income derived from the licences, and allow them even to increase the licence duty within given limits. But he would go no further. He thought that a trade permitted by law should be protected by law, and that no general invasion of the vested interests of publicans should be encouraged or permitted.

Mr. Parnell, speaking in Dublin on Wednesday, congratulated Ireland heartily on the passing of the Fisheries Act, the Labourers Act, and the Tramways Act, and he anticipated that before long a measure of local self-government for Ireland would be passed by Parliament, by which the Irish would obtain a very great instalment of what they need to train them in the formation of national habits of thought and will. Mr. Parnell's tone was extremely moderate, and even the speakers who followed him, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Davitt, and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, do not seem to have indulged in any of that wild vituperation for which even the Freeman's Journal recently rebuked Mr. Healy. If violence were not considered necessary to stimulate American sympathy and Irish electoral enthusiasm, we might hope for the speedy prevalence of a rational spirit among the Irish party leaders. Unfortunately, it is the men who go farthest and scream the worst who best command American money and Irish votes.

The London journals have been making far too little of the disturbances in Croatia. Whether these disturbances are suppressed summarily or not, they are symptomatic of a chronic hostility to Magyar domination, which nothing short of release from the tyranny of a detested yoke will appease. The truth is, that the Magyar, like his kinsman the Turk, is a very pleasant fellow to outsiders who are independent of him, but is an arrogant oppressor of those who are subject to him. Croatia is geographically a part of the Hungarian Kingdom, but the population are Slavs, and demand Home-rule with far better reason than the Irish. The Magyars are a minority of the population, even in Hungary proper, and with the instincts of a governing caste ruling over a race more numerous and progressive than themselves, their policy is to keep the Croats as backward as possible in civilisation. They discourage Slav schools, and put impediments even in the way of improving the roads in Croatia, which are among the worst in Europe. The present outbreak had its origin in the Government of Hungary posting up all official notices in the Magyar tongue, a language not understood except by a mere fraction of the population of Croatia. We expect that the Hapsburg ruler will temporise, but side, on the whole, with the Croats. They saved his empire in 1848, and the Slavs form by far the largest portion of the Austrian Army. Bismarck's policy of pushing Austrian rule eastward is not unlikely, whether he intends it or not, to end in the disintegration of the Austrian Empire. If it be true that Tisza, the Hungarian Prime Minister, is about to resign, the fact may be taken as indicating that the Emperor declines to support the Magyar policy.

The Comte de Chambord is to be buried near Goritz, on Monday, in the Monastery of the Franciscans at Castagnaviceca, where his grandfather, Charles X., already lies. The funeral will be a solemn one, for the good Prince did in some way manage to impress all who knew him with an effect of loftiness of character, partly due, no doubt, to immovable prepossessions on small matters, in which he could be as inexorable as if he were Destiny herself; partly to his intrinsic indifference to the successful issue of the cause of which he was the representative. The political enthusiasts for the Comte de Chambord cannot be very numerous,—though it is said that the Legitimists are subscribing to enable a certain number of Legitimist artisans to attend the funeral,—for though ideas are sometimes impracticable, the multitude are not given to assuming that all impracticabilities are ideas, and it would take that, to make the Comte de Chambord's political pretensions in any sense popular with the masses. Still, the phlegmatic excellence of the Comte de Chambord's character has certainly produced more of a general impression than we should have thought it possible for one to produce whose name and flag recalled so many painful memories. At least without a very definite genius of his own, no man so weighted by bad traditions has gained popularity. And a very definite genius of his own can hardly be attributed to the deceased Bourbon.

The Western Mail of Tuesday professes to quote from a "Liberal" Gloucester paper—the Gloucester Journal of last Saturday—an article on "The Downfall of England," which contains one of the most violent pieces of vituperation against Mr. Gladstone and his Cabinet which we have ever read. For fury, it would seem to surpass even Irish loathing at its worst. This is how the Western Mail,—a Conservative paper, by the way,—quotes what it terms its "Liberal" contemporary:—"Her political fortunes are directed by a hypocrite, who is also a blood-guilty tyrant, and a conspirator against the honour of the country. The hateful and atrocious Gladstone, whom 'twere flattery to call a rascal, has associated with him in the Government a gang of incompetent nobodies, who, partly through ignorance are betraying every British interest. About the only conspirator with any brains is a fellow named Chamberlain, who makes screws or something down at Birmingham, and who has been in league with the Irish rebels, and incited them to get up murderous outrages as an excuse for robbing the landlords by an iniquitous Act of Spoliation. The people of the country are afflicted with a sort of dementia, which prevents them from realising the odious character of their political leaders, and the imminent perils into which those pernicious adventurers have brought our beloved country. The populace, lulled into false security, are looking forward to peace and prosperity; but a very different period is being prepared for us by the strangest set of philosophers and geniuses that were ever allowed to touch the helm of affairs." Clearly, the Gloucester Journal is, or has just become, a comic paper, and is attempting a burlesque of the violent style. It is not very happy, for it wants the touch of the grotesque that alone makes extravagant invective funny; but then, how difficult it is to succeed in burlesque! The Gloucester Journal may do better, in time. It is even a kind of success to have persuaded the Western Mail that this passion in tatters was serious.

We are glad to see that the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has not only strongly expressed his wish to see qualified medical women practising in India, but has discouraged peremptorily the idea of requiring from them any less thorough medical culture than is required from their male colleagues. There is no quarter of the world where highly qualified medical women might do more good than in India, and it is encouraging to find that Brahmo opinion is as favourable to the experiment as cultivated European opinion itself. The paper published at Calcutta called Brahmo Public Opinion contained on July 12th an article heartily favourable to the admission of females to the Medical College. The efforts which are being made in this country to educate native women as physicians, and to send them out with a guaranteed income for a certain term of years, will evidently meet with no obstruction in India. Educated female physicians in adequate numbers would do more to lighten Indian households with sound medical, sanitary, and moral principles, than all the medical men whom we could send to India, who never really reach the interior of a Hindoo household at all.

The German Reichstag has been summoned at a very unusual season of the year, but it does not appear that it has met for any purpose except to sanction a commercial treaty with Spain. Probably Prince Bismarck used the opportunity to give a fright to France by the semi-official article on the violence of the French Press, which he inserted in the Nord Deutsche Gazette. That article is now admitted to have been more or less intended as a snub to General Thibaudin for talking of mobilising an Army Corps on the eastern frontier of France, a snub which, no doubt, had other uses, but which Prince Bismarck loves to administer from time to time, as the school-master loves to cane,—just to keep his hand in. Apparently, there is no intention at present of pushing the alarm further. The Reichstag, when it has completed its little job, is to be allowed to separate without any further sensation.

The military rising in Spain seems to have blown over without much result, and the King, who has just been on a tour of inspection to the various disaffected garrisons, has been, it is given out, very well received. But Señor Sagasta will almost certainly have to modify his Cabinet, in consequence of the shock which this series of small detonations has given to the prestige of the Government; and it is said that Señor Campos, the Minister at War, who was taken into the Government in spite of his Conservative leanings, rather on account of the confidence felt by the King in him as a disciplinarian, will have to go. The Spanish Government are complaining to the French Government that Ruiz Zorrilla is permitted to hatch plots in France against the government of a friendly neighbour, and France has not yet formulated her reply, but the Government fully feel their responsibility, and if it appears that Ruiz Zorrilla is still in France, he is, it is said, to be ordered away by the Government.

It is not, perhaps, surprising that the returns of suicides in great cities make Paris the chief capital of suicide. That is just what one would expect from the chief capital of pleasure. If you make pleasure your main object, you are pretty sure, not, indeed, to commit suicide, but to learn very rapidly to understand something of the state of mind from which suicide proceeds. In Paris, for every million of inhabitants there are 402 suicides, while in Naples there are only 34. We suppose that the physical nature in Naples is too much at ease to conspire with the mind against the habit of living. The capital next to Paris in suicidal tendency is Stockholm, why, it is very hard to say. In Stockholm the proportion is 354 suicides to a million of inhabitants; Copenhagen comes next, and then Vienna, Brussels, Dresden, St. Petersburg, Florence, Berlin, New York, Genoa, London, and Rome, in order. In London there are only 87 suicides to each million of inhabitants. Yet one would have hardly conceived this order to have represented the descending scale of irritability of temperament, or of liability to physical suffering.

Mr. Davenport Handley is fighting a chivalrous battle in Rutlandshire against Mr. James W. Lowther, who represents, we suppose, his namesake's views on the land. We shall not know the result before going to press. Rutlandshire has not returned a Liberal since the last Reform Bill; nor, indeed, has any Liberal ever contested the county since 1841. Still, Mr. Handley has a right to say, as he does say, that the Conservatives would never have done the farmers the justice of giving them the Agricultural Holdings Act, and that their leaders denounced many of the provisions of that Act up to the last moment. Whether that will weigh, as it ought to do, in the contest, we are not sure. Farmers often move in even deeper ruts of time-honoured opinion than the landlords themselves.

Mr. J. R. Byrne, writing to Friday's Times from Upper Norwood, maintains that the true test of reading-power,—reading-power, that is, in the sense of being able to read to yourself for enjoyment,—is the power to read well aloud; and asserts that the recognised test of proficiency in reading in Germany is the excellence of the reading aloud. Nevertheless, we have known a great many well-read men,—men to whom reading was the meat and drink of life,—who could not read aloud even respectably, who read aloud so that you hardly understood their meaning, and this though some of them could speak admirably. And we quite agree with those persons whom Mr. Byrne treats with such contempt, that good elocutional reading aloud, though an excellent faculty (when it is not abused, as it too often is, by insisting on reading aloud to people who, perhaps very justly, hate to be read aloud to), is only a luxury of education, and by no means an essential to anybody. To read fluently and easily to yourself, that is everything. To read aloud is the gift of the few, and not unfrequently entails suffering on the many.

One of the most important of the legislative failures of the Session is the loss of the Medical Act Amendment Bill, which might probably have been carried at last, but for the miscarriage of the business arrangements of a single night. Its object was, in Mr. Gladstone's own words, "to make the Medical profession in the three countries [England, Scotland, and Ireland] one in standard and one in authority," by establishing a common test through which every medical practitioner must pass. This has been the object of an agitation lasting fifty years, and it was confidently hoped that the end had been reached this Session. The medical men, we see, think that this misfortune is due to the want of Medical representatives in the House of Commons, or at least of representatives pledged to accept medical opinion on subjects interesting to the medical profession. But we earnestly trust that the mischief will not be remedied in that way. The remedy would be worse than the disease.

Switzerland appears to occupy a very unenviable position in relation to the frequency of divorce. In the Protestant half of Appenzell, there were in 1881 over thirteen divorces to every hundred marriages; and in Thurgau, there were more than nine. Of the causes of divorce, difference of religious opinion appears to be a frequent one, if we may judge by the fact that of the religion of the persons divorced in 1881, in less than one per cent. of the cases were both husband and wife Catholic; in less than three per cent. were the husband and wife both Protestant; while in cases of different religions divorces are much more frequent, especially where the husband is Protestant and the wife Catholic. It is said that a great many marriages in the lower classes are avowedly entered upon on the understanding that, if after a year's trial the husband and wife do not suit each other, they shall give in a joint application for divorce on the ground of incompatibility of temper. In 1881, no less than 1,171 Swiss suits of divorce were granted, and divorces pronounced in 946 cases.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE POLITICAL DUTIES OF THE RECESS.

WHAT does the Times mean by its constant and emphatic exhortation to Members of Parliament to hold their tongues during the Recess? It seems to us to show that that paper does not in the least appreciate what a democracy means, or what is the best way to educate it. If we thought of training the electors, and of training the electors alone, we should desire not that politicians should take a long rest, but that they should all of them at once begin that useful drill of their constituents in the different views that may be taken of Parliamentary questions, on which the intelligence of the votes to be given at the next General Election must, for the most part, depend. It may be very true that, looking to the necessities of Parliament alone, Parliamentary politicians may be justified, and even more than justified, in taking a good rest. The petty fag and squabbling of the Session must have worn out many of our representatives, and predisposed almost all with any share of wisdom for a time of reticence and political repose. But unfortunately for this repose, Members of Parliament are not elected only for the purposes of representation. It is very doubtful whether, as the suffrage widens and the constituencies increase, the obligation of the Member to keep his constituents well informed of his view of the questions of the day, and to answer the criticisms of those who take different and opposite views to himself, is not greater and even more useful to the public than his duty of giving the views he has announced the full weight of his vote and influence in the House of Commons.

How is the Democracy to be taught what are the important issues of politics, and what are the most telling views on the subject of those issues? Partly, no doubt, by the help of the public journals; but, in truth, the public journals themselves are almost powerless to force any subject on public notice without the help afforded by the speakers, whether Liberal or Conservative, who canvass these questions in the country. The public journals are hardly read unless they take their text from the events of the day. And almost the only test that any question is one of the subjects of the day is the evidence that it is much discussed in public, and that this view and that are given of it in great town and county meetings. The only effect of a universal reticence of politicians would be a universal effort on the part of the journals of the day to find social topics more interesting to their readers than the politics of which Members of Parliament seemed to be oblivious. And then, if the silence of politicians produced, as it would, a political apathy of the public Press, the people would sink into a similar apathy, the greater issues of politics would no longer be kept before them, and the elections, whenever the elections came, would be conducted under the extreme disadvantage that the electors would not be prepared for them by the growth of any serious conviction, and would vote in the haphazard fashion which leads to no satisfactory result, or, perhaps, even to a result just the opposite of that at which the people, if fully awake to the chief issues, would have arrived. What the Times is thinking of when it deprecates Long-Vacation oratory is no doubt the inutility, so far as Members of Parliament and journalists may be concerned, of repeating over and over again the criticisms which Parliament has so often heard, and which the London and provincial papers have so often weighed in their balance. But it forgets how very different is the effect produced on a voter's mind by glancing at the Parliamentary reports and at the leading articles written on those reports,—even when he does glance at them, whereas multitudes of electors never do,—and the effect produced on him by hearing the representative to whom he has given his confidence explain fully, in his presence, what considerations weighed upon his own mind, or by hearing the candidate of the opposite party assail the view thus presented, and discuss elaborately all the objections to which it is open. That is the process which really forms political conviction in the country, and which keeps it active and vigilant. Without that process, we should have more and more voters every day boasting that they took no interest in politics, and did not care a farthing whether their constituency returned its former Members, or turned them out in favour of new Members. Only the frequent contact of Members with their constituencies keeps the political judgment of the country alert and earnest, and therefore no man is fit to be an ordinary Member of Parliament,—a Member, we mean, not burdened with Ministerial duties,—who does not contribute his full share to the political education of the people, as well as to the guidance of the judgment of the House of Commons. It may be quite right for the ordinary Member of Parliament to hold his tongue very sedulously in the House. If there are others who can say better what he would say, he must be right in generally leaving it to them to say for him. But he can never be right in leaving his constituents to their own devices. He, and he only, can really speak to them with the sort of authority which they need for the purposes of political education. They have chosen him to represent them, and therefore they listen to him with the sort of deference with which people always listen to the man of their own choice. What he says will receive a sort of attention from them which the words of few other speakers will receive. And what those who support or oppose him say, will be listened to with a kind of interest that nothing said in favour of or against other politicians will attract. Whether a representative has the ear of Parliament or not, he has always the ear of his own constituents; and it is a duty almost more incumbent upon him, because more completely in his power, to ripen the public opinion of his own constituency, than to ripen the opinion of Parliament itself. We maintain that when a man is chosen to represent in the House of Commons the views of many thousands of electors, his explicit and pledged duty, though the most obvious, is by no means the most important of the duties which he undertakes. From that moment, he is the exponent of public opinion within a certain area on certain important subjects, and is the only person who can really keep that public opinion healthy, vigilant, and candid. This he can do by frequent interchanges of opinion and confidences with his constituents, by keeping his attention fixed on all points on which he thinks opinion doubtful and unsound, by taking pains to clear up opinion on those subjects, by bringing the most formidable objections to which his own opinions are exposed clearly before his constituents, and by giving them the best answers he can find to those objections,—in short, by treating himself as the natural focus of the political opinion of the community which he represents, and doing all in his power to bring the various rays of political light to converge in that focus.

It will be said that this view of a representative's duty to his constituents is a "counsel of perfection." Perhaps so; but we are deeply convinced that the more democratic our Constitution grows, the more its efficiency will depend on this view being generally taken of a Member's duties to his constituents. It is not for the formation of Members' opinions, it is not for the formation of journalists' opinions, it is not for the modification of experts' opinions, that all this speaking and listening is necessary. It is for the formation of something at least approaching to an opinion, in numbers of voters who never get near to the real sources of opinion at all except when they hear the voice of their Member, and hear the criticisms passed upon him by his fellow-townsmen or his county neighbours. Lord Sherbrooke once told us, very justly, that it was our duty "to educate our masters." And so it is, in a much larger sense than he at that time intended to convey. Mr. Forster's Act is educating them in one way; and every true political discussion educates them in another way. It is no easy achievement to give a true political education to a democracy. That is not a feat to be accomplished by the superfine fastidiousness and supercilious contempt for reiteration which the Times expresses. Line upon line, and precept upon precept,—incessant earnestness and incessant candour,—a constant sense of responsibility and inexhaustible patience—are essential on the part of politicians, if the great majority of the electors, present and prospective, are to be awakened to the sense of their duties, and to the genuine desire to perform their duties as electors, and not merely to exercise their rights. Members of Parliament may be weary, nay, must be weary, if they are to discharge well their function in educating the opinion of their constituencies. Journalists must be sickened by hearing the same things said over and over again, in very much the same way. But the weariness of Members of Parliament and the nausea of journalists will be but slight evils, when balanced against the great result of keeping awake in the whole community the deep sense of political responsibility, and of imparting to the people enough knowledge to ensure the honest and intelligent exercise of that responsibility by the great mass of the electors.

LORD SALISBURY'S WRATH.

LORD SALISBURY is evidently of Luther's mind, that wrath and passion are his best allies. "If I want to compose," said Luther, "to write, to pray, to preach, I must be wrathful, then my whole blood is freshened, my understanding is made keener, and all my miserable thoughts and temptations give place." Lord Salisbury is of the same opinion, only he means, we think, something different from the old Reformer, by the wrath he so elaborately invokes. Wrath is the inspiration of his public career, but it is not the wrath which represents a rush of fiery indignation, like Luther's, but wrath bred by scorn and caste, the almost impotent rage which chafes at the evidence of a popular power that Lord Salisbury can neither vanquish nor even venture to defy. The wrath of which Luther spoke was that burning indignation against evil, or what looks like evil, which purifies the atmosphere of the mind, even though in its heat it misses its true aim. The wrath which seems always to be kindling in Lord Salisbury's political mind is a saturnine and smouldering fire, which never burns up bright and free, but makes Lord Salisbury, as his old chief and colleague himself said of him, "a master of jibes and sneers." His last speech in the House of Lords in the Session just closed, like most of his other speeches, was a speech of taunting impotence. Of course, he had to give way to the Government with regard to his amendment on the Agricultural Holdings Bill, for even in the House of Lords he had passed it only by a majority of a single vote, and had been firmly opposed by the Duke of Richmond and a considerable number of his own followers. Under such circumstances, to have courted a new division would have been childish, and Lord Salisbury refrained; but he could not keep silence even from bad words, and he liberated his soul in that unmeaning sneer at "the Janissaries of the Bedchamber,"—a very inapplicable phrase, whoever first used it, to the few Peers who stay in town to make a House for the Government,—and that unworthy insinuation that the Government had intentionally made their measure ambiguous in order that Radicals might read it one way and Conservatives another, by which he relieved his spleen, but relieved it at the cost of his influence. Lord Salisbury is, indeed, proved by every new Session through which he lives to be the most unfit leader of his party that our century has produced. Compared with him, the late Lord Derby was prudence and amiability itself, and the Duke of Wellington an accomplished statesman. The former was glad enough, when he saw a chance, to "dish the Whigs," but at least he never indulged in impotent maledictions on them. The latter gave the word of command to retreat whenever he found a political position absolutely untenable, with the same homely good-humour with which he would have evacuated a fortress which it was impossible to defend. But Lord Salisbury skilfully provides occasions for dishing, not the Whigs, but the Conservatives; and when he has done so, he never retreats unobtrusively, as he ought, but sits maliciously eyeing the Liberals, who pass him by unscathed, like the giant Pope in Bunyan's fable, who is described, when the pilgrims pass him, as "grinning and biting his nails, because he cannot come at them."

We cannot imagine a worse mental attitude for the leader of the Conservatives than this irritable malice of Lord Salisbury's. In the first place, it is not Conservative, for however cautious, timid, lugubrious, even alarmist, Conservatives may legitimately be, they should not snarl and maliciously impute bad motives to their opponents, as Lord Salisbury is always doing, if they wish to carry the safe and cautious men with them, as of course they do. No safe man ever snarls at what he cannot prevent, because, as he justly observes, that makes matters worse, and aggravates the quarrel, without bringing a single auxiliary to his side. No cautious man imputes ill motives to his opponents, because, as he cautiously reflects, no man can see or weigh the motives of his opponents; moreover, cautious men are repelled and alienated by imputations of motive, and have their confidence in any leader who indulges in that useless display of temper seriously undermined. A Conservative in Opposition may fairly bewail the past, and draw the most melancholy pictures of the future as it will be affected by Liberal reforms; that is his legitimate function in life, and if he did not entertain these dismal feelings, he would hardly be a Conservative. But a Conservative always strives to attenuate the mischief which he apprehends, and it is not attenuating the mischief which he apprehends to indulge, as Lord Salisbury does, in spiteful effusions over the dishonest ambiguities of his opponents. Consider the political demeanour of the Duke of Richmond. There you have the model Conservative,—timid of innovation, anxious to attenuate necessary reforms, never defiant, deprecatory of threats, eager for compromise. Such is the statesman who, if he had Lord Salisbury's flow of effective speech, would bring all the timid party to his feet, and not a few even of the party which sincerely desires reform, but has a morbid fear of ardent reformers. But the Duke of Richmond is not an orator, and is too modest to displace Lord Salisbury who is; and the consequence is that instead of one whose whole temperament expresses the feelings of the cautious party, the unfortunate Conservatives find themselves constantly misrepresented to the country by a mouthpiece who says on their behalf just what makes them shudder most. They hear those sweeping denunciations which they would be apt to attribute to the demagogue as specially appropriate to him, proceeding from the spokesman of a small and privileged caste, who has not even the strength of numbers behind him,—and what, they must ask themselves, can be more insolently rash than to combine the irritating arrogance that is safe in tribunes of the people, with the defence of exclusiveness and the apology for privilege? We think we may safely predict that so long as Lord Salisbury continues to give character and colour to the policy of the Conservative party, even timid politicians will regard the administration of the country as safer in the hands of Mr. Gladstone's Government, than in the hands of any Government in which Lord Salisbury would have a potential voice.

WHAT HAS THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT DONE?

NOW that the smoke and stir of the battle are over, and that the corpses of thrice-slain amendments are buried out of the way, we can see with greater clearness what has been lost and won on either side in the Agricultural Holdings Act. Looked at from the party point of view, there can be little doubt that the struggle itself has been an immense benefit to the Liberal party. It has shown that when the question at stake is a simple one of plain honesty and justice between man and man, the Conservative party, or at least the Conservative leader and one section of his party, are ever ready to uphold the wrong because the wrong is "established." It has shown that whether the scene is laid in Ireland or in England, whether the measure proposed is one which constitutes an admitted departure from accepted doctrines of State non-intervention, or is merely putting in force the common principles on which men daily act where land is not concerned, Lord Salisbury is equally ready to fight to the bitter end, so long as his followers will follow him. The curious spectacle presented three years running of the "master of thirty legions" in the House of Lords being deserted by his legions, after they had already sacked the enemy's camp, is a very edifying one for the opposite party. The people of England in general will note that on each occasion it was a Land Bill which the House of Landlords threatened to wreck, though at the last moment they refused to stand to their guns, and left the field in possession of the enemy. But the Agricultural Holdings Act has not merely discredited the Conservative leader, but it has discredited the Conservative party. Where now are the farmers' friends? Directly a small reform in the law of landlord and tenant is proposed in the interest of the tenant, the party which professes to be the friend of the tenant, and to think that the interests of landlord and tenant are identical, turns round and fights might and main against any concession. After this, the county electors will surely think once, twice, and thrice, before blindly intrusting their interests to such gay deceivers,—"both feet on the land and all at sea, to one thing constant never," if one may travesty the poet. It is extraordinary that any party should be so unwise. But it is only the latest instance of the truth of the saying of the Swedish Chancellor to his son which the English Chancellor, Brougham, was so fond of quoting,—"Go, my son, and see with how little wisdom the world is governed."

But to look at the Act from the point of view of landlord and tenant, what exactly has it done for the tenant? Before 1875, the agricultural tenant was subject to the strict rule of the common law. Whatever he placed in the soil, whatever he fixed on it, or in any building on it, belonged to his landlord, when he left. There were a few trifling exceptions. The "way-going" crop he could take, according to the custom of the country; but the way-going crop was not of much benefit to him, because, as it was said, to take it necessitated his carrying on business in two places at once. He could, under an Act passed in 1851, claim the property in a fixture erected for agricultural purposes, if erected with the consent in writing of his landlord. In a few counties, and for a few items of labour or expenditure, such as claying, or marling, or the use of artificial manure, he could get a miserably inadequate compensation. In the greater part of the country, and for the greater part of the improvements effected by him, he could get nothing at all. In other words, he spent money, and another got the profit; he laboured, and another entered into the fruits of his labour. For this state of things, as depressing and injurious to the tenant as it was in the long-run injurious to the landlord, the Act of 1875 was introduced with a great flourish of trumpets by Mr. Disraeli. It divided improvements into three classes,—the permanent improvements, such as draining and building, which were to be considered exhausted in twenty years; the durable, such as claying or boning, which were calculated to last seven years; and the temporary, such as the use of artificial manure, which were to be taken as exhausted in two years. The measure of the compensation to be paid was the original outlay of the tenant on an improvement, less a proportionate part, according to the class, for every year which had elapsed since it was made. No compensation was to be paid for an improvement of the first class, unless executed with the landlord's consent in writing; nor of the second class, unless at least a week's notice in writing of the intention to execute it had been given. As regards fixtures, the Act of 1851 was practically re-enacted, only the landlord's consent was no longer necessary to their erection, except in the case of steam-engines, on which he had a veto. Holdings under two acres were wholly exempted from the Act. Practically, as every one knows, the Act was a dead-letter, because of the power given of contracting out of the Act by a mere notice in writing, the result of which was that as soon as the Act was passed it snowed notices in writing throughout the country. The main distinction between the Act of 1883 and that of 1875 is the removal of this power of contracting out of the Act. By the new Act, any contract, agreement, or covenant made by a tenant by virtue of which he is deprived of his right to claim compensation under the Act, "is void, at law and in equity." These be brave words, but they are in reality rather braggart than brave. For, in case of an existing tenancy, "any agreement in writing or custom" which secures any compensation to the tenant for an improvement—while, in the case of future tenancies, any "particular agreement in writing"—excludes the Act. Moreover, improvements already made are not to be paid for, if under any custom or agreement any compensation is to be paid, and permanent improvements are practically not included in the Act in any case, as they only come under it if the landlord within a year consents in writing to the improvement. Here and there, of course, an exceptionally generous landlord will so consent, but as he would have probably paid anyhow, the tenants, as a rule, are not much helped.

The next great change in the present Act is that no definite time is now laid down within which an improvement is to be exhausted, but the measure of compensation to be paid is in all cases to be the value of the improvement at the time of quitting to an incoming tenant, without reference to the original outlay, or the time which has elapsed since it was made. This is a clear and simple principle enough, and no practical valuer would find any difficulty in settling compensation on that basis. But "there shall not be taken into account, as part of the improvement made by the tenant, what is justly due to the inherent capacities of the soil." Now, there are cases, such as draining and fencing, in which it is easy to draw the sound distinction between the increase of value given to good land, and the increase given to poor land, by the improvement. But how any one is to separate the effect of "the inherent capacities of the soil" from that of a judicious boning or marling, which the Lords insisted on including under this rule, it is hard to see. The valuers will have to be hereditary, or else to be scientific analytical chemists of the highest order. Probably, however, they will find their way out of the difficulty by quietly ignoring it, as, happily, they are not obliged to specify it in their award.

The third change of importance is that neither the consent of or notice to the landlord is required before the execution of an improvement in Part III. of the schedule of improvements, which includes Classes II. and III. of the Act of 1875. The consent, however, is still necessary to permanent improvements, such as building and reclamation of land; while, in case of draining, notice must be given, and the landlord has then an option to execute the proposed drainage himself, and charge the tenant with the cost and 3 per cent. interest.

Then, as regards fixtures not included in the scheduled list of improvements, the Act of 1875 is re-enacted, but with the omission of any conditions as to consent or notice. Lastly, the Act applies to all holdings, however small, so that Mr. Arch's clients, the small allotment-holders of half an acre, will be as much benefited by the Act as the large farmer with his thousand acres. A novel part of the Act is that limiting distress to one year, and fixing the costs of levying it. But this part is not of great practical importance, except as a step to the total abolition of this absurd preference given to a creditor who is alike, as a rule, the strongest creditor, and most in a position to take care of himself.

What, then, are the total results of the Act? The general law of fixtures is for agricultural tenants permanently placed on a rational basis. That which a man places on property which is his own for the time being is not henceforth to go to another as of right. The landlord is given a right of pre-emption at the end of the term which is fair enough, and beneficial to the tenant, as a fixture is, of course, of more value in its place than when removed. As regards that special and most important class of fixtures which are called permanent improvements, the principle of property in the tenant is recognised, though it is rendered of less avail, owing to the restrictions of consents and notices with which it is hampered in practice. As regards less permanent improvements, the principle is fully and freely recognised. That which the farmer sows, henceforth he shall reap. He is no longer discouraged from improving by the fear that he will not get value for value given. The misapplied jargon of the Roman lawyer, which has been the curse of agriculture, is now rendered obsolete. It is no longer true to say,—"Quicquid plantatur, seritur, vel inaedificatur, omne solo cedit," at least in the sense that it goes to the lord, and not to the tiller of the soil.

But though much is done, something remains to do. The farmer will get value, but while the restrictions mentioned remain in force, he will hardly get full value for his improvements. The landlord's consent will have to be bought. The inherent capacity of the soil may swallow up a considerable part of the improvements on it. Moreover, the fact that compensation is restricted to scheduled improvements is hardly favourable to the unrestricted development of scientific agriculture. Most, if not all, of the improvements in Part III. of the Schedule were unknown before the middle of last century. Already, since 1875, Part I. has been increased by the addition to the list of the formation of silos, and embankments, and sluices against floods. It is eminently unsatisfactory to the public, which is interested in the greatest possible production of food from the soil, that the adoption of fresh improvements in the methods of stimulating that production should be hindered by the farmers' being afraid of not getting a full return for his experiments.

Still, on the whole, a considerable benefit has been conferred upon the tillers of the soil by the Bill. It is, perhaps, just as well they should not get all they want, or all that is necessary, at once. If the Act does not work as well as it ought, and needs amendment, if its extension proves to be necessary to ensure its professed ends, the Farmers will have at least learnt to which party, and which wing of the party, they are to go to get it; and of which party the rule holds good, "Expect nothing, and you shall not be disappointed."

THE CASE OF THE WEST HIGHLAND CROFTER.

THE Royal Commissioners appointed to investigate the condition of the Crofters and Cottars in the Highlands of Scotland have closed their inquiry, so far as the Hebrides and the opposite districts of the mainland are concerned. They have thus finished the more arduous and necessary part of their allotted task. Five weeks hence they are to reassemble in Caithness-shire, where they will find themselves among a population of different origin, different character, and greatly different surroundings. The people there are chiefly of Scandinavian blood. No great mountain masses upheave their lumpishly-rounded shoulders; the traveller has not to thread his way through sinuous, solitary, shut-in glens, nor to pass the lips of clear and silent lochs; the extent of arable land is much larger than on the western side of the country, and the number of acres per head assigned to the lowest class of the rural population is at least double; while the quality of the soil and the nature of the climate are much better suited for the growth of cereal crops. The tale of grievance and discontent which the Commission will be asked to hear is likely, therefore, to be briefer and less emphatic than the doleful and monotonous narratives which have hitherto been recited.

The recital will do good. It comes all too late, however, to set forth in full the wrongs and cruelties of which a patient, patriotic, and warm-hearted people have been the victims. Much nonsense has undoubtedly been written and spoken about the rude abundance and full content that prevailed among them, before the social revolution which has thrown them into their present wretched plight. Such descriptions take their glory from afar. They are the natural exaggerations of a dreamy, imaginative, romantic race, much addicted to retrospect, and not deficient in self-esteem. Neither the pretty fallacies of pastoral poets, nor the vaunts of those who cherish a sentimental admiration of the past, will blind the sober-minded inquirer to the fact that under the patriarchal system, with all its traditional checks, the life of the masses was in later times meanly prosaic, as it always had been miserably servile. The change that ensued, however, after the collapse of the Jacobite cause, turned greatly to their disadvantage. The old relations between the laird and people were broken. The nobles and gentry lost interest in their homes and in their kinsfolk. Many of them were allured by the fascinations of fashionable life to extravagance and ruin, in the manner and with the consequences graphically described by Adam Smith. They were forced first to mortgage, and then to dispose of, the estates which had been made over to them absolutely, in defiance of the consuetudinary rule which regarded the children of the soil as its proprietors, and forbade the chief to diminish the general property by alienation or sale. The new comers were aliens. They brought with them strictly commercial notions. They looked for the prompt payment of as high a rent as they could get, with the least amount of trouble. Sheep-farming upon a large scale was introduced. It were mere fractious folly to deny that the maintenance of sheep was the best use that the mountains could be put to, almost the only remunerative use that can be got out of them. Equally absurd would it be to shut one's eyes to the immense advance that has been made in the general aspect and productiveness of the country. A Highlander who went to Canada forty years ago would in many cases scarcely recognise his native glen. The old hill-track, strewn with boulders bigger than those over which the Roman chariots rumbled on their itineræ, can hardly be traced now; and instead, there is a level road, constructed in a style that beats Macadam. The battered change-house, redolent of smoke, filth, and whisky, the scene of many an uproarious brawl, has been superseded by a trim hotel, where one can get good food decently cooked and decently served. Swamps have been drained; the extent of land that grew only heather has been curtailed; and, though the mania for sport has interfered with the development of pastoral farming, wherever the flockmaster is unmolested the tokens of knowledge, skill, energy, and enterprise are discernible. The change would have been gratifying, save for one unhappy circumstance. It was carried out in a manner too sweeping and sudden. It involved the displacement of the native population from the most fertile parts of the territory their ancestors had occupied for ages. They were cleared off wholesale; their townships were broken up; they were driven away to remote and barren nooks, were huddled together in miserable hamlets upon the sea-coast, were impelled to the lowlands and the great towns, or else were shipped off to foreign lands. It is not too much to say that, if the multitudinous, simultaneous, and systematic clearings which took place in the West Highlands, with no adequate provision—in some cases, with no provision at all—for the future of those dispossessed, had occurred in Ireland, they would have raised an unappeasable clamour and stimulated recourse on a large scale to “the wild justice of revenge.” In the Highlands they did evoke a bitter cry of grief, despair, and wrath; but they were borne with surprising meekness and patience, and no instance of murderous or even violent retaliation can be cited. The Highlands are exempt from the stain of agrarian outrage and bloodshed.

It must strike every attentive reader of the evidence adduced before the Commission that the situation and complaints of the Hebridean crofter are almost identical with those so often heard from the West Irish peasant. He has too little land, not enough to support a family. It is too highly rented, the rate being out of all proportion to what is paid by large farmers.

He is a tenant-at-will, liable to be turned adrift at any moment. He lives perpetually on the brink of famine, for when fishing and crops are both abundant, he is separated from it only by a slight remove, while the failure of either thrusts him into the abyss. The proprietors in many instances are absentees, and absenteeism tends to beget indifference as respects sufferings the extent and detail of which may be kept concealed. The analogy goes much farther. It affects not only the condition of the people, but their character and habits. With great capabilities, many serviceable qualities, many most admirable gifts, the home-staying Celt is indolent, apt to prefer the enjoyment of life to its amelioration, and to seek that enjoyment not in wrestling with adverse circumstance, but in surrender to a very dreary and unenviable dolce far niente. The Celt of the West Highlands is less turbulent than the Celt of West Ireland, but he is every whit as impracticable. Both can toil, venture, endure, save,—when they have a mind. But this is done by fits and starts, for a time and for a purpose; there is no love of work for the sake of work; the internal spring liberates itself by jerks and runs. Both cling with a fond tenacity, unsurpassed by any other people, to the place of their birth; they would rather starve and shiver on the insufficient strips of land by which they variegate the rugged slopes, whence the rain often washes away the best soil as soon as it is turned up, than face the hazards of the unknown; they cannot be uprooted, but there follows a plaintive moan, like that of the fabled mandrake. Yet both, in favouring circumstances, make splendid colonists, and in all our large towns both give examples of distinguished success. Perhaps the Scot has most of adaptability and ambition, for the Irish need to be rather sparsely intermixed with people of other races, so that they may take the tone of society, instead of giving it, their tendency being, wherever they congregate in any number, to form a little Ireland. Once transplanted, however, the Highlander is almost certain to make his way, whether singly or amid a crowd of his countrymen. The number who attain position and wealth in Scotland is certainly equal in proportion to that furnished by their Lowland neighbours. The experience of Glasgow amply illustrates these statements. That city has a very large Irish population; it has been estimated at one-fourth of the whole inhabitants. A lamentable fact is that this section contributes a full half of the pauperism which weighs upon the city. The Scoto-Celtic element is almost as strong as the Teutonic. The “Macs” are of themselves a formidable nation. They fill many pages of the Directory, and besides them there are scores of names as unmistakeably Gaelic as Ben Nevis or Ben MacDhui. Among their owners are many of the best, most intelligent, most prosperous, public-spirited, and benevolent men in the city. Ethnic amalgamation must have had some influence upon the development of the high qualities they exhibit; but there are instances of fresh immigrants keeping even pace with settlers of long descent, and it is an interesting problem why the inherent characteristics they display should not find scope and reward at home.

Is it over-sanguine to hope for the appearance of an industrious, self-reliant, thriving peasantry in the districts which have been the scene of the recent investigation? Well-informed and sober-minded people think not. Evidently, things cannot remain as they are. There exists a reaction against the large-farm system as an exclusive system. In those districts where it has been carried out with most thoroughness, it has been disastrously overdone. There are seasons when the flockmaster needs additional labour, and it cannot now be had. Moreover, the distress which has lately fallen upon the tillers of the soil has also lighted heavily upon sheep-breeders; and many excellent farms are tenantless,—the proprietors being, of course, tempted to turn them into deer forests, which continue to bring a fancy rental. Men of foresight, however, are sceptical as to the permanence of the taste for deer-stalking at such an enormous cost as it entails, and they dread, with reason, the imposition of a heavy tax upon a mode of pleasure-seeing which condemns a vast expanse of land to unproductiveness. The Duke of Sutherland, it is understood, means to reverse the policy pursued by his predecessors, to break up some of his colossal farms into moderately-sized holdings, at the same time to provide ample accommodation for a fair proportion of the peasant class, and so to restore that healthy equipoise which belongs to a graded and well-regulated society. His example is pretty sure to be followed, and where it is so in like circumstances, there will come, if not any large increase of population, yet a very sensible improvement in their comforts, their resources, their prospects, and the temper in which they face the battle of life. On the other side, it is undeniable that there are districts which, under the best conditions, would be over-peopled by the present population, which are so over-peopled under existing conditions that it is inevitable the inhabitants must be subjected to constant privations, whence there can be no escape unless their numbers are reduced. Ere the reforms contemplated by the Duke of Sutherland could be imitated in these regions, it is indispensable that a large emigration should take place, and it would be necessary afterwards that a subdivision of holdings and the growth afresh of a redundant population should be prohibited. Given these terms, along with that universal education which is now enforced, and there seems no reason why the Croft system should not be so amended as to be rendered workable, despite the poverty of the soil and the frequent wetness of the seasons. Then might one hope to see the depressed and care-worn look of the inhabitants replaced by something of the alert blitheness that springs from conscious independence; the dismal hovels that dot remote and barren hill-sides cleared away, along with the miserable kraals that form straggling lanes along the unpropitious and storm-beaten coast; the small, green patches of land, with their varied growths of oats and barley, potatoes and weeds, superseded by a more efficient style of husbandry; and a state of things which is a discredit to our country and a stain upon our civilisation wholly reformed.

LORDS PENZANCE AND COLERIDGE ON ECCLESIASTICAL JUDICATURE.

IF Lord Penzance had been particularly anxious to reconcile High Churchmen and Ritualists to legislation on the lines of the Report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, he could not have devised a more effectual method of achieving his purpose than that which he has adopted, presumably from an opposite motive. He has declined to put his name to the Report of the other Commissioners, and has published a separate Report of his own, in which he criticises and condemns the main features of the Report signed by all his colleagues. It is not altogether, though it is partly, his own fault that his career as an Ecclesiastical Judge has been a singularly unsuccessful one. The Act to which he owes his existence in that capacity was the offspring of an unreasoning panic, and came into the world with a tainted character. It was passed avowedly "to put down Ritualism,"—that is, not for the sake of doing justice, but in order to make justice subservient to prejudice and passion. This initial taint might have been somewhat neutralised, if the two Primates had appointed as the first Judge under the Public Worship Regulation Act a man who had some knowledge of ecclesiastical history and law, and some rudimentary acquaintance with theology. But the man selected, however estimable in other respects, was absolutely without any training or special qualification for his office. That was sufficiently unfortunate. But the two Primates showed their ignorance of human nature still further, by selecting from the category of unsuitable persons the one man whose judicial experience was certain to make his appointment most distasteful to the Clergy. The Divorce Act, whether justifiably or unjustifiably, has been particularly obnoxious to the Clergy. It was, therefore, a singular want of judgment on the part of the two Archbishops to nominate an ex-Judge of the Divorce Court as the regulator of the doctrine, ritual, and discipline of the Church of England. And the malign influence which tainted the birth of the Public Worship Regulation Act and presided over the selection of its first Judge has pursued Lord Penzance all through his career as Dean of the Arches. He refused to qualify for his office in the usual way, preferring to derive his authority as an Ecclesiastical Judge from an entirely secular source. Partly, therefore, from this ostentatious parade of Erastianism, and partly from causes beyond his control, Lord Penzance started as Dean of the Arches with a disputed title and a general want of confidence on the part of the large majority of Churchmen. The Act from which he drew his title was, moreover, so badly drawn, or he was so careless in administering it, that several of his earlier judgments were upset on appeal to the secular Courts. Irritated by these misadventures, he was so ill-advised as to sneer publicly at the Court of Queen's Bench for its ignorance of ecclesiastical law. Chief Justice Cockburn retaliated in an exceedingly caustic pamphlet, in which he made himself merry at Lord Penzance's claim to ecclesiastical erudition.

That Lord Penzance should, under these circumstances, stand out against the recommendations of his colleagues on the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, is very likely to make the Ritualists, and indeed Churchmen in general, more favourably disposed than they would otherwise have been to accept tribunals based on those recommendations. There will be an antecedent bias in favour of Courts to which Lord Penzance is opposed; nor will the reasons by which he supports his opposition diminish the prejudice to which any proposals coming from him will be exposed. Indeed, nothing proves more plainly his disqualification for the office of an ecclesiastical Judge than those reasons. After quoting various authorities, whom he strangely misunderstands, he says:—"I come, therefore, to the conclusion that there is no warrant to be found in the legal or Constitutional history of this country for the proposition that there have existed at any time since the Conquest, or indeed before it, Spiritual Courts deriving their original authority from the Church, independent of the Sovereign or the State; and that the authority for the existing Ecclesiastical Courts did, on the contrary, emanate directly from the Crown." The historical accuracy of this proposition is more than questionable. The true state of the case is put succinctly as follows, in the body of the Report from which Lord Penzance dissents:—"The origin and nature of the relations between the ecclesiastical and civil powers in the Christian Church had assumed a definite form before the Church of England was founded, and was a part of the common inheritance of Christian civilisation which was introduced at the conversion of the English. It is sufficient to note that in the historical growth of ecclesiastical judicature in national Churches three principles are involved:—(1), The existence of an ecclesiastical law anterior to the national law; (2), the acceptance by the nation of that law, so far as it is of general obligation, as the law of religion of the National Church; and (3), the annexation by the nation to the sentences of the law so accepted, under varying limitations, of the coercive power by which alone the sentences can be enforced upon the unwilling." Certainly, Lord Penzance must have an extraordinary confidence in himself, when he ventures to oppose his own crudely formed opinion to a statement which is not only obvious to every historical student, but which is, in this case, authenticated by authorities like Dr. Stubbs, Mr. Freeman, Lord Blackford, Sir Robert Phillimore, and Lord Coleridge, as well as by the standing counsel for the English Church Union and the Church Association. Lord Penzance's whole argumentation is vitiated by the fundamental fallacy that the Church is a mere department of Civil Government, like the Army or Navy. If we are to have our ecclesiastical judicature remodelled, we ought to face the facts fairly. And the fact is that the Church, historically considered, is a society claiming an origin apart from and independent of the civil power; with a code of doctrines, therefore, and with laws which are anterior to the laws of any civil government with which the Church, as locally distributed, chances to enter into relations. It carries its original charter with it into any compact which it may make with the civil power. But the Church has no coercive jurisdiction. It cannot enforce its own laws on its recalcitrant members. The consequence is that when the civil power consents to enforce the laws of the Church, it rightly claims to ascertain for itself that this enforcement does not violate any civil right. The right of the Churchman, as a citizen, is, for example, invaded, if the ecclesiastical tribunal has departed from its own recognised laws and procedure, and in such a case the civil power is justified in refusing to give force to the ecclesiastical sentence, and in sending the case back to the ecclesiastical authorities for reconsideration. But this does not prove that the Church has no original jurisdiction of her own, but derives it all from the State. Mr. Gladstone is sustained by the clearest Constitutional authority in asserting, in his masterly Essay on the Royal Supremacy, that the statute law of England "contains no trace of such a meaning as that the Crown either originally was the source and spring of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, or was to become such in virtue of the annexation to it of the powers of" the Reformation statutes. This view is amply borne out by the mass of evidence collected by the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission. There is, of course, a sense in which all jurisdiction flows from the Crown,—the sense, namely, in which it is explained in the grand preamble of the statute of 1532. There the body politic is described as consisting of two spheres, the "Spirituality and Temporality." "When any cause of the law divine happened to come in question, or of spiritual learning, then it was declared, interpreted, and showed by that part of the body politic called the Spirituality, now being usually called the English Church." The Sovereign's jurisdiction consists in seeing that justice is done in both the temporal and spiritual spheres, in accordance with their respective laws. The laws of the temporal body are derived from the Temporality. Those of the spiritual from the Spirituality. The essential difference between the two jurisdictions is marked on our Constitution in a number of ways. Thus the Sovereign summons and prorogues Parliament. The Primate summons and prorogues Convocation. The Crown gives "leave" to Convocation to "decree" canons. It gives "power" to Parliament to make laws. It "enacts" statutes; "ratifies" ecclesiastical canons. Civil statutes have no existence till they receive the Royal assent. Ecclesiastical canons do not owe their being, only their secular force, to the Crown.

These are rudimentary distinctions to the ecclesiastical lawyer. Lord Penzance's Report shows that his mind is in a state of baptismal innocence respecting them. Moreover, he argues as if the Parliament of to-day were identical with the Parliament of Norman and Tudor times. What can be more fallacious or more absurd than to apply to our circumstances the practices of a time when none but Churchmen could sit in Parliament, and when the numerical majority of what was then the more powerful of the two Houses of Parliament consisted of Bishops and Abbots?

But much as we differ from Lord Penzance in his arguments and statement of facts, we have no fault to find with him on grounds of good-feeling and taste. We regret to add that we cannot say as much of the inflammatory protest of Lord Coleridge against the veto which the large majority of the Commissioners propose to give the Bishops on the initiation of a suit. He thinks this veto "has been abused." He ought to have substantiated so grave an accusation. Does he refer to the veto of the Bishop of Oxford, in the case of Mr. Carter? If he does, he will find hardly any one, who is not a member of the Church Association, to agree with him. "The right, as now claimed," he says, "covers ritual excess, whereby, in spite and defiance of the law, a repugnant congregation may be compelled to assist at a ceremonial which they think symbolises an abject and mischievous superstition." This kind of Exeter-Hall claptrap, coming from the Chief Justice of England, is deplorable. If respect for ecclesiastical decisions is to be restored among the Clergy, a beginning ought surely to be made by an observance of judicial propriety. Suppose Lord Coleridge should be nominated one of the new Judges of the Final Court of Appeal, how can he expect a large section of the Clergy to have any confidence in him, after this outburst of partisanship? And the offence is all the more glaring if, as the ecclesiastical papers declare, Lord Coleridge is himself an habitual worshipper in a church where this "abject superstition" is practised. The deadliest enemies of law and order are eminent Judges who give substantial grounds for suspecting, however unjustly, that they aim more at popularity than at justice. Lord Coleridge does not specify any "repugnant congregation" which has been "compelled to assist at an abject and mischievous superstition" through the Episcopal veto, and we think that he ought not to have thrown out such an accusation against the Episcopal Bench without substantiating it. So far as we know, the Episcopal veto has never been used without the great body of rational public opinion behind it. And, as a rule, the Bishops are far too timid to act without clear evidence of hearty lay support.

THE POPE AND ITALY.

THE letter of the Pope to the three Cardinals who are specially concerned with the Vatican Library is interesting, not only for itself, but for the manner in which it has been received by the Italian Press. Not very long ago, such a document would have excited nothing but merriment. The notion of a Pope recommending the study of documents and appealing to history in justification of the part played by the Papacy in Europe, would have been treated simply as a better joke than common. That time seems already to have passed away. The attitude of Italian politicians towards the Pope has undergone a remarkable change. It no longer bespeaks either contempt or anger. The character and policy of Leo XIII. have had their natural influence on the Italian mind. It is seen that the Pope has a definite aim, and that he has pursued it with remarkable persistence, amidst very great discouragement. Pius IX. succeeded in making the Papacy equally hated by the Conservative and the Revolutionary forces in Europe. Neither of them knew where to have him. The Italian Liberal of the time before 1848 had merged in the Italian despot of the time that followed that year, but the Pope was never consistent, either as Liberal or as despot. He was ready to quarrel with established Governments, or to make terms with Revolutionary Governments, just as it suited his momentary purpose. No doubt, his object was always what he held to be the interests of Catholicism. But his reading of the interests of Catholicism summed them up in two things,—the maintenance of his temporal power, and the recognition of his spiritual infallibility. Whatever made or seemed to make for either of these ends, that was what the Pope fought for. He blessed the arms of Napoleon III., because he lent him the support of French bayonets; he would have welcomed a Socialist Republic, provided that it had accepted the Syllabus. Intensity and caprice were the two main characteristics of his mind, and they necessarily led politicians to exclude him from their arrangements. He might come in to them at any moment as a disturbing force, but, as the action of that force would always be beyond calculation, it might for practical purposes be left out of the account. With the election of a new Pope began a new era. Leo XIII. found himself in presence of two almost equally hostile influences. On the one side were the regular Governments of Europe; on the other, the democratic passions that are now diffused throughout the whole of the Continent. With the former, Pius IX. had been at war for years. Russia, Germany, France, Italy were one and all hostile, and if Spain and Austria were disposed to be neutral or friendly, neither their neutrality nor their friendship was of a kind that could be depended upon at a crisis. To the latter Pius IX. was equally obnoxious. He was regarded as at once a renegade and a persecutor. The temptation to which a less resolute man than Leo XIII. would have been exposed would have been to play one of these forces against the other. Alike in France and Germany, for example, the established Government was hostile to the Church; but in France, the established Government was a Republic holding its ground against a Monarchical propaganda, whereas in Germany the established Government was a Monarchy holding its ground against a Socialist propaganda. In both, therefore, the Pope's course seemed plain. In France, his friends were to a man fighting in the Monarchist ranks; consequently, it was his business to do all he could to injure the Republic. In Germany the Catholics formed a third party, equally removed from the Government and the Democratic Opposition; but the Government was for the moment the more active and the more formidable foe of the two; consequently, it was his business to use the weaker adversary, and the one which could only injure him in the future, against the stronger and more present adversary. This was not Leo XIII.'s reading of the political situation. He saw that if the Pope were to have any influence in Europe, he must have a policy that was not determined afresh at every moment by the moment's most obvious needs. He must throw his weight deliberately and permanently into one scale or the other. Possibly, a younger man might have hesitated into which scale he should throw it. There is more to be said in favour of an alliance between the Church and the Democracy than may at first be seen. But Leo XIII. is at heart Left-Centre. Pius IX. was of the same political persuasion as Lord Beaconsfield, a Democratic Tory; Leo XIII. is a sober Whig. The feature that most impressed him in the contemporary Democracy was its anarchical fury, its entire severance from all customary law, whether divine or human, its passionate glorification of an ideal evolved out of its own dreams. On the other hand, the Established Governments have a common Conservative character. In so far as they are Established, they wish to maintain those elementary ideas of order and security against which Communism and Nihilism wage continual war. They are the natural allies, therefore, of the Catholic Church, both because she, too, loves order and security, and because she has help to offer towards the attainment of these things which Established Governments cannot get from any other quarter. Order and security are not in themselves calculated—except, perhaps, at the fag-end of a great revolution—to evoke enthusiasm, and for this reason it very much concerns those whose business it is to preach them to associate them with religion. Leo XIII. was determined to make friends alike of Schismatic Russia, Protestant Germany, and Secularist France. He saw that they might all benefit by his friendship, because in their character of Established Governments they were all exposed to attacks which the Church could help them to resist. In all three countries, too, the Church had something to gain by an alliance with the powers that be. Whether she any longer desires political influence, or has come to see that political influence is no longer within her reach, does not much matter, since political influence is only to be obtained through the exercise of spiritual influence. Consequently, it is her spiritual influence that the Church seeks to extend and consolidate, and temporal Governments have many ways at their command of furthering or hindering her in the pursuit of this aim. If they are hostile, they can come between Bishops and their flocks, as in Prussia, or between the Church and the children whom she wishes to teach, as in France. Favour is no longer to be had from temporal Governments, but it is still in their power to give or deny the Church a fair field. From the moment of his accession, therefore, Leo XIII. had resolved not to be discouraged by the difficulty of the task he had set himself. He has been successful with Russia; he is seemingly on the eve of success with Germany; and it is only the weakness of the French Government that stands in the way of success in France. All three Governments recognise that the Church is a great Conservative force, and that they cannot quarrel with her without losing a valuable ally in the conflict with anarchy, in which all three must expect to bear a part by-and-by.

This steady conquest over foes who five years ago seemed so resolute and resentful, has not been without its effect on the statesmen of the Italian Monarchy. That monarchy is marked out by circumstances to be a member of the Conservative Coalition, because outside that combination it is threatened by external and internal dangers of the first order. Yet it alone is prevented from profiting by the Pope's assistance, because to it alone the Pope is a permanent antagonist. The force that, if it was friendly, could do more than anything to consolidate Italy, spends its strength in consolidating other Governments, and leaves Italy alone. It is only natural, therefore, that Italian politicians of the graver sort should be asking themselves whether there is no possibility of coming to an understanding with the Pope; and when the Pope himself invites historians to ransack the Vatican archives, in the conviction that the Papacy can only be the better for any light that may be thrown on its relations with Italy and the world, they naturally welcome the indication thus afforded of the Pope's readiness to substitute argument for assertion, and of his willingness to enter upon a discussion which, if it fails to upset the convictions entertained on either side, may at least suggest a modus vivendi between them.

THE WISH TO BELIEVE.

MR. WILFRID WARD, the author of the impressive paper in the Nineteenth Century of February, 1882, on "The Wish to Believe," in which he maintained that on matters of importance, where the reality of the belief is of the very essence of the wish, the hearty wish to believe, so far from making one credulous, is apt to make one incredulous of the desired evidence, continues, in the number of the Nineteenth Century which has just appeared, the further discussion of the same subject. The new paper is an important contribution towards the secret of sound judgment on great issues, Mr. Ward's chief contention being that personal indifference as to the result to be arrived at, such as is usually considered the best security for a juryman's office, though a good guarantee against those conspicuous and obvious perversions of judgment which would imperil the confidence of the public in the justice of our Courts, is by no manner of means the best security for either the highest impartiality or the highest keenness of insight. The essay is an admirable one, and full of strength and subtlety, but we think that it might have been somewhat improved, if Mr. Ward had kept quite distinct in his dialogue the influence exerted by a "wish to believe" on the impartiality of a man's judgment, and its influence on his materials for forming that judgment. There is one passage in which, as we understand it, he intimates his own opinion that you cannot properly separate the two,—that the effect of a strong previous bias of any kind in adding to the facts at your disposal on which the judgment depends, cannot legitimately be separated from the influence of the same bias in keeping your mind honest, or in exposing it to the danger of self-deception. That is the only point on which the present writer is inclined to disagree with Mr. Ward. We hold that the strong desire to establish a certain conclusion on the sole condition that that conclusion should be the true one, is, as Mr. Ward proved, in his previous essay, a very great security for impartiality of judgment,—that is, for a full and distinct appreciation of all that weighs against that conclusion, as well as of all that weighs for it. It renders the mind sensitive, and even delicately sensitive, to that which gravely threatens its hopes, as well as to that which tends to confirm them. But very much less than this, the sort of wish to believe which is not at bottom limited by the condition that the thing believed shall be true, but would be more or less gratified by merely making the belief appear true to a number of indifferent judges, would be quite enough to make the mind of the wisher extremely sensitive to all sorts of considerations favourable to his wish; only it would not make it specially sensitive to those considerations which were calculated to make against its wish, as the passionate desire to establish the absolute truth of a certain belief would do. Take, for example, the desire of a great Old-Bailey barrister, such as the late Mr. Trollope delineated in the character of Mr. Chaffanbrass, to establish,—to the satisfaction of a jury,—his client's innocence of a crime of which he was accused. Mr. Trollope gives us a glimpse of such a state of mind in the very amusing novel called "Phineas Redux,"—which we entirely differ, by the way, from that distinguished critic Mr. Henry James, in regarding as one written on Mr. Trollope's lower level. Mr. Chaffanbrass is defending Phineas Finn on a charge of murder,—of which he is quite innocent, though a considerable accumulation of circumstantial evidence is brought against him,—and Mr. Chaffanbrass has been most acute in noting and most powerful in expounding every trivial indication that appeared to show the weakness and inconsistency of the evidence against his client. He shows a lynx eye for every hint that favours his client's innocence, and a marvellous power of realising those hints, so as to make them vivid to the mind of the Judge and the jury. But when he retires to refresh himself in the middle of his address, this is what Mr. Trollope makes Mr. Chaffanbrass say to himself:—"He was telling himself how quick may be the resolves of the eager mind,—for he was convinced that the idea of attacking Mr. Bonteen had occurred to Phineas Finn after he had displayed the life-preserver at the Club door." In other words, the strong desire to make a particular conclusion plausible, will give a good deal of the same sensitiveness of vision for the evidence likely to convince other men of that conclusion, which the sincere desire to believe this conclusion if it be true, and not to believe it unless it is true, will give for the evidence which really convinces the man's own self, whether in the direction of his wishes or otherwise. It was clear that, in the fictitious case related by Trollope with all the imaginative detail supplied by that great realist's ample stores of experience, the wish of Mr. Chaffanbrass to prove his client innocent had made his mind sensitive to every point which would be likely to tell with the jury in favour of that client; but that having no special wish to believe him innocent himself, his mind had not been sensitive to those points in the evidence which told either in favour of, or against, Phineas Finn's real innocence. And this, though it is the invented incident of a pure fiction, seems to us a perfectly true reflection of human nature.

The way in which "a wish to believe" tells upon the actual belief seems to us, then, something of this sort. It makes the mind sensitive to all evidence,—just as some chemical preparations make a glass plate sensitive to light,—tending in the direction of that wish. If the wish be only a wish to establish a plausible case, but not to convince yourself of the real soundness of that case if it be sound, the mind will become sensitive to these plausibilities of evidence, and to nothing beyond. It will hardly even look for the grounds of true conviction. But if it be true personal conviction which is earnestly desired, then the mind will become sensitive to everything which either aids, or stands seriously in the way of, true conviction. If you want true conviction, the insurmountable obstacles (if they be insurmountable) in the way of that true conviction will be as vividly photographed upon the mind as the evidence for the conclusion you desire. A man who eagerly desired to think his son innocent, would be as utterly unable to attenuate the effect on his mind of what tended to convince him of his son's guilt, as he would to attenuate the effect of what tended to convince him of his son's innocence. The "wish to believe" renders the mind sensitive to evidence just so far as that wish goes,—to evidence likely to convince or puzzle others, if the wish only is to set up an effective case,—to all the evidence that comes within reach of your own inner judgment, if the wish is to obtain a genuine and assured belief of your own. What we suggest, then, is this,—that a wish either to make others believe, or to believe heartily oneself, affects the result by rendering the mind which entertains it specially sensitive to all evidence likely to sway the judgment whether of others or of yourself as to the character of that belief, but that it is not in the power of any mere anxiety to get up a plausible defence for one side of a case, to render the judgment sound and impartial. That can only be done by such a wish to believe, if the belief be true, as will impress the mind as much with all that tells against the belief, as it will with all that tells in its favour.

Some one, however, will certainly be found to ask Mr. Ward, 'Why do you insist on the wish to believe, if the belief be true, as the best guarantee of impartial investigation? Why do you not rather put it thus: that the wish should be to find the truth, whether the truth be in the direction of faith, or in the direction of scepticism? What would you think of a historical investigator who desired to make out a case, say, for Cromwell, if he honestly could, without ignoring any scrap of good evidence against Cromwell's character, instead of simply wishing earnestly to make out the truth, whether that truth branded Cromwell's character, or cleared it?' Mr. Ward has not yet come upon any discussion of this question, but we should be quite prepared to maintain that a wish to believe something that has kindled the imagination and stirred the heart—whether in relation to a human character or a divine faith—on condition that one can honestly and fully believe it without hiding from oneself the force of any of the evidence against it, is a far better guarantee for impartiality of judgment than what is commonly called an impartial desire to find out the truth, on whatever side the truth may lie. And we should justify our view of the matter thus. If you wish to believe in some vision which kindles the imagination and stirs the heart, on condition only that that belief is true, you start with a definite clue as well to all that tells in favour of that belief as to all that tells against it. If you start with a mere abstract resolution to find out the truth, on whatever side it may lie, you have no such clue; you have to balance one fact against another, to set off this evidence against that, without any sufficient motive-power to lead you straight to the critical points. It is perfectly true that if you start with a "wish to believe," and find out that your wish is idle, and that all the important evidence goes the other way, you start with a false clue, historically speaking. But a false clue historically speaking is often a true clue morally speaking, and leads you much sooner and more directly to the conviction that you did start with a false assumption, than a mere abstract desire to find the truth would do. To verify this, let us ask whether an honest wish to "disbelieve" will be as good a help to a just view, as is an honest wish to believe. Of course, a wish to disbelieve may often be a wish to believe in another shape, as a wish to disbelieve in Cromwell's hypocrisy would be a wish to believe in Cromwell's honesty of purpose. But we mean by a wish to believe, a wish to prove the truth of some vision which has kindled the imagination and stirred the heart; and by the wish to disbelieve, a wish to get rid of a vision which has awed the imagination and oppressed the heart. Well, so defined, we deny altogether that a wish to disbelieve is any help to true impartiality of judgment, as a wish to believe would be. A bad man, for instance, might wish to disbelieve in the purity and goodness of a friend's character which he might regard as a sort of reproach to himself. Such a wish to disbelieve, however sincere, would never render his mind highly sensitive to all the grounds which made his disbelief irrational, though the wish to believe honestly in the purity and truth of any character, would certainly render the mind sensitive to every consideration which was clearly unfavourable to the higher view of that character, as well as to those which favoured it. The wish to get rid of an upbraiding suggestion does not quicken the mind to anything that tells in favour of that upbraiding suggestion; the wish to justify a genuine feeling of reverence, does quicken the mind to the trace of anything which honestly tells against that reverence.

We come, then, to this conclusion,—that it is of the very essence of what we may call a generous desire, to make us face honestly all that runs counter to that desire; while it is of the very essence of an ungenerous desire to blind us to all that runs counter to that desire. The wish to believe, even if it leads to disbelief, leads to disbelief by an exalted path, which only ends in disbelief because the heart had fixed on some mistaken object of reverence, the reverence itself being all the while due, though due in some different quarter. The wish to disbelieve, on the contrary, leads direct to disbelief by a mean and ignoble path, which is even more likely to land one in a mistaken disbelief, than in a just disbelief. The guidance in the "wish to believe" in something noble, is even greater and more effectual than the guidance of the mere wish to find abstract truth; for the latter, being necessarily wholly undefined until the truth is found, sheds no ideal light on the path of search, while the wish to believe in something noble and above oneself, even if it turn out in the end a mistaken wish as regards its special object, certainly does. The ideal rays of a high aspiration render the mind sensitive to the true character of the search, even though the wish to believe should end sadly in disappointment.

LITERARY FORGERIES.

WE are not premature, we suppose, in concluding that Mr. Shapira's Recension of the Ten Commandments is of North-German rather than of Phœnician or Moabite origin. The ingenious persons who have deceived Mr. Shapira, and hoped to deceive Europe in general, counted too much upon the interest with which the discovery of a manuscript dating long before the Christian era would be received. Of course, there are many persons who would be so willing to believe in such a "find" that they would overlook difficulties and be content with insufficient evidence. But this is not the attitude of the learned. They are inclined to apply the proverb, "Too good to be true," and to suspect the genuineness of a discovery the more keenly in proportion to the magnitude of its claims. A forger who should add another to the number of unread and unreadable treatises of Epicurean philosophy which are among the curiosities of Herculaneum, would be more likely to escape detection, than if he submitted to the inspection of scholars one of the lost Decades of Livy. The experts in Oriental learning seem to have approached the examination of Mr. Shapira's manuscript in a spirit of incredulity, which has certainly been justified by the result.

It has been remarked in the course of the discussion that if the learning of the forgers had been equal to their ingenuity, the attempt might have been successful. Their learning was certainly at fault. The compiler of the text, according to Dr. Ginsburg, was not more than moderately well acquainted with Hebrew, and quite unversed in the Phœnician character. But the ingenuity of the forgers was not such as to escape detection. It will have been observed that the most cogent arguments against the genuine character of the codex were those which dealt with the material on which it was written. Dr. Ginsburg, in his official report to the Librarian of the British Museum, the French scholar who had anticipated some of his conclusions, and the board of Berlin savans, who seem to have rejected the manuscript before it was brought over to this country, agree in insisting on the comparative modernness of the material on which it is written. In other respects the external evidence of authenticity broke down, as indeed in such cases it is pretty certain to do. There are scholars in Europe who could reproduce some of the lost fragments of Classical antiquity with a skill which would make detection, to say the least of it, very difficult. Professor Jebb, whom we name honoris causa, could doubtless, if he were so minded, produce an admirable imitation of one of the Dirges of Pindar, and fragments which should satisfy the sharpest inspection of criticism, of the lost plays of the Promethean Trilogy. Happily, the very best men, to whom alone such imitations would be possible, never are so minded; and the degraded scholar who is willing to impose upon the world has lost, if he ever had, the power of successfully deceiving. In any case, it may be doubted whether the mechanical necessities of such an imposture could ever be satisfied. The actual document on which the recovered fragment was found would have to be produced, and it may be doubted whether any ingenuity could produce out of new materials a manuscript of seeming antiquity which would defy the united scrutiny of the learned and the scientific. The late M. Simonides had probably developed, by practice, this ingenuity to its largest possibilities, and he had not such success as would encourage followers of the art. It will be remembered how a document elaborated with all his skill and artfully placed among a number of genuine manuscripts was almost instantaneously detected by the late Librarian of the Bodleian. And it is probable that the science of detection has gained ground, and will gain ground hereafter, more rapidly than the science of imitation. Generally, it may be affirmed that the day of such frauds has passed. In the early days of literature, these were as common as they were successful. Then, indeed, they could hardly be called frauds. A Hebrew who attributed his ethical or prudential maxims to Solomon, or a Greek who put the name of Homer at the head of a hymn to Apollo, had no thought but of doing honour to the master whose title he assumed, and his work was accepted in the same good-faith with which it was done. The more deliberate attempt to deceive, which is to be seen in such frauds as the so-called "Sibylline Oracles," was, happily, followed by a spirit of critical inquiry; and such impostures have never had more than a temporary success. Of course, it is possible that we may be accepting as genuine productions of antiquity, secular or sacred, some ingenious pretences. Scholars, for instance, doubt the genuineness of some of the "Heroides" of Ovid; and a writer, who might have made more impression upon the learned if he had been in any sense a scholar, tried lately to make us believe that the "Annals" of Tacitus were the work of Bracciolini, commonly called "Poggio." The Scholars of the Revival of Letters had, indeed, a grand opportunity of fraud, and if they had not been so busy in discovering what was genuine—what a list is that of Poggio's "finds," Quintilian, four or five orations of Cicero, Lucretius, twelve comedies of Plautus, &c. !—might have invented a good deal. In these days, invention is impossible, as discovery seems to be hopeless.

Nor is it easy to say where the ingenuity of the artists in literary deception, of whom there seems to be always a supply, is to find a field. We look back with wonder at the success with which George Psalmanazar, not more than a hundred and fifty years ago, imposed upon many of his contemporaries. At the age of sixteen, he conceived the idea of passing himself off as a native of Formosa; and to support this character, he invented a language, with a grammar and a vocabulary, a new division of the year (the people of Formosa had twenty months, it seemed), and a new religion. The men of science, it is true, looked somewhat coldly and incredulously upon him, but the clergy received him with open arms. He was employed to translate the Church Catechism into Formosan, and his version was pronounced by the learned to be grammatically correct. "A History of Formosa" followed; but Psalmanazar's head seemed to have been turned by success, and the extravagancies of his history dealt a great blow to his credit. Still, it was years before the imposture was finally exposed. It may be safely affirmed that now-a-days it would not last as many days. A dozen persons, at least, would instantly be found who were acquainted with the dialect of Formosa, or any other island which the impostor might select; and the grammar and dictionary of the imaginary tongue would certainly not stand any longer the scrutiny of experts in language.

The fact is that in these matters the conditions to be satisfied are too numerous and too difficult to admit of success. The arts, it is well known, present a more promising field for deception. A collector of pictures who left his gallery a few years ago to the nation, was found to have continued for years to purchase, at high prices, spurious examples of the Old Masters. It is probable that not a few copies occupy places of honour in great collections. The authenticity of many so-called masterpieces is fiercely disputed, and though it would be difficult in any one case to estimate the value of the opposing arguments, it is certain that in some cases out of the whole number the truth is on the side of those who impugn. With regard to the works of modern painters, the facility of fraud and the difficulty of detection must be greatly increased. If the artist be still living, he can, indeed, be called in to decide on the genuineness of the attributed work. This test, we understand, is not invariably conclusive, the painter not being always able to speak with certainty. There are evidently large opportunities of forging the works of artists recently deceased. In such things, too, as the wares of China and Japan, there must, one would think, be no small opportunities of fraud. Experts, indeed, profess to know the genuine from the false, and doubtless the faculties of sight and touch can be trained to reach a very subtle power of criticism. But there must be some uncertainty about tests, the operation of which those who exercise them would be scarcely able to describe. And here, too, it is the Oriental workman, a wonderfully skilful master in the art of imitation, who is pitted against Western acuteness. It is the modern Chinese or Japanese copies of the ancient ware of those countries, against which the connoisseur has to be on his guard.

MADAME MOHL.

IN the very lively reminiscences of Madame Mohl which Mrs. Simpson contributes to the September number of Macmillan's Magazine, a great many of Madame Mohl's old friends will renew some of the most vivid of their impressions of the raciest social intercourse they ever had. Madame Mohl, as Mrs. Simpson reminds us, was a spirited girl of Scotch descent, steeped in French society, who united much of the acuteness, simplicity, and homeliness of a Scotch girl with that happy and impromptu artifice of thought and language which Paris alone appears to cultivate in perfection. She used often to speak of her English as "kitchen English," but the phrase itself showed her French breeding, for she only meant by "kitchen English" to accent and skilfully exaggerate the homeliness of phrase which was the greatest attraction of her vivid style. It was the contrast between the real art,—the happy self-consciousness,—of her French training, and the homely vividness of her Scotch feeling, that gave to Madame Mohl's conversation its wonderful humour of effect. She had at once a great naturalness and a great power of framing that naturalness in a studied though simple frame, which set it off to the highest effect. When compelled to sit by girls whom she thought would have better liked masculine attentions, Mrs. Simpson tells us that she would say, "My dear, I felt so ashamed of not being a young man,"—a bit of satire which it would have been hard to present with more effect, for it owes as much to its simple English phraseology as to its artless French art. Or take almost her last saying, when she was dying, at an age considerably over ninety, when her favourite Persian cat,—matched with a wife of less distinction,—came to sit by her on her bed,—"Il est si distingué !—sa femme ne l'est pas du tout, mais il se n'aperçoit pas; il est comme beaucoup d'hommes, en cela." Madame Mohl's evident grievance that the men for whom she had felt herself a fitting intellectual companion, had appeared to be quite ignorant that their own wives were hardly as distinguished as themselves, could not have been brought out with more humour, though very likely she knew in her heart of hearts that not only the friends whose apparent unconsciousness fidgeted her, but the Persian cat himself, was perfectly aware of the inferior distinction of the wife, but rather liked the permanent proximity of a less distinguished companion while they skilfully ignored all consciousness of their own superior merit. You see the same curious combination of English shyness and simplicity with French tact and ingenuity in that very funny account of Madame Mohl's precautions for hiding her marriage from her own household with which she used to amuse Mrs. Simpson, and again in the pithy abruptness with which she broke her marriage to her married sister, which she did by the message that, "As an aunt was like a fifth wheel to a coach, she had been married that morning to M. Mohl." Her favourite books she called "nourishing," meaning much more than that they interested her,—that they brought grist to her mill; and during the time of the siege of Paris, when she was thrown on her English friends' hospitality, she always spoke of herself as "on the parish." She generally found some vivid metaphor for her experience; usually one that suggested at the same time strong, homely feeling, and keen French perception of the way in which that homely feeling would appear to others. One is not surprised to hear that she longed to be an actress, and that her friends thought that, with her vivid natural gestures and her keen knowledge of the impression which she made on others, she would have made a remarkable actress. It is precisely the combination of strong natural feelings with a quick sense of effect and art, that makes the good actress. Madame Mohl prized and hugged to the last the warmth of naturalism that was in her, but she knew exactly, as only Frenchwomen of genius know, what effect it would have on others, and how to give it the best effect.

The liveliness of her feelings had always the French sanguineness about it, as of feelings too imperious to be disappointed, a sanguineness which is too often eventually succeeded by the French paroxysm of despair. One can see her, as Mrs. Simpson describes her, when first she found her husband's health failing, "her grief mingled with astonishment and indignation" that the doctors could do nothing for him. But her description, written a year after his death, of the last scene is wholly pathetic, without a touch of art about it. "He had been struggling for breath," she wrote, "for four or five hours, worse and worse; he stroked my face all the time, but could not speak; that stroking has been an ineffable comfort to me; it was an endearment when he could not speak, the only sign he could give me of his affection, and that he knew it was I that was with him." This was not written till the anniversary of M. Mohl's death. "At the time," says Mrs. Simpson, "she almost went out of her mind."

Madame Mohl knew the value of caprice, at least of the caprices of such a mind as hers; for what with her strong natural feelings, and her keen French tact and training, her caprices were worth much more than other persons' habits. She loved to embroil herself with her friends in order to have the pleasure of getting out of the difficulty, which she always knew how to do with a sort of humorous frankness that made the embroilment into a new tie. Her vivacity had genuine feeling at the bottom of it. This was what really made her company so attractive. The present writer remembers asking an experienced waiter who had known many of the principal hotels in a great number of different countries, from England to Italy, where the food was really best. "Oh!" he said, "in London; there the stuff is so good that but a little art will make the dishes works of art of a very high order." That is what one would say of the humour and wit of Madame Mohl. The stuff was so good, that it needed only the innate tact and sparkle of her French vivacity to make the whole effect even brilliant. In France, you often get a higher art, but seldom a higher art exerted on such first-rate material.

THE CLOSING OF THE HIGHLANDS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You talk, in your article of August 25th on "The Closing of the Scottish Highlands," about the ordinary tourist being obliged to keep himself to the roads in the moor country, lest he should be caught by some gamekeeper disturbing the grouse. Is it not a fact that in Scotland there is no specific law against trespass, and no penalty can be imposed on you, unless you actually poach the game or damage the property? Of course, that is not much of an argument with a gamekeeper who has a gun in his hand and a savage dog on either side; but still, if it is really the case, tourists might insist on their rights till gamekeepers would be obliged to recognise them, after a few victims had sacrificed themselves by submitting to a summons.—I am, Sir, &c.,

J. L. P.

[That is the true remedy, and the remedy actually adopted by five tourists on Ben Alder. Strong parties of tourists should be made up for this very purpose.—Ed. Spectator.]

MR. FOOTE AND THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Considerable attention has been drawn to the present operation of the Blasphemy Laws by the Press, in connection with the case "The Queen v. Foote, Ramsay, &c.," and by public meetings held for the purpose of invoking the prerogative of the Crown in their favour. I cannot but think that the arguments employed have been founded on a total misapprehension of the facts. Will you, therefore, allow me to place the true state of the case before your readers? Before doing so, however, let me observe that it is not my wish to defend the Blasphemy Laws in their present form. They unquestionably require modification, to be adapted to our present social requirements; yet I maintain that the principle involved in them is sound. I am one of the last to wish to maintain the belief either in Christianity or Theism by the aid of the civil power. In dealing with such questions, appeals to reason and the moral sense are the only legitimate weapons. If Christianity cannot vindicate its own claims to stand without the aid of civil penalties, then "it is a work of man, and will come to naught." Let us have the utmost freedom of discussion. But this is a very different thing from allowing the Author of Christianity, to whom the most eminent unbelievers have assigned the highest place in their Pantheon of great men, to be made the subject of a most indecent and utterly misleading caricature, which is publicly exhibited in shop windows, and that, too, in one of the chief thoroughfares in London. I doubt whether one in a thousand of those who are endeavouring to invoke the prerogative of the Crown in favour of Messrs. Foote and Ramsay have ever seen the caricature in question, or even have the smallest idea of its real nature. It appeared in the Christmas number of the Freethinker, and is called "A New Life of Christ." It contains neither reasoning nor argument, but is neither more nor less than an indecent parody of our blessed Lord, not in words only, but aided by illustrations. So great was its indecency, that the Court very properly took measures to prevent its publication in the newspapers. This, however, has afforded the opportunity for an immense amount of misrepresentation, as though it were a violation of the liberty of the Press, instead of an attempt to suppress a public nuisance. I submit that caricatures of the vilest kind are neither reasoning nor argument, but an appeal to the basest passions of mankind. Yet in January last, on passing through Fleet Street, I saw this very publication stuck up in a shop window, with so large a number of people, chiefly young people, gazing at it, that I could not get near enough distinctly to read the printed matter. Minor Canon Shuttleworth says, and says truly, "Christians will never exorcise the spirit of atheism and blasphemy by appealing to the demons of intolerance and injustice." With this statement I cordially agree; but when he applies this great truth to the Foote case, I am forced to conclude that he has never seen the parody in question. The object of the prosecution was not "to exorcise the spirit of atheism and blasphemy," but to prevent a wanton insult from being offered to the great mass of the people of this country. I submit that this is no attempt to uphold Christianity by the aid of the civil power; but to prevent an outrage which, if it had been allowed to continue, would have endangered a breach of the peace. The adherents of the various religions in India, bad as most of them are, are justly protected by law from outrages of this description. Are Christians in England alone to be exposed to them, and are such caricatures to be exhibited in our streets to crowds of young people? I feel sure that if the case were submitted to a jury of eminent unbelievers, and the Christmas number of the Freethinker were put into their hands, that their verdict would have pronounced it a public nuisance. I am not acquainted with the writings of any unbeliever which have given me as much pain in reading them as those of the late Professor Clifford (I am alluding to educated unbelievers), so strong were his denunciations of Christianity. But these differ toto caelo from the parody of the Freethinker, which I think that even he would have pronounced indecent. I am aware that it has been urged in Mr. Foote's favour that it is a question between good and bad-taste; that no certain line of demarcation can be laid down between the one and the other, and that it is taken for granted that Mr. Foote is a man of bad-taste. All these positions I dispute; but with respect to the latter, I am confident that Mr. Foote is not a man who is ignorant of the distinction between good and bad-taste. Many years ago—eight, at the least—I was in the habit of meeting Mr. Foote in the Hall of Science, and hearing him discuss religious questions. He was then a young man, in whom I felt a deep interest. I considered him the clearest and calmest reasoner in that hall; and I must do him the justice to say that his mode of discussing the questions at issue was uniformly in good-taste, free from anything offensive, in which he stood in striking contrast to Mr. Bradlaugh. But between the Mr. Foote of 1874 and the Mr. Foote of the Freethinker, the fall is incredibly great. These facts dispose of the question that his offence is a venial one, owing to want of taste. I can only attribute the authorship of the parody in question to a deliberate purpose to insult, grieve, and appeal not to reason, but to obloquy, abuse, and the lowest passions.

Let me now definitely state my position. I do not contend that Christianity should be protected by the civil power, but I urge that it is unendurable that its numerous professors in this country should be insulted by parodies of him whom they consider to be the Holy One of God, the subject of their highest love, reverence, and regard, being publicly exhibited in the streets; and that the civil power is bound to prevent it, in its capacity of conservator of the peace. I make this last observation, because I feel assured that if such exhibitions are allowed, zealous Christians, with more zeal, perhaps, than discretion, would be tempted to violate the peace, by entering the shops where they are exhibited, and demolishing them. Let me further add that the case of the Freethinker wholly differs from that of the controversy between Mr. Bradlaugh and the House of Commons. When Mr. Bradlaugh commits a similar outrage to that perpetrated in the Freethinker, by all means let the civil power interfere. But in my own opinion, nothing has been more unadvised in the interest of Christianity than manufacturing Mr. Bradlaugh into a political martyr. It has trebled his influence among working-men as an opponent alike of Theism and Christianity, and greatly increased the sale of his pernicious publications. The admission of ten Bradlaughs into the House of Commons would not have done an equal amount of mischief. Would that those who oppose Mr. Bradlaugh's admission on conscientious grounds would think the matter over, and retrace their steps. I say this without political bias, simply in the interests of that Christianity to the defence of which I have devoted the best days of my life; and in the interest of that Christianity let this controversy be speedily made to cease.—I am, Sir, &c., C. A. Row, Prebendary of St. Paul's.

[We agree with Canon Row's main position, but we are persuaded that the sentence inflicted on Mr. Foote and his associates was, in the interest of public decency itself, excessively harsh, and that it has therefore had some of the bad effects of making a martyr of a very vulgar and unscrupulous assailant of religion.—ED. Spectator.]

IRISH HATRED OF ENGLAND.

SIR,—Will you allow me to state some grounds for believing that the Irish hatred of England, which you lament in your last number, is more restricted to particular classes, and more likely to yield to causes already in operation, but which have not yet had time to produce their natural effects, than might at first sight be supposed?

During the troubled years that followed the Irish famine and the death of O'Connell, hatred and defiance of England were quite as much as now the staple of all popular oratory and of all writers in newspapers on the popular side in Ireland. The Orange or Conservative papers, on their part, habitually exaggerated the extent of this feeling, as enabling them to claim a monopoly of loyalty, and to throw blame on Lord John Russell's Government for not adopting severe enough measures of repression, just as they have thrown blame on Mr. Gladstone's Government for the same thing. So far, then, as the state of feeling in Ireland could be learnt from the Press on either side, Irish hatred of England appeared both wide-spread and intense. Yet I can testify, as the result of frequent visits during this period, both to Dublin and several country districts in Ireland, and a fair amount of intercourse with middle-class Irishmen, commercial, agricultural, and professional (mostly, I may add, Catholics in religion, and professing to be more or less on the popular side in politics), that it was only occasionally that any earnest hatred of England was to be met with amongst the middle-classes. Indifference to all political controversy was much more common. I was much struck likewise with the mistrust almost universally expressed of the Irish popular Members and platform orators of the day. It seemed to be assumed, as a matter of course, that they were all (excepting, perhaps, Smith O'Brien) place-hunters or self-seekers of some sort. The subsequent careers of these men proved, indeed, that they were judged with even less than justice; for while some of them did, in fact, turn out to have had for their goal all along well-paid office, home or colonial, under the Government which they would have any day denounced as capable of spitting Irish babies upon Saxon bayonets, there were others who remained consistent and disinterested to the end.

Even in Leinster, Connaught, and Munster, it was necessary at that time, and many things combine to prove that it is no less necessary now, to go below the fairly educated middle-class, to find much genuine hatred of England, or much appreciation of the men who labour to aggravate that unhappy feeling. It is, in truth, amongst the tenant-farmers and cottiers, and the classes closely connected with them, that this hatred has become really and deeply rooted. However much we may lament this feeling, it is difficult for any one who will study the history of this class for many generations past to wonder at it. Notwithstanding all that has been said and written, I believe the English public has even now but little idea of the hopeless lot of a very large proportion of Irish tenants under the system superseded by the Land Act. In bad seasons, there were semi-starvation, arrears of rent accumulating, evictions, and the indescribable miseries of crowds of men, women, and children turned out, often in winter, absolutely destitute, upon the roadside. In good seasons every appearance of comfort, everything that might raise a suspicion that a tenant was thriving or putting by money, had to be at any sacrifice avoided, lest it should be inferred that he could afford to pay a better rent. Good landlords, indeed, there were, but what could that avail the tenants of bad landlords? Moreover, however good the landlord, he often had debts, and mortgagees must have their interest, be the landlord's wishes or the tenant's sufferings what they may. And there was not a tenant in Ireland who did not identify this cruel system of land-tenure with English rule, or who believed it could last a day, if English rule were put an end to.

The Land Act, it is true, has now overthrown this system. As explained by Mr. Forster, in an instructive speech at Devonport, not even the very substantial reductions in present rents are more valuable than the absolute security against inequitable increases of rent in the future which the Act confers. Tenants may henceforward fearlessly bring forth their savings (stealthily hidden away, unproductive hitherto), and may expend them in whatever improvements, or stock, or implements they think will yield them the best return. Mr. Forster indeed states that many tenants are already beginning to do this.

The passing of the Land Act was an act of justice, but it was also something more. It was the first, as well as, with such a Legislature as ours, the most difficult step in a policy which makes the reconciliation of England and Ireland for the first time possible. As long as the old system of land-tenure endured in Ireland, no subsidence of Irish hatred of England could be for a moment hoped for. But even the passing of the Land Act could do no more than make reconciliation possible. The Act is coming into operation slowly, and the unhappy circumstance that the Commissioners' decisions take effect from the time they are pronounced, and not from the institution of proceedings, is seriously retarding its progress. Even where the Act is in operation, it will be much if five or ten years suffice to develop the prosperity which must undoubtedly result from it. But as comfort diffuses itself amongst the masses who cultivate the soil, and the memory of the old system of land-tenure dies away, the removal of other causes of national estrangement will become a task which even ordinary statesmen may well prove equal to.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"THE SUCCESS AND FAILURE IN IRELAND."

SIR,—In your suggestive article of last Saturday, "The Success and Failure in Ireland," you state that "A great many of them [holdings] are held by tenants who are quite satisfied at present, and do not wish their rent revised by a Court of any kind." A recent visit to Ireland, where I have mixed with all sorts and conditions of men, fully verifies this statement. Just now I have corroboration of it within my personal cognisance.

A hard-working Irishman living in the county of Sligo comes to work for me annually during the summer months. He has a farm of several acres, for which and his dwelling he pays £4 per annum. He expresses himself perfectly satisfied with his landlord and the rent. Now, this man has a wife and eight children, and to eke out a bare subsistence he pays an annual visit to England, where he works hard and saves his wages to take back with him to Ireland; his English earnings making all the difference to him during the coming winter, between what he considers comfort and absolute privation, if not starvation. Yet if this man lived on his farm rent free, he would be only £4 per annum better. He formerly kept a couple of cows and two or three pigs. Owing to the recent unfavourable seasons, they have gradually disappeared, and he sold his remaining cow last March to keep his family from starvation. He has now no stock, and sees no chance of getting any. But for the money he earns in England in the summer and takes home, his children, to use his own expressive phrase, would "clam" (die of hunger). This man is the type of thousands.

I travelled this summer with an intelligent Catholic priest through the mountainous regions of Kerry and the Glengarriff district. Pointing to the wretched hovels on the hill-sides and the valleys, attached to small patches of land won from the bog or rocky ground, he said the tenants (and they formed part of his flock) had no reason to complain on the score of rent, if they paid anything at all; but that if they lived rent free, the patches of ground would only raise them one slight remove higher above the depths of their present hopeless poverty and beggary. In such districts, there was no remedy but emigration. Migration would only reduce the symptoms in one quarter to aggravate them in another. Confidence, capital, and energy were required to develop the resources and manufactures of Ireland. The priest eulogised Gladstone as a statesman who wished well to Ireland, and who would do more for the country, if he were not thwarted by the landlord interest. He believed vast beneficial results would arise in many districts from the passing of the Land Law, but it would require time and patience for its operation and full fruition.

From personal observation, I can verify your statement to its full extent, that "Ireland is now a quieter and more peaceable country than any other part of the United Kingdom." Visitors from England are received with open arms, and treated with extreme kindness and courtesy. Danger is a myth.

The recent outrages have had a disastrous effect upon the prosperity of those portions of Ireland through which I passed. Notwithstanding the perfect safety with which Ireland can be traversed, Englishmen, reading the reports of the cruel agrarian outrages and murders, shun Ireland as a plague-spot. Whether at Bray, Ovoca, Killarney, Glengarriff, or the glorious district around Bantry and Cork, there is one unvarying record, that the comparatively total absence of English visitors to these places during the last three years, has for thousands who minister to their needs destroyed their previous margin between material well-being and present distress and ruin. I leave Irishmen and friends of Ireland to draw the inference.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE PARLIAMENTARY SPORT OF THE IRISH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Some years ago, a clever cartoon depicted an Irish woman holding her husband back from a faction-fight, raging in the distance, while he exclaims, "Don't hold me, Biddy sure, it's meat and drink to me!" Faction-fights, though they were so dear to the Irish heart, have been almost wholly put down in Ireland, but some of the late encounters in the House look very much like a survival of the dear, old, Irish sport. However disgusting and inconvenient such sport may be, when brought into the serious work of legislation, the mere lingering of the ancient propensity is surely not of any very deep significance. But as it affords metaphorical meat and drink to the many in Ireland, and very material meat and drink to the "boys" in the House, it will doubtless be kept up till the nuisance is repressed as effectually as the authorities in Ireland have repressed all faction-fighting at fairs.—I am, Sir, &c.,

NATURAL LAW IN THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.

SIR,—The letter of Mr. Woods Smyth will seem to very many of your readers a much-needed and valuable contribution to the interesting discussion evoked by Mr. Drummond's book. It is, indeed, fatal to the argument against which it is directed, and Mr. Smyth, in his contention that regeneration is not an alteration of our real nature, not a substantive, but a moral change, may, if he wants further authority than Scripture, reason, and conscience, appeal to the great name of Bishop Butler.

The statement of Mr. Drummond that "the change of state (in regeneration) is not, as in physics, a mere change of direction, the affections directed to a new object, but is a change of nature, a passing from death unto life," &c., is most emphatically controverted in the following striking passage from Butler's first sermon on the love of God:—

"As we cannot remove from the earth or change our general business in it, so neither can we alter our real nature. Therefore, no exercise of the mind can be recommended, but only the exercise of those faculties you are conscious of. Religion does not demand new affections, but only claims the direction of those you already have, those affections you daily feel, though unhappily confined to objects not altogether unsuitable, but altogether inadequate to them. . . . It is the same with the love of God in the strictest and most confined sense. We only offer and represent the highest object of an affection, supposed already in your mind. Some degree of goodness must previously be supposed; this always implies the love of itself, an affection for goodness; the highest, the adequate object of this affection is perfect goodness, which, therefore, we are to love with all our heart, &c."

It is difficult to frame a more perfect instance of the logical contradictory, not merely of the substance, but of the very words of the theory which Mr. Woods Smyth so strongly and satisfactorily impugns.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Lee, Kent.

J. C. GILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent who signs himself "C. C. M." says, in speaking of man, that "his humanity is a deeper fact than his individuality." But how can they be viewed apart, in the light of Christian teaching? The merging of individuality in humanity is the goal of aspiration in Eastern religious systems,—a goal most attractive to some minds, imbued with a sense of the unity that underlies the universe. But if there is any one note of Christian teaching that should be emphasized and never lost sight of, it is the note of individuality. On it hangs the true realisation of the personality of God, and through it we pass from abstract ideas to the reconciliation of the objective and subjective sides of religion. It is as individuals that we possess free-will. It is as individuals we use that free-will to choose good and reject evil. The conception of "C. C. M." that "death to self" will make all "distinctive individuality become henceforward merely functional in the universal organism," is one that makes the Incarnation a mere phase in the history of humanity, instead of being an everlasting fact, that seals man's individuality for ever.—I am, Sir, &c.,

B. P. L.

SIR,—Will you permit me to call attention once more to Mr. Drummond's interesting book on "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," and particularly to a part of his argument which seems to me to be invalid? I confine myself to his paper on Biogenesis. Mr. Drummond holds that the difference between the natural and the spiritual world—and consequently, between the natural and the spiritual man—is as the difference between the inorganic and the organic world,—that is, between not-life and life. At page 71, he says:—"The passage from the natural world to the spiritual world is hermetically sealed on the natural side. The door from the inorganic to the organic is shut, no mineral can open it; so the door from the natural to the spiritual is shut, and no man can open it." A "bridgeless gulf," he says, separates the natural and the spiritual like that which separates between not-life and life. The meaning of this is that the difference between spiritual life and the natural life of man, is as great as that between a stone and a living plant; nay, says Mr. Drummond, it is greater. "He who lives [see page 82] the spiritual life has a distinct kind of life added to all the other phases of life which he manifests,—a kind of life infinitely more distinct than the active life of a plant from the inertia of a stone. The spiritual man is more distinct in point of fact than is the plant from the stone. . . . Compared with the difference between the natural and the spiritual, the gulf which divides the organic from the inorganic is a hair's-breadth." Now, I want to know if it is strictly accurate to speak of different kinds of life? There are different modes and degrees of life, as we all see plainly enough. There is vegetable and animal life, and there are lower and higher forms of life; but do these varieties of mode and form and development warrant us in speaking of different kinds of life? Have we any right to say that vegetable life is a different kind of life from animal life, or that the life that animates a man's body is different in kind from that which animates his mind, or that this last, again, is different in kind from that which animates the highest part of him,—his spiritual nature? Do we know enough of what life is, to entitle us to speak so confidently of different kinds of life? Should we not be nearer the truth were we to say that all life is essentially one, that the mysterious principle that animates the green blade of grass and that which animates the highest part of man's nature is one and the same? The modes of expression are widely different; but is not the life one, and does it not come in each case from the same divine source? Here, then, is where, as it seems to me, the argument of Mr. Drummond quite breaks down. His argument is, that life is originated only by life, that there is no such thing as spontaneous generation, and that as this is true in the natural world, it is no less true in the spiritual. The argument may be stated more broadly thus:—As it is a scientific impossibility that a stone should develop into a living plant, it is no less a scientific impossibility that a "natural" man should develop into a spiritual man. Is this a sound argument? The gulf which separates the stone from the living plant is, as all admit, a "bridgeless gulf,"—it is the impassable gulf which separates not-life from life. But the "natural" man is in some sense a living man, and no such gulf lies between life and life as that which lies between not-life and life; therefore, no such gulf separates the natural man from the life of the spiritual world. The account which Mr. Drummond gives of the "natural" man cannot, I think, be accepted as correct. At p. 82 he says:—"The natural man belongs essentially to this present order of things. He is endowed simply with a high quality of the natural animal life, but it is life of so poor a quality that it is not life at all." Yet surely, however poor the quality of the life may be, life is still life. But St. Paul, who first originated the expression, gives a higher view of the natural man than Mr. Drummond does. In the second chapter of Romans, the Apostle speaks of natural men as not only capable, but as actually doing by nature the things contained in the law, and says that they thus show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, &c. Surely this moral nature of the natural man, this natural sense of justice, truth, and duty, is a link which somehow unites the natural man to the spiritual world, and makes him akin to it, and shows that no such gulf lies between him and it as lies between the inorganic and the organic. Mr. Drummond calls the "natural" man "inorganic," in relation to the spiritual world, which he calls "organic." Why?

Further, what Mr. Drummond says about the need of a revelation to remove the barrier between the natural man and the spiritual world seems to make a further inroad on his own argument. The very fact of that revelation, and above all the very nature and mode of its appeal to men are sufficient to show that no such gulf exists between the natural man and the spiritual world as lies between the inorganic and the organic. For in that revelation God speaks to men as having some kind of life that made it possible for them to believe and receive his message. He speaks to all men as in some sense his children, his own living offspring, who should know better than to serve any other God but himself. This revelation comes to men as "living bread," that is, as something which is the appropriate food for all men, as men. If the "natural" man were what Mr. Drummond describes him to be, were he "dead" in the same sense in which a stone is dead, were there no capacity in him (as there is none in a stone) of being resuscitated, awakened, raised up again, would any revelation from God be possible for him?

Along with Mr. Drummond, I believe in the necessity of the work of the Spirit, in the need of a new birth, and that Jesus is our life; but Mr. Drummond's attempt to justify an extreme and, I think, antiquated way of stating the doctrine of human inability by scientific argument, seems to me to be a failure. The argument is without force, because it assumes the existence of distinctions which no man has any warrant to believe in, and makes use of the figurative language of Scripture as if it were the language of science; but the language of Scripture is not scientific, but literary.—I am, Sir, &c., Brechin, August 22nd.

TOPSY-TURVY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It is curious how often the lawyers turn "topsy-turvy," when dealing with the Clergy. If a clergyman offends against the law of the land, he can be prosecuted in the Queen's Courts like any other subject. Further, he is liable to conviction by the Church Courts for breach of discipline, as naval and military officers are by courts-martial. No lawyer wants to give the taxpayer a right to demand a court-martial on an officer of the Army or Navy, without the consent of the commanding officer. Then why must the lay parishioner be entitled to drag the clergymen into the Bishop's Court without the Bishop's consent?

The parishioner has a right to the services of the Church, according to law. So has the taxpayer to the services of the Army and the Navy; but that does not give him a legal interest in the uniform, or in the manual and platoon exercise. His claim indeed is far stronger than the parishioner's inasmuch as he pays for the military forces and their uniforms; he cannot help seeing and hearing them; whereas the parishioner contributes nothing to the Ritualists or their vestments, and need never go near them, unless he likes.

The parallel fails in a still more material respect. The lay parishioner is subject to no Church discipline himself. He is free to worship in any way or none, at his own will, without impairing his rights to the Church. He is, in fact, a private soldier, who, being by a singular freak of law exempt from court-martial himself, wants to bring the officers to trial on his own construction of the Queen's Regulations. Why is it that such absurdities are never dreamed of, except for the correction of Clerks? Is it because the Clergy are the only class excluded from the House of Commons?

Side by side, too, with the demand for the lay parishioner to ride rough-shod over the Bishop comes another, for the Bishop to ride rough-shod over the Clergy. For my part, I fail to see why the Bishop should order the services, which the law of the Church entrusts to the incumbent under his supervision. A General Officer does not take the command of any regiment in his division at odd times; and there would be an end of all discipline, if he meddled with it by arbitrary interference from head-quarters. If the Bishop constantly attended the Cathedral Church, he would, of course, direct the ritual. His necessary absence requires a Dean and Chapter; and the one real reform of our time is the bringing the Dean into permanent residence. The effect is seen in the vastly improved condition of the fabric and ritual of every Cathedral in the land. Confusion and disaster would be the inevitable result of the intermittent interference of a Bishop flying up and down the country by express train, and with far more on his hands already than he can manage. It is the same, in a less degree, with the service of a parish church. It is the incumbent's business; he throws his heart and soul into it; he is the person responsible both to Church and State. Nothing but mischief could ensue from the interference of a distant, partially-informed, perhaps prejudiced diocesan. It would lessen the responsibility and dishearten the energies of the incumbent, and most likely fail to give any satisfaction to the people. Our greatest rulers in Church and State know that the secret of good government lies in setting men to do their own work, not in taking it out of their hands, or doing it over their heads. This, again, is topsy-turvy.

But the oddest thing of all is to find both these involutions advocated at the same time. The Clergy are to obey the Bishop's order against their own judgment, and the Bishop is not to be able to protect them from prosecution in his own Court.

There may be Bishops who would not hesitate to overrule an incumbent by an order which the Courts may afterwards adjudge to be illegal. But I should be surprised if many clergymen would take the risk of obeying it. It surprises me that, after agreeing to make a clean sweep of the legislation of the last fifty years, any of the Commissioners should be harking back to the vicious principle on which it was founded. The grand mistake is the attempt to govern the Church by Courts instead of Bishops and Synods. The Bishops themselves show a strange desire to sit as Judges in Court; they do not see that in our day legal powers weaken, instead of sustaining, spiritual authority; and it is in spiritual authority, not in litigation, that the Church's peace and strength are to be sought.—I am Sir, &c.,

ANIMALS AND LANGUAGE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I can match Mrs. De Morgan's pretty story of her "Dido." A wise old dog with whom I have the privilege to associate was, two or three days ago, lying asleep in her basket by the fire. I entered the room with my hat on, and invited her to join me in a walk; but, after looking up at me for a moment, as canine politeness required, she dropped back among her cushions, obviously replying, "Thank you very much, but I prefer repose." Thereupon I observed, in a clear voice, "I am not going on the road" (a promenade disliked by the dogs, because the walls on either side restrict the spirit of scientific research); "I am going up the mountain." Instantly my little friend jumped up, shook her ears, and, with a cheerful bark, announced herself as ready to join the party.

Beyond doubt or question, "Colleen" had either understood the word "road," or the word "mountain," or both, and determined her proceedings accordingly. Nothing in my action showed, or could show, the meaning of my words.

If any of your readers who have resided for some weeks or months in a country where a language is spoken entirely foreign to their own,—say, Arabic, or Basque, or Welsh,—will recall of how many words they insensibly learn the meaning without asking it, and merely by hearing them always used in certain relations, they will have, I think, a fair measure of the extent and nature of a dog's knowledge of the language of his masters. My dog has lived fewer years in the world than I have passed in Wales, but he knows just about as much English as I know Welsh, and has acquired it just in the same way.—I am, Sir, &c., F. P. C.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A remarkable instance of the effect that can be produced upon a dog by the human voice was related to me yesterday. Some of your correspondents would consider it confirmatory of their notion that dogs have mind enough to understand words; but I myself rather believe that the sound of the voice acts upon the feelings of dumb animals just as instrumental music acts upon us. The story is as follows:—A clergyman had for a long time a dog, and no other domestic animal. He and his servant made a great pet of the dog. At last, however, the clergyman took to keeping a few fowls, and the servant fed them. The dog showed himself very jealous and out of humour, at this; and when Sunday came round, and he was left alone, he took the opportunity to kill and bury two hens. A claw half uncovered betrayed what he had done. His master did not beat him, but took hold of him, and talked to him, most bitterly, most severely. "You've been guilty of the sin of murder, Sir,—and on the Sabbath Day, too; and you, a clergyman's dog, taking a mean advantage of my absence!" &c. He talked on and on for a long time, in the same serious and reproachful strain. Early the next morning the master had to leave home for a day or so; and he did so without speaking a word of kindness to the dog, because he said he wished him to feel himself in disgrace. On his return, the first thing he was told was, "The dog is dead. He never ate nor drank after you had spoken to him; he just lay and pined away, and he died an hour ago."—I am, Sir, &c.,

FELINE MOURNERS.

SIR,—Knowing your regard for animals—even for the despised cat—I send you two cognate anecdotes, and ask you or your readers if they can throw any light on the matter of the expression of grief by animals. I had a favourite Angora cat, who died after a week of suffering, the result of an accident. During his illness, his mother, a fine old cat of the ordinary sort, was often with him; but she was not present at the time of his death. He died late in the evening, and was taken into the cellar, to await his burial the next day. When he was brought up, stiff and cold, in a box, his mother was taken to see him; she gave one look, uttered a shriek, and ran away.

On relating this circumstance to a lady, she told me that there was a pet cat in her family, who was very fond of this lady's mother. When the latter was in her last illness, the cat was continually with her, lying on the bed. The lady died, and the cat was, of course, not again admitted to the room, though presenting herself again and again at the door. When the coffin was being carried down stairs, the cat happened to appear, and, on seeing it, uttered a shriek. In both these cases, the sound made was entirely unlike those made by cats under any circumstances, unless it be the cry made when in sudden pain. In the latter case, the most remarkable part remains to be told. The cat went to the funeral, and then disappeared for many days. But after that, she repeatedly attended funerals in the same cemetery, walking before the clergyman, her master.—I am, Sir, &c., "PERISH, INDIA!"

SIR,—In the notice of Mr. Jennings's "Anecdotal History of Parliament," which appeared in your issue of August 18th, the reviewer remarks (p. 1,065), "It may be well in future editions to state, for the benefit of Conservative readers, that Mr. Bright did not exclaim, 'Perish, India!'"

Have these words ever been attributed to Mr. Bright? It is quite possible that they may have been, considering how unwarrantably they have been fathered on Mr. E. A. Freeman. But probably your contributor, by a slip of the pen or of memory, wrote "India," for "Savoy." The following extracts may serve to account for the lapsus. They are taken from a characteristic letter addressed by Mr. Freeman to the editor of the Daily News, the letter bearing date December 19th, 1878:—

"I am surprised," writes Mr. Freeman, "to see in your paper of to-day, under the signature of 'John Delaware Lewis,' a letter taking for granted that I had at some time used the words, 'Perish, India!' This slanderous fable has been so often contradicted by me in your columns and elsewhere, that I had really begun to hope that no one any longer believed it; and that no one, save Peers in the service of Lord Beaconsfield, would venture to assert or imply what they must know to be false. But Mr. Lewis clearly believed that the words were uttered, because he speaks of my 'celebrated expression,' and takes some trouble with the question whether it was or was not 'original.' Let me assure Mr. Lewis that the expression was not borrowed by me from Robespierre, or anybody else; it may have been either borrowed or original, on the part of the person who invented it. The inventor was a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, shortly after the meeting in St. James's Hall, in December, 1876, when the words were falsely said to have been used. I at once contradicted the misstatement. Notwithstanding my contradiction, the false quotation was made over and over again, and I contradicted it several times, both in your pages and in those of the Times. Those who repeated the story had every means of knowing that it was false, and I am justified in treating them as wilful slanderers. Such a one was Sir Stafford Northcote,—well 'educated,' doubtless, by his master. He asserted the false statement; I contradicted it. Either in that contradiction, or in a later one in the Times, I said that I should say no more about the matter, but leave any one who chose again to assert the falsehood, to his own conscience. Sir Stafford Northcote, seemingly thinking that he was now safe, again asserted it. This was last year. . . . It is rather odd that, believing the words to have been uttered, he [Mr. Lewis] should have gone as far as Robespierre for a parallel, when he might have found one much nearer home. It has been generally believed that Mr. Bright once uttered the words, 'Perish, Savoy.' But, judging from my own experience, it is very likely that he never did. One may, however, suspect that 'Perish, Savoy!' was the pattern after which the words, 'Perish, India!' were invented by the correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette. . . . What I really said was this:—'Perish the interests of England, perish our dominion in India, rather than we should strike one blow or speak one word in behalf of the wrong, against the right!'"

I should not be justified in asking you, Sir, to devote so much of your valuable space to the correction of so small an error, did I not venture to suppose that you will agree with me in thinking Mr. Freeman's protest is well worth reproduction at the present time, when the sort of political pettifoggery which that gentleman so pointedly condemns is at least as prevalent as ever. Just now, indeed, as it seems to me, politicians of the "phrasemongering" order take a peculiar pleasure in repeating, with parrot-like persistency, such clap-trap as they well know to have not even the smallest justification in fact. Lord Beaconsfield could take up a germ of truth, and, presto! it became a frail but brilliant flower of rhetoric, so that his admiring audience was tickled and deceived; but with the magician, the Tories have buried his wand. And now—well, surely there are few things more flat, stale, and unprofitable than clumsy jugglery, or more wearisome and disgusting than an oft-repeated and as often unsuccessful attempt at hoodwinking.—I am, Sir, &c.,

WITH the exception of Garibaldi, Count Cavour probably has been the subject of more studies and sketches than any other great man of our day; many of them by foreigners who had but an imperfect knowledge of the man, however familiar they might be with the public facts of his life. Of these facts we have all a general idea from reading the newspapers; but in a biography we expect something more,—we want a picture of the whole man. We know that our heroes fought certain battles or made certain speeches on a given date, and we do not care very much whether it was Friday or Saturday; but we should like to know something of their motive-springs of action, and this cannot be attained unless we are made acquainted with their education, surroundings, and associates. Not long ago we met with a curious instance of the mode of looking at a great man from a distance—through a telescope, so to speak—as an isolated object. In a biographical essay, which had a certain King for its subject, his first Minister, a man of great talents and influence, was curtly dismissed, in a sentence describing him as the author of a book he did not write.

We have looked at Cavour long enough from this distant stand-point, as the writer of protocols and King's speeches. It is time we should approach nearer, and see what sort of man he was in his own Piedmont, among his friends. A complete and rounded work, taking in all aspects of the subject, would constitute a history of the times; and it is too soon to expect a history, in its full sense, of the events which ended in the establishment of the Kingdom of Italy. But it is not too soon to put together all available information about its founders, more especially should their private correspondence be collected and preserved, for a hasty note to a familiar friend often throws more light on a man's character than pages of analytical description. "Let us not be told about this man or that," says Mr. Froude; "let us hear the man himself speak, let us see him act, and let us be left to form our own conclusions about him." We would add, let us see him and hear him in his unguarded moments, when the eye of Europe is not upon him, when he lays aside the mask of etiquette, and reveals his soul to a trusted friend.

Italian writers of the present day generally seem to recognise the importance of catching the portraits of their great men while the impression of their personality is still fresh in the memory. Leaving history to a future generation, they confine themselves to the useful task of preserving from oblivion all information likely to throw light on the character and explain the conduct of their heroes. The two large volumes before us furnish a good example of this spirit of industrious research without literary ambition. It is easy to see that the author, or rather editor—who has already contributed some important chapters to the history of the Resorgimento—thinks little about himself, and much about his subject. He is evidently bent on the clearing-up of his facts, and leaves them to explain themselves. Both volumes have long introductions of three hundred pages, or more, which should be read with the correspondence, in order to understand the topics treated of therein. The letters themselves are of such absorbing interest—to those who admire Cavour and care for his work—that we are surprised that more than twenty years have been allowed to elapse before a general collection of them has been made. Of course, there existed the usual objection to an early publication of a statesman's correspondence; offences and misunderstandings might arise, and besides, the work involved heavy labour and responsibility. Captain Chiala has used his own discretion in suppressing some few passages of cutting criticism which might hurt living persons, and serve no public object; but he has been very sparing in the exercise of this right. We have about eight hundred letters, almost all complete as they were dashed off from the writer's quick, unflinching pen; he never paused to think, and rarely, if ever, erased a word in his private correspondence; and they were for the most part addressed to friends and colleagues, many of them strictly confidential. In these letters of varied interest, as the writer's life was varied and full of interest, we see the true reflection of Camillo Benso di Cavour in all the moods of his complex nature, which was inscrutable to the outer world. He was enthusiastic, yet calculating; frank and confiding, yet at times suspicious; warm-hearted and benevolent, yet sarcastic and severe; courteous and good-humoured, but subject to violent gusts of passion. A lover of political freedom in its broadest sense, he hated a display of power. Who has not heard the oft-quoted saying,—"We will have no state of siege; any one can govern with a state of siege?" Nevertheless, he loved personal power,—the real thing, not the display of it. Some of his admirers, who only know him as the champion of liberty, would angrily resent this assertion, for they hold him to be as faultless as the Ultramontane party hold him to be demoniacal. But those who have studied him more closely, his colleagues and countrymen, know that his disposition was not less imperious because it was accompanied by a winning amiability of manners. The story told by Cavour's friend, De la Rive, in his Souvenirs, is an illustration of character, for the child is father to the man. The little Count was not six years old when, arriving in Geneva, he complained of the bad horses with which he had made the journey, and demanded the dismissal of the postmaster. When old M. de la Rive explained that no one but the Syndic could do that, he required to see the Syndic; and being furnished with an introductory note, the resolute little fellow presented himself ceremoniously to the magistrate, insisting on the dismissal of the postmaster.

"With this little man," said Azeglio, soon after Cavour entered the Cabinet, "I do like Louis Philippe; I reign, but do not govern." La Marmora, who loved him sincerely, found something in his character non facile; and the King and his incomparable Minister sometimes came into violent collision. In a man of less capacity, his self-will would have been obstinacy; accompanied by such commanding abilities, it was conscious superiority and decision,—a little exaggerated. Cavour seen in some lights had a certain resemblance to Lord Palmerston. Reading lately a thoughtful criticism on Trollope's Life of Palmerston, we were struck by a passage which ascribed his success in a great measure to his immense physical strength and sound health. As it is applicable to Cavour, though in a less degree, for he had original genius, we will quote a few lines from it:—

"At the bottom of his success lay, as Mr. Trollope points out in effect, the passion of perfect physical strength and health. A strong body is, as we have all been taught from our youth up often enough, a very inferior thing to mental and moral excellence. . . . Yet a strong, and, above all, a healthy body (the two things are by no means the same), is, if not the necessary, yet certainly the natural foundation for a strong character and healthy mind. Lord Palmerston's physical endowments exactly represented his mental and moral gifts. . . . This determination to bide his time is the characteristic of the strong man. The impatience which forces weaker natures to seize on positions which they can hardly hold with credit is to some extent connected with a sense of physical weakness or disease. He who has no certainty that his life will be long feels that he cannot sacrifice the chances of the present day for the better opportunity which may never be his. The man of vigorous body has within him the presage of a long life. Looking for a lengthy existence, he can play a waiting and therefore, in many cases, a wise game. Healthiness is, again, half the secret of sound judgment. Morbid feeling is the almost certain concomitant of a sickly body; but morbid sentiment is a fatal bar to forming a correct estimate of other men's character."

It may be objected, in reply to this, that no man has the certainty of a long life, and that, in fact, Cavour's life was cut short in the zenith of his powers. But while he lived he had, in common with Lord Palmerston, the patient hopefulness of the strong man, the sound, clear judgment in estimating other men's characters, and the absence of all rancour. Cavour did not spare opponents while they obstructed his way, but he bore them no ill-will. Once, in trying to persuade a number of the out-going party to remain in office under him, he gave as his reason that he sometimes needed one "to hold him back by the coat-tails." This calls to mind Mr. Cobden's interview with Lord Palmerston, when Lord Palmerston so unexpectedly invited Cobden to take office, telling him he could check the warlike policy of the Government better when he was a member of it; and that political attacks should all be forgotten within three months.

This generous and forgiving trait, which Cavour and Palmerston had in common, is certainly an element of greatness, but it goes oftener with a thick-skinned than with a sensitive nature. It did not pain Cavour to know that he was spoken ill of by the extreme parties in his own country and abroad. To the Republicans he was the bloated aristocrat, upholding the odious institution of monarchy, and trampling on the neck of the people; while to the Reactionists he was the plotting revolutionist, devoid of conscience, an indescribable combination of craft and audacity. His sense of humour was tickled by the awful reputation he had earned, and when he heard of a man being in Turin who was supposed to have been his agent in stirring up the Romagna to rebellion, he expressed a wish to see him. "Voglio vedere questo terribile strumento della mia volontà!" he said, with a laugh of genuine enjoyment. Cavour, like Lord Palmerston, could practise diplomatic arts with enemies, but untold wealth could not tempt him for a moment to forget his duty to his country, or postpone her service to any private interest. In these letters we have abundant proofs of the sincerity of the passion of patriotism which absorbed his life; and while they lay bare his weaknesses, they reveal also many attractive traits of which the world in general knows nothing. His character and his history are told in them as no biographer could tell it, and the editor has exercised a wise discretion in confining his notes to simple explanation of facts. In citations from Parliamentary speeches, he generally gives an account of the occasion which called forth Cavour's oratory; and in the case of a controverted subject, he quotes the evidence on both sides in the most impartial manner, as, for instance, the misunderstanding between Count Cavour and Lord Clarendon at the Paris Congress, with reference to the help that England was disposed to extend to Italy.

The most interesting and important of the letters are addressed to Cavour's colleagues in confidence, meant to supplement the lengthy official despatches written from or to a foreign Court; others are penned from his country seat to Turin, and others, again, are hastily despatched notes from one office or house to another in the same city. The different grades of intimacy to which he admits them are marked by the pronouns lei, voi, and tu, Azeglio and La Marmora being the only persons with whom he uses the last familiar mode of address. He discusses freely home and foreign policy, gives instructions, asks advice, tells all the news of the day, sometimes administers a rebuke, and frequently offers a frank apology for some hasty expressions of the day or the week preceding, for he had a fiery temper and a warm heart, and was always impatient to make the amende if he had offended, and to forgive if he were the offended one. It was impossible to keep up a sustained quarrel with Cavour, for he would not permit it; no matter how insignificant the person was, he would go in pursuit of him till friendly relations were resumed, thus obeying an imperious necessity of his nature, says his friend Torelli, who tells a story of a quarrel, and his having written two notes to him and Farini, inviting them to an interview, to which they gave no reply; after which the Count, coming up with Torelli in the street, said, "Avete capito, non voglio bronci?" and taking his arm with an irresistible gentleness and courtesy, drew him into a friendly conversation. "Dear colleague," he writes to Cibrario, "though you still hold offence, and do not reply to my letters, I will not give up writing directly to you;" and at the end of the letter, "Give me back your goodwill, and believe in my sincere friendship."

Perhaps the most interesting portion of Cavour's correspondence is that directed to General La Marmora, his most trusted colleague, his "carissimo amico," to whom he confided everything, whom he described as "wise in council as he is brave in battle." Many of them are written during the painfully anxious period of the Crimean war, when La Marmora was in command of the Sardinian troops; others are penned in a gay mood during the King's visit to Paris and London, and many more while the Congress was sitting after the termination of the war, in which there are long accounts of the writer's conversations with the English plenipotentiaries; and we see with what intense anxiety he hung on Lord Clarendon's words, and with what joy the hope of the English alliance inspired him. "Not to lose time, I put the question of the Romagna on the tapis," he writes to Rattazzi, in that free-and-easy style which he permits himself in private correspondence, perhaps as a relief from the stilted diplomatic forms. "In this we shall have valuable auxiliaries in the English, who would joyfully send the Pope to the Devil." Then he tells his friend there is a serious difficulty in the way of his first plan, because "the Devil has willed that the Empress should want the Pope for godfather to her son."

The attempt on the life of the Emperor of the French by the Italian Republican Orsini, in 1858, all but undid the elaborate work of three years to which Cavour had devoted himself,—that is, the French alliance in a war against Austria. Napoleon and his Ministers assumed such a tone to the Piedmontese Ambassador that Victor Emanuel's blood was roused, and he wrote with his own hand a very dignified, almost defiant, letter to the Emperor. Cavour having received intimation that the King's life was threatened—his own life was also threatened, but that he kept a secret—by the same party who had tried to destroy Napoleon III., brought in a Bill for the protection of crowned heads from assassination. His speech, which excited a great sensation in the Chamber, was very telling, and contained a powerful indictment against secret societies and Mazzini, as the responsible head of the party to which Orsini and his companions belonged. The great conspirator's reply could not have been surpassed in vituperation by the coarsest of the Land Leaguers in the British Parliament:—

"Sir," he wrote, "I have long known that you were more tender of the Piedmontese Monarchy than of our common country; a materialistic worshipper of facts, much more than of holy, eternal principles; a man of genius, astute rather than powerful, a partisan of crooked policy, and averse, by patrician instincts and inborn tendencies, to liberty. But I did not believe you a calumniator; now I know you for such. . . . You have, knowing that the falsehood would augment your votes, declared to the Chamber that your liberty-slaining law was for the protection of Victor Emmanuel's life, threatened by us. In this accusation, there is a double lie. . . . If I did not like you before, I now despise you. You were an enemy. Now you are a vile, shameful enemy. . . . You are worse than stupid, O calumniator! Fool, and calumniator at the same time, you were, &c. We represent Italy; you represent the old, covetous, timid ambition of Casa Savoia. Between you and us, Sir, Italy shall judge. I think that you might, if you wished, have made Italy. But the policy of the Marchese d'Azeglio and yours will attain nothing except the overthrow of Piedmont."

It was precisely in those days, with these fearful prognostications ringing in his ears, in a sort of discordant accompaniment with the curses and threats of the Vatican, that the Minister was conducting to a consummation the plan he had had in view ever since the Crimean war,—an English or French alliance. Finding his hopes of English help ill-founded, he now turned all his energies to bringing the Emperor to a decision, and so momentous did he feel the expected interview at Plombières to be that he almost lost confidence in his own powers at the last, as we see by a hasty letter to La Marmora:—

"Dear Friend," he wrote from Geneva, "I found here the reply of Belleville. He says the Emperor will be charmé to see me at Plombières. The drama approaches the climax. Pray to Heaven to inspire me, that I may not commit any folly in this supreme moment. In spite of my coolness and confidence in myself, I am seriously anxious now."

The eight hours' conversation with the Emperor he transmitted to the King, with a request that that La Marmora should examine it; and, in addition, he wrote him a private letter relating the main points, and begging of him to meet him on the frontier, as he wished to see him first, before encountering any other of his countrymen, so anxious was he to share the burden of his secret with his trusted friend. Cavour expressed himself soddisfattissimo with the result of the meeting, as he had reason to be. He had played the waiting game of the strong man, and his hour of triumph had struck.

Cavour's style is vigorous, clear, unpolished, not free from grammatical errors. His early education had been neglected, and though he was a hard student when he grew to manhood, he studied only what interested him deeply, and would be useful for practical purposes; the graces of his native language were not included in these,—he had no literary ambition, and thought more of the substance than the form of his compositions. Yet he wrote for the Press, and an occasional article from his pen was eagerly welcomed by the reviews, the reason being that he only wrote when he had something valuable to say. He sometimes appealed to his accomplished rival and friend Azeglio to help him in the composition of important documents, and Victor Emanuel's speech in reply to the address of the City of London, attributed, in the Life of the Prince Consort to Cavour, was really the work of Azeglio.

The charm of this correspondence is in the perfect freedom and unreserve of its tone, and the manner in which small and great things, lively and grave subjects, are intermingled. Sometimes Cavour's playful humour breaks forth in the most serious moments, as in the following note to Cibrario:—

"DEAR COLLEAGUE,—The supreme hour of the Ministry has struck. Before dying, we ought to pardon each other all offences; therefore, I hope that you will not continue to be angry with me for the warmth (vivacità) of yesterday, which, however, you provoked, and that you will join us in the Council Chamber at nine, to hear our testament read.—Your affectionate

In conclusion, we have only to say that the reading of these volumes has afforded us as much entertainment as information, and we heartily commend them to those interested in Italian biography and history.

EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY ADVENTURERS.*

THIS is the title which more exactly expresses the subject of the book which its author has dubbed with the more romantic one of Kings and Queens of an Hour. It consists of sketches of persons of the adventurer order, who rose from little or nothing to be conspicuous characters for a while in the society of the eighteenth or the beginning of the present century. Only one of them, Theodore of Corsica, who may be considered as the eponymous hero of the book, was ever a king, though Mrs. Fitzherbert may be considered as having a moral claim to be considered a queen. The "hour," we presume, refers to the time consumed by Mr. Fitzgerald over the composition of each sketch. He does, indeed, state in his preface that "the collection of the incidents that follow has been the work of many years," yet the great majority of the sketches, such as those of the Gummings and Fox's Duchess of Devonshire, cannot be said to be the result of original research of any prolonged or agonising kind. But if the collection of materials has taken a long time, the arrangement of them certainly has not, to judge from the result. Grammar is a thing which Mr. Fitzgerald evidently despises. The correspondence of relatives and antecedents is a piece of pedantry undreamt of in his philosophy of style. It is with the greatest difficulty, sometimes, that we can discover whom he is talking about. Nor is it easy to distinguish between the author's quotations and his own remarks, as inverted commas are strewn wildly over his pages, and seem to be thrown in gratis wherever he thinks he is getting dull. Yet notwithstanding all the faults of style and grammar, some of which are extremely irritating, and though the book is the book of an inveterate bookmaker, it must be allowed that it is a very amusing and interesting one.

The most novel and the best written story is the first one, of Theodore of Corsica. This extraordinary man, who was seemingly a German baron, had married the daughter of an Irish nobleman, had deserted her, and after a stormy youth as a hanger-on of the dissipated Courts and diplomatists of Europe, thought he saw an opportunity for winning a throne to himself in the island of Corsica. That hapless island—the Ireland of the Mediterranean—was then under the dominion of Genoa, but it was in a chronic state of revolt against its Lords, who misgoverned in their own interests through a Genoese army of occupation and a Genoese “party of ascendancy.” But at this time, 1734, the island was quite out of hand, and the Genoese Republic were hiring and begging troops from Spain, France, or the Emperor. Theodore, who was a dependent of the House of Würtemberg, one of whose Princes was in command of some German troops in the island, entered into communication with some Corsican chiefs who had gone over to Genoa to negotiate and had been detained as hostages, and held out to them hopes of succour from influential quarters. At length, the Deputies offered the leadership to Theodore himself, an offer of which he was not slow to take advantage. Having tried to get help from Spain and from Constantinople, he went over to Tunis, and getting some assistance from the Bey early in April, 1736—the exact date Mr. Fitzgerald, with his usual slipshodness, does not give—he landed in the Bay of Aleria, with two or three ships laden with muskets and shoes. On April 15th he was elected King of Corsica, and a regular constitution was drawn up, with an executive council, a budget, and all the rest of it. He set up a bodyguard of three hundred men, lived in a palace protected by two brass guns, established an order of knighthood, distributed titles of nobility, and issued a coinage, of which specimens are still to be seen. The new king showed considerable ability in dealing with the means at his disposal, and organised the peasant militia into a military force strong enough to drive the Genoese within the walls of Bastia, and besiege them there. But the succours from without which he had promised the Corsicans never arrived, whether in the shape of men, money, or means for carrying on the war. His new subjects became suspicious and discontented, and at length, seven months after his arrival, he had to leave his kingdom in the hands of administrators, and sally forth in quest of the needful assistance. He tried all round Europe for it, while for two years the Corsicans held the Genoese at bay, and declared their fidelity to “King Theodore, whom God preserve!” When at last he had succeeded in getting some Dutch and English merchants to load some ships for him at Amsterdam, he sailed for Corsica again. But, meanwhile, the Genoese had invoked the aid of the French, and poor Theodore found them in possession of part of the island, while the rest was embroiled in civil war. Moreover, the Dutch supercargo would not allow the vessels to load their goods without payment, and payment was not forthcoming. The French and Genoese fleet came up, and the poor King had to sail away for Naples, and abandon his kingdom and people to their fate. For several years more he wandered about trying to get help to recover his kingdom, but at length he was arrested for debt in England, and lodged in the King's Bench Prison. In England the poor King was the subject of many bad jokes, made in still worse taste, by Horace Walpole and others, who ought to have known better. At length, twenty years after his coronation, he died at a tailor's in Chapel Street, Soho, and was buried at the expense of a vulgar oilman, who “declared that for once in his life he should like to have the honour of burying a King.” This tragi-comic story is, on the whole, well told by the author, but he spoils it by the “damnable iteration” with which at each incident of the poor King's career he compares him to that very unsavoury hero, Casanova. Most people are, happily, likely to know even less of Casanova than of Theodore, and, therefore, so far as there is any illustration in the comparison, it is obscurum per obscurius. Moreover, the comparison is hard on Theodore, who had at least a great deal of personal dignity, and really was of great help to the Corsicans, and if he had only succeeded in finding a Lord Byron to help him, might have established their freedom. After all, he was not more of a selfish adventurer than Napoleon III., and had considerably more right in Corsica than Maximilian had in Mexico.

The story of Lady Hamilton, which follows, is told more ungrammatically and with less coherence than that of Theodore of Corsica. Indeed, as the book goes on, the sentences get wilder and the paragraphs more disconnected, till it seems to sink into a mass of note-book thrown at the reader's head. The careers of Lady Hamilton and Beau Brummel are, however, worked out with tolerable thoroughness. There is a certain curious resemblance between the two, in the real charm and abilities of both, in the way in which their heads were turned by success, in their abandonment by those who were at least bound to prevent them from falling into utter misery, and in the same miserable ending, in poverty and almost starvation, in a French harbour of refuge. But Lady Hamilton, with all her coarseness, was made of the better stuff of the two; and though she came from the ranks, perhaps because she came from them, she never so wholly sank as the poor Beau. The wrongs inflicted on her, too, were greater, and the sharper meanness with which she was “done” by Nelson's brother out of any chance of the provision for which Nelson asked in his last codicil, and the way in which she was abandoned by him, though he had used her influence to get a great preferment in the Church, immeasurably surpassed the petty contempt which George IV. showed to his former favourite Brummel. But in truth, the perusal of these sketches does not tend to raise one's opinion of the great personages of that time. The royal lover does not appear to advantage in the story of Mrs. Fitzherbert, nor does the haute société of the time in that of the Duchess of Kingston.

The adventures of Paul Jones are in a less scandal-mongering and sturdier line of history. The panic into which he threw the whole of Great Britain with a flotilla of half-a-dozen frigates suggests unpleasant thoughts as to what might happen now-a-days, if we were really plunged into a European war, and a privateer of the energy and audacity of Paul Jones set himself to harry Liverpool or Hull. It is rather hard on poor Beckford, of Fonthill Abbey, to be placed between Paul Jones and Ireland of the Shakespeare forgeries, though he might console himself with the thought that notoriety makes a man acquainted with strange company. There is a certain appositeness just now about the tale of Ireland's valuable Shakespearian manuscripts. The same unfortunate limitation of materials which has made Mr. Shapira send to the British Museum the Synagogue rolls off which his primeval sheep-skins were probably cut, made poor Ireland employ “the end of an old rent-roll” for the purpose of Shakespeare's will. He, too, dabbled in ancient pottery, as well as parchments. Nor was his new edition of King Lear any more inferior than the new edition of Deuteronomy now revealed to the world to the documents which they superseded. But the history of such literary impostures is generally pretty much the same. Directly they are placed in the hands of experts they betray themselves, and are found to indicate their origin by less uncertain signs than “internal evidence.”

We have only space just to mention that there is a tolerably lively but rambling sketch of Peg Woffington, and rather dull and still more rambling ones of the Miss Gunnings, the Duchess of Devonshire, and “L. E. L.” There is a pointless story of Mr. Eliot, a confused collection of scandals about Sir Philip Francis and Warren Hastings, and a rather perverse account of the early loves of Gibbon and Pitt, with, of course, the incident of Gibbon on his knees and unable to get off them, for which there seems about as much authority as for most of such incidents. But, as we have said, the book is not, on the whole, unamusing, and it is highly to be commended to those who think that by reading more or less spicy scandals about notable persons, they are learning history.

IN THE CARQUINEZ WOODS.*

THIS tale, the greater part of which has already appeared in Longman's Magazine, has much of the force and freshness, but none of the pathos and beauty of Bret Harte's earlier tales, for example, The Luck of Roaring Camp, and the rest. Mr. Bret Harte's scenery is still bold and impressive. “The Carquinez Woods” are painted with a vigorous and a graphic pen, and so far as the physical scenery goes, there is nothing left to be desired. Unfortunately, "though every prospect pleases," yet in this book, at least, it is quite true that "only man is vile." There is but one character in this book which is approximately good,—the character of the young half-breed hunter and botanist who may be said to be the hero of the tale. The half-Spanish woman Teresa, passionate, reckless, theatrical, degraded in character as she is, is the next best human being here, and the rest are either dissolute or bad. Mr. Bret Harte is very sketchy. He does not take the pains to finish off any of his characters very carefully; nor, indeed, are they, for the most part, worth the trouble. But he certainly produces the effect of a society of thoroughly relaxed morals in general; indeed, so much so, that they honour, as a popular preacher and minister of religion amongst them, much the vilest personage of the tale. In the Carquinez Woods is attractive chiefly for the freshness of its scenery, and the ease with which the characters of the miners and Californian roughs are dashed off in outline. It is not a book that will bear much reading, though to the European the first effect of it has something of the fascination of all pictures of novel scenes and novel states of society.

Sometimes one fancies that the comparative freedom of half-organised societies must be favourable to the nature of man, and must liberate it from that steady pressure of convention which appears in old societies almost to suppress the individual nature altogether. But he who thinks so should read these pictures of Californian life by Mr. Bret Harte, and he will come to think that human nature released from the pressure of fixed states of society grows not stronger and more original, but only looser in fibre, in consequence, with less of purpose in it, less of intelligence, less of morality, and, above all, less of religion. The present sketch contains no hint of nobility of any sort except in the person of the half-breed, and his character has only the nobleness of the stoical Red Indian reserve and fortitude, not a trace of guiding conviction or spiritual loyalty to what is nobler than himself. As for the other men and women, there is courage enough, swagger enough, unscrupulousness enough, looseness enough of all kinds, to suggest a society in dissolution rather than a society in infancy and growth. The wild beast seems present in the men and women as well as in the forests, and this it is, we feel no doubt, which seems to give strength to a picture that is rather a picture of human weakness and flaccidity than of human force.

Without the painting of external nature we should hardly feel that this slight story had any true justification at all. But no one can deny the force of such a picture as this:—

"The sun was going down on the Carquinez Woods. The few shafts of sunlight that had pierced their pillared gloom were lost in unfathomable depths, or splintered their ineffectual lances on the enormous trunks of the redwoods. For a time the dull red of their vast columns, and the dull red of their cast-off bark which matted the echoless aisles, still seemed to hold a faint glow of the dying day. But even this soon passed. Light and colour fled upwards. The dark interlaced tree-tops, that had all day made an impenetrable shade, broke into fire here and there; their lost spires glittered, faded, and went utterly out. A weird twilight that did not come from the outer world, but seemed born of the wood itself, slowly filled and possessed the aisles. The straight, tall, colossal trunks rose dimly like columns of upward smoke. The few fallen trees stretched their huge length into obscurity, and seemed to lie on shadowy trestles. The strange breath that filled these mysterious vaults had neither coldness nor moisture; a dry, fragrant dust arose from the noiseless foot that trod their bark-strewn floor; the aisles might have been tombs, the fallen trees enormous mummies; the silence the solitude of a forgotten past. And yet this silence was presently broken by a recurring sound like breathing, interrupted occasionally by inarticulate and stertorous gasps. It was not the quick, panting, listening breath of some stealthy feline or canine animal, but indicated a larger, slower, and more powerful organisation, whose progress was less watchful and guarded, or as if a fragment of one of the fallen monsters had become animate. At times this life seemed to take visible form, but as vaguely, as misshapenly as the phantom of a nightmare. Now it was a square object moving sideways, endways, with neither head nor tail and scarcely visible feet; then an arched bulk rolling against the trunks of the trees and recoiling again, or an upright cylindrical mass, but always oscillating and unsteady, and striking the trees on either hand. The frequent occurrence of the movement suggested the figures of some weird rhythmic dance to music heard by the shape alone. Suddenly it either became motionless or faded away. There was the frightened neighing of a horse, the sudden jingling of spurs, a shout and outcry, and the swift apparition of three dancing torches in one of the dark aisles; but so intense was the obscurity that they shed no light on surrounding objects, and seemed to advance of their own volition without human guidance, until they disappeared suddenly behind the interposing bulk of one of the largest trees. Beyond its eighty feet of circumference the light could not reach, and the gloom remained inscrutable. But the voices and jingling spurs were heard distinctly. 'Blast the mare! She's shied off that cursed trail again.'—'Ye ain't lost it agin, hev ye?' growled a second voice.—'That's jist what I hev. And these blasted pine-knots don't give light an inch beyond 'em. D——d if I don't think they make this cursed hole blacker.'"

Or take the following striking pictures of the same wood when, after an unusually sultry season, it has taken fire:—

"The heat had become excessive, but she held her shawl with both hands drawn tightly over her shoulders. Suddenly a wood-duck darted out of the covert blindly into the opening, struck against the blasted trunk, fell half-stunned near her feet, and then recovering fluttered away. She had scarcely completed another circuit before the irruption was followed by a whirring bevy of quail, a flight of jays, and a sudden tumult of wings swept through the wood like a tornado. She turned inquiringly to Dunn, who had risen to his feet, but the next moment she caught convulsively at his wrist; a wolf had just dashed through the underbrush not a dozen yards away, and on either side of them they could hear the scamper and rustle of hurrying feet like the outburst of a summer shower. A cold wind arose from the opposite direction, as if to contest this wild exodus; but it was followed by a blast of sickening heat. Teresa sank at Dunn's feet in an agony of terror. 'Don't let them touch me,' she gasped; 'keep them off! Tell me, for God's sake, what has happened!' He laid his hand firmly on her arm and lifted her in his turn to her feet like a child. In that supreme moment of physical danger, his strength, reason, and manhood returned in their plenitude of power. He pointed coolly to the trail she had quitted, and said, 'The Carquinez Woods are on fire!' How fast he ran, or the time it took him to reach the Woods, has never been known. Their outlines were already hidden when he entered them. To a sense less keen, a courage less desperate, and a purpose less unaltered than Low's, the wood would have been impenetrable. The central fire was still confined to the lofty tree-tops, but the downward rush of wind from time to time drove the smoke into the aisles in blinding and suffocating volumes. To simulate the creeping animals, and fall to the ground on hands and knees, feel his way through the underbrush when the smoke was densest, or take advantage of its momentary lifting, and without uncertainty, mistake, or hesitation glide from tree to tree in one undeviating course, was possible only to an experienced woodsman. To keep his reason and insight so clear as to be able in the midst of this bewildering confusion to shape that course so as to intersect the wild and unknown track of an inexperienced, frightened wanderer, belonged to Low, and Low alone. He was making his way against the wind towards the fire. He had reasoned that she was either in comparative safety to windward of it, or he should meet her being driven towards him by it, or find her succumbed and fainting at its feet. To do this he must penetrate the burning belt, and then pass under the blazing dome. He was already upon it; he could see the falling fire dropping like rain or blown like gorgeous blossoms of the conflagration across his path. The space was lit up brilliantly. The vast shafts of dull copper cast no shadow below, but there was no sign or token of any human being. For a moment the young man was at fault. It was true this hidden heart of the forest bore no undergrowth; the cool matted carpet of the aisles seemed to quench the glowing fragments as they fell. Escape might be difficult, but not impossible, yet every moment was precious. He leaned against a tree, and sent his voice like a clarion before him: 'Teresa!' There was no reply. He called again. A faint cry at his back from the trail he had just traversed made him turn. Only a few paces behind him, blinded and staggering, but following like a beaten and wounded animal, Teresa halted, knelt, clasped her hands, and dumbly held them out before her. 'Teresa!' he cried again, and sprang to her side."

When you have read that, you know why the book has a charm of its own, a charm which the boldly outlined characters of the few vulgar persons portrayed cannot wholly destroy. Mr. Bret Harte used to mingle some ideal element with his pictures of life, which prevented the vulgar interests and vulgarer passions of his Californian miners from appearing to be mere blots on the grand scenery of the forest, the cañon, and the mountain. But that ideal element has vanished, and it is with some impatience that we find the great landscape disfigured by so much vulgar slang and still more vulgar vice. It appears to take the imminent presence of death, and the awful spectacle of a burning forest, to stimulate the manhood in Mr. Bret Harte's figures into showing itself at all. Under the influence of that tremendous tonic, Bret Harte's men and women do emerge a little from the repulsive hysterical levity in which they are, for the most part, continually immersed.

SCOTTISH DIVINES OF THE PAST AND THE FUTURE.*

We confess to being a little disappointed with the volume of lectures bearing the title of the Scottish Divines. The subjects are very interesting, including the names of the most eminent figures in the religious and ecclesiastical life of Scotland, from John Knox and Andrew Melville, to Robert Lee and Norman

* Scottish Divines, 1505-1872. St. Giles's Lectures. Third Series. Edinburgh: Maculiven and Wallace. 1883.

Macleod. Among the lecturers are some of the best known of the clergy and theological Professors of Scotland at the present time, such as Principal Tulloch, of St. Andrews, Professor Flint, of Edinburgh, Dr. Herbert Story, the biographer of "Cardinal" Carstairs, and Dr. Cameron Lees, whose metropolitan cathedral of St. Giles has given this series of lectures its title. Yet very few of the lectures are, what all lectures having men for their subjects should be, striking portraits. So practised a writer as Principal Tulloch could, of course, hardly fail to do justice to a theologian of tone and temper so congenial to his own as Archbishop Leighton. Seldom, we might, perhaps, even say never, has that tragic combination of genius and eccentricity, Edward Irving, been treated with such discriminating justice and good sense as by Dr. Story; while Dr. Lees appreciates, without becoming maudlin over, the saintliness and subtle spirituality of Bishop Ewing, the friend of Erskine of Linlathen. Principal Robertson, the historian "Moderate" leader, and friend of David Hume and "Jupiter" Carlyle, is well sketched by a namesake of his own, a Glasgow clergyman, who should not, however, have written such slipshod English as this:—"He executed an admirable translation of the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, an author who must have engaged his sympathy, and helped to fashion his character, a book, which now more than ever, powerfully attracts men of thought and culture." But the bulk of the men whose stories are given in these lectures—Knox, Melville, Ebenezer Erskine, Samuel Rutherford, in particular—are shadows, or at the best but partisans giving and taking "swashing blows;" of their personal qualities, of their private life, we learn next to nothing. If it be said in excuse for the lecturers on these divines that little is known of them apart from the controversies and struggles in which they were engaged, this cannot be said by way of justification for Dr. Donald Macleod, whose account of Chalmers is a disappointing piece of patch-work, although the abiding charm of Chalmers's personality is its essential oneness. Nor are we quite satisfied with Professor Flint's lecture on Norman Macleod. It is enthusiastic enough, but it is also laboured, and it "goes round the subject," instead of gripping it firmly. We understand what Mr. Flint means when, referring to Macleod's college days, he says:—"He was the companion of some of the best and brightest youths at the University. He held close converse with Shakespeare, Coleridge, and Wordsworth." But this association of raw Glasgow lads in their teens with the masters of our literature is, to say the least, clumsy in its abruptness. Most of the lectures reproduced in this volume are commendably free from controversial bitterness. It is to be regretted that Dr. Cunningham, of Crief, should have imported a good deal of acridity into his, in many respects, careful account of the struggle in the Church of Scotland that raged round the person and "practices" of Dr. Robert Lee. Such an expression as "the old ladies of Edinburgh were beginning to be greatly alarmed" might be excusable in a Scotch pamphlet or newspaper, a quarter of a century ago. Now, it has the musty and unpleasant odour of stale invective.

Lectures on the Scottish Divines who have flourished between 1507 and 1872, necessarily embrace between them a history of ecclesiastical life North of the Tweed from the Reformation almost to the present day. This history must be allowed to be one of controversies, dissensions, and the growth of Presbyterian sects, and it is not remarkable that some of the lecturers should have become positively impatient in their grief over the years spent in dismal broils and heartburnings over trifles. Dr. Cunningham breaks out almost hysterically:—"Alas for our poor country, because of its religious divisions! What would we not do, or dare, or sacrifice, for union,—union, with almost any Church or sect. What brain-waste! What money-waste! What loss of temper, of charity, of every good thing; three men everywhere doing the work of one, and not doing it so well as the one would,—heathenism and vandalism rising up in the cities, and none to help! Oh! the sin and the shame of it!" Even Dr. Tulloch, although the leading Scotch apostle of sweet reasonableness, and although he tells us rather hopefully that "mere logical ingenuity on barren questions, once supposed a mark of ability and erudition, is now rated at its true value, as the mark of a mean rather than a large understanding," indulges occasionally in a jeremiad:—

"Of all the miserable histories in the world, that of Scottish ecclesiastical and theological polemics is probably the most futile and miserable. . . . 'How long, O Lord!' may we say, but the cry is hardly heard, amid the clamour of faction, now as well as then; and the last thing that is thought of is the building of a national temple in which men like Leighton, and men yet very different from him, might yet find a spiritual home, and the healing fruits of Christian science and piety flourish, rather than the bitter herbs of zealotry and party."

Far, indeed, be it from us to minimise the evil effects of sectarianism in Scotland, or anywhere else, or to refrain from hoping, with Principal Tulloch, that the traditional theology North of the Border is being superseded by a more genial and comprehensive view of the divine economy. But it should be remembered that Scotch sectarianism means, even at its worst, intensity and sincerity—men who spend their time, their money, and their vital force in splitting hairs must believe in these hairs—and intensity and sincerity count for more in character than apathy or torpor. There may be what Mr. Arnold calls "hideousness" in Scotch Dissent, but there never has been "immense ennui." Writers on Scotch ecclesiastical controversies, especially clergymen, seem to be driven to their wits' end to account for the bitterness which has always marked them. Has not poverty—the poverty both of clergy and laity—had a good deal to do with it? The Reformation was not an unmixed blessing to the people of Scotland. The nobles who acted with Knox seized the lands of the Church they helped to overthrow, and Knox, to his great mortification, found himself unable to prevent spoliation. Once, as soon as the nobles had, by means of the Calvinists, attained their ends, the absolute selfishness of which is admitted by the most moderate of the historians of Scotland, they went over to Episcopacy, and became the keenest and most unscrupulous of the persecutors of Episcopacy. Speculation on the causes and courses of Scotch sectarianism consists of so many "ifs" and "might have beens" and one can at least wonder what might have been if the successors of Knox in the leadership of the Commons of Scotland had successfully led their followers against the robbers of the Church, and compelled them to part with that property which the Church had, although, no doubt, in a scandalously perfunctory way, administered on behalf of the poor? Might there not, by a redistribution of the Church's revenues have been secured for the occupants, both of the pulpits and the pews of Scotland, that modest competence, "neither poverty nor riches," which helps, at all events, to lead to the peaceful frame of mind least conducive to bitterness and fanaticism.

Life-Education of the Christian Ministry consists of a series of lectures delivered by scholarly and cultured clergymen of the Church of Scotland, to the theological students attending the Universities of Aberdeen, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and St. Andrews, supplemented by a sermon, bearing the suggestive, not to say ominous, title of "A Plea for a Learned Ministry." Mr. Wilson's purpose is, in fact, to indicate some of the educational processes which will turn out good Scotch divines in the future, and among the "influences" which he suggests that students should submit themselves to, are what he styles the profane past, the sacred past, the home present, the foreign present, and the future. His lectures amount to a series of advices to his hearers and readers to be above all things catholic in their sympathies and their knowledge, if they are to keep themselves and their Church abreast of the times which they are apparently to find themselves confronting. These advices are almost uniformly good, and Mr. Wilson's own sympathies are all in the right direction. But his style, with its elaborate rhetorical embroidery, looks half-a-century old, at the least. Thus he tells Scotch students to look beyond their own country for moral inspiration, and support, and types of human, in this Johnsonian fashion:—

"Certainly, whatever may be our wealth in illustrious types of excellence and glorious instances of virtue, culled and gathered from our own native fields; yet this great picture-gallery and treasury must for us be indefinitely increased, both in richness and variety, when we transfer to its walls and chambers the portraits of the greatest men, and specimens of the noblest deeds of all lands and nations. It cannot but excite a most salutary pressure, and prove a most liberalising education, for those who have to cultivate a delicate moral perception and sustain a keen moral enthusiasm, to dwell in such august and awful presences, to look on such exalted and inspiring exemplars, and to feed their souls with such priceless spiritual influences."

The sermon, "A Plea for a Learned Ministry," which Mr. Wilson publishes along with his "Lectures," is bolder in thought than they are, and in style is freer and more vigorous. Certainly, Mr. Wilson's Church needs "a learned ministry," if this account of its condition be correct:—

"I think it is too evident to require any proof that, partly from the popular constitution of our Church, partly from the poverty of our ecclesiastical endowments, partly from the exigencies of a rapidly increasing population, and in great measure from the pressure of that spirit of this practical age which clamours loudly for practical, visible, tangible results, and measures everything by those material fruits that can be tabulated and enumerated and go to swell statistics and fill reports, there is a growing propensity to cultivate and foster the one element of the Church life and strength at the expense of the other. Preaching, evangelising, visiting, organising, money-raising, and the construction and superintendence of ecclesiastical parochial machinery, are rising in popularity and demand every day, at such a rate that they threaten, in this wild rush and flow of all the vital blood to the heart, to induce emotional asphyxia or intellectual atrophy. Every day, 'doing,' in the more crude sense of that word, is more and more idealised and insisted upon, until 'thinking' almost threatens to become a lost art and 'learning' a secret, suspected practice, or obsolete tradition."

But will there be any room for a "learned ministry" in such a Church? In any case, its authorities ought to have their attention drawn to the very serious danger which, if Mr. Wilson is correct, is now threatening its intellectual, if not also its spiritual, supremacy in Scotland.

THE WILD BIRDS OF KILLEEVY.*

WE mean no disparagement to Miss Mulholland's book, which, indeed, strikes us as showing an advance on any work of hers that we have seen before, if we say that it is a romance rather than a story of real life. The scene, with its cloudless sky, "glittering mountain crags," "dazzling ocean," and "plains tawny, purple, and olive," is a highly idealised picture of western Ireland; and still more remote from reality are the wondrous pair whom a strange chance has given at once to the little mountain village, Fanchea,—with the marvellous voice that makes her, if she will only follow the career, the rival of the queens of song; and Kevin, who though unable to read at twelve, blossoms out before he is thirty into a poet whom all England delights to honour. But there are moods in all readers whose judgment is worth having, to which romance appeals, and there is a teaching which romance is best fitted to give. We find a charm in the workmanship, and a truth in the utterances of this book, which makes us forget, or, at least, not care to remember, that the life which it pictures was never lived under the sun.

Fanchea, the child of Irish peasants, is left an orphan at seven years old. Famine, and the fever that comes after famine, have taken from her her father and mother; and she becomes, by her father's last request, the charge of Kevin, a lad some twelve years her senior, in whom the influence of story and legend, and the natural beauty that lies about him, are developing the genius of a poet. The life of these two, as they wander by mountain and sea, is described with much beauty of language, but, perhaps, at too great a length. We are not sorry when the action of the story begins. Fanchea is tempted into the tents of some gipsies, tempted against her promise not to go near them, by the fascination of an organ (surely an idealised instrument), which plays the Hallelujah Chorus "as if the strongest angels were singing and shouting together." The gipsies carry her off, and make a harvest of gain out of her marvellous singing. After a year's time, an interval which braces up the lad's dreamy nature to action and resolve, Kevin starts to search for her. The stories of the two wanderers, who are not made to meet till the very end of the volume, may be allowed, with the reserve before made, to be exceptionally well-told. The girl runs away from the gipsies, and meets with exactly the people who are wanted to develop the story of her life. The Signora, with the passion for art to which she has never been able to give an adequate expression; Herr Harfenspieler, who has given to music the same devotion and found the same failure; and Lord Wilderspin, the wealthy and eccentric nobleman, need not be conceived of as real persons; but they are the characters of a pleasing little drama. The whole of Fanchea's life at Lord Wilderspin's house, where the Herr and the Signora train her to be the great prima donna of the future, makes a very attractive picture. We may mention with especial praise the scene where the girl rehearses the part of Gretchen by moonlight in the great gallery of the house. Kevin, meanwhile, is equally fortunate. To be assistant in a bookseller's shop is just the ideal position for a lad whose intellectual appetite is in its first freshness; and it has also the advantage of introducing him to the wisest and most appreciative of patrons. Kevin's story, however, is naturally inferior to Fanchea's. Miss Mulholland has not, we should say, equally realised it to herself; and while we can see for ourselves that Fanchea is charming, we have to take Kevin's cleverness very much for granted.

But the charm of the book is more in its thought and sentiment than in its story. The talk of the two artists, each of them marred by some weakness that has hindered them from reaching their aim, is especially good. Here are some fragments of it:—

"'I was born in Verona,' said the Signora, in answer to a question. —'And I in Nuremberg,' said Herr Harfenspieler, touching his most delicate string with a loving finger. 'I know your Verona. What a dream! That is why your face reminds me of the angels in Fra Angelico's pictures,' he added bluntly. 'I am no flatterer, and you may not be heavenly for aught I know; but I have seen you blowing a trumpet in one of the Paradisiacal visions of the angelic master.' Twang went a deep chord across the violin; and a silent sob echoed it in the Signora's heart. —'That was said long ago,' she said; 'but it is like a sorry old jest to hear it now.' —'Why? Angels may get worn faces for a time, perhaps through wearying after the good in some human soul. When that soul is won their wrinkles probably disappear. Whatever is intrinsically good and beautiful remains a perpetual fact, and never can be destroyed; it is only what is ugly, wrong, discordant, that is failure and negation. What is time? Ach —! Music will never cease.' Hereupon a burst of delicious melody swept through the quiet and darkening room; and noiselessly the Signora wept. 'Juliet was born in your Verona,' continued the old professor, laying down his bow; 'and Juliet is a fact, though she never was clothed in flesh and blood. The deep red rose that comes every June is a fact, though each time it sheds its leaves we can scarcely believe it ever was, or ever will return.' 'It is pleasant to me to listen,' said the Signora. 'Life does not seem so wasted when one gets rid of the idea of success and failure. My youth was one long passion of longing to create the beautiful. Life broke my tools and laughed at my folly; and yet there is something dwelling with me for all that which binds up the sorest wounds of a broken spirit. Art has allowed me to live in her house, though her dearest tasks have been given elsewhere. I have tried to remember that "they also serve who only stand and wait." The long patience, the readiness to do if called, the meekness forced upon one at being always passed over—these must shelter one from the charge of waste. The joy at seeing others do, takes the place of feverish desires for self. One grows content to glean where others bear the sheaves, if only the harvest be somehow gathered in.'"

No one will find The Wild Birds of Killeevy tedious, and no one, we think, will fail to recognise in it an elevating and purifying influence.

MR. AUSTIN DOBSON'S FIELDING.*

THE biographer of Fielding labours under one fatal disadvantage; he has very little to say about his hero. The novelist's reputation was far from being wholly posthumous. He won considerable fame in his life-time,—enough, indeed, to make Richardson exceedingly jealous and uncomfortable. The author of Pamela never forgot Joseph Andrews, and he pretended that he could not find leisure to read Tom Jones. It was apparently too immoral a book for the creator of Lovelace and Mr. B., and so he asked Aaron Hill's daughters, Astræa and Minerva, to read it for him. Their opinion was, on the whole, highly favourable, and probably would have been more so had they not been writing to Fielding's rival; but they add that "it seems wanton than it was meant to be," and has "bold, shocking pictures." Other ladies of the time passed a similar judgment on Tom Jones, which was not ostracised on account of its grossness, but, like Clarissa Harlowe, gained admission into families, and appears to have been universally read. The correspondence between Hill's daughters and Richardson on the principal novel of the century has never hitherto been made public, and is printed from letters in the Forster Collection at South Kensington. This is not the only instance in which Mr. Dobson has lighted on fresh matter, and his new facts, although not separately of much value, are of use in sweeping away false impressions of a man who has hitherto been the victim of careless misrepresentations. He has been able to give the date and place of Fielding's second marriage, and the baptismal dates of all the children by that marriage, except the eldest; to show that the novelist received £183 11s. for Joseph Andrews; and to prove for the first time in a biography of Fielding—though the discovery is due to Mr. Latreille—that the story of his having a booth at Bartholomew Fair is entirely false, the part of strolling player at the Fair having been undertaken by a publican named Fielding, whose Christian name was Timothy. Here, too, appears a burlesque "Author's Will," published in the Universal Spectator, which, according to Mr. Dobson, "seems to have hitherto escaped inquiry," and refers in all probability to Fielding in his early play-writing days.

* The Wild Birds of Killeevy. By Rosa Mulholland. London: Burns and Oates.

* English Men of Letters: Fielding. By Austin Dobson. London: Macmillan and Co. 1883.

Possibly the general impression of the novelist will be changed by this monograph, although the work done by the writer is chiefly negative in character. He shows us what Fielding was not, rather than what he was; and being gravelled for lack of matter, is forced to eke out his pages with abundant criticism. Following in the footsteps of Mr. Keightley, he has corrected several errors of earlier biographers. But in spite of all research, the life of Fielding forms in considerable measure a narrative of conjectures. These conjectures begin with his boyhood. We do not know when he went to Eton, what he did there, or at what age he left the school. Then there follows a love-affair with a Miss Andrew, date unknown, which does contain a fact or two characteristic of Fielding's youthful impetuosity, namely, that the young lady's guardian went in fear of his life, and that his charge was transferred to another guardian in South Devon, and promptly married. The future author of Tom Jones is supposed to have studied at Leyden; he married Miss Cradock early, but the year is assumed and not proven, and the history of the marriage comes to us from Arthur Murphy, whose essay, in Mr. Dobson's judgment, is misleading in its facts, and who in this instance, according to Mr. Keightley, has produced a "mere tissue of error and inconsistency." When, after his misadventures and comparative failure as a playwright, he became a student of the Middle Temple, Fielding was in his thirty-first year, and had a wife and, probably, a daughter depending on him for support. "Nothing," says Mr. Dobson, "is known with certainty respecting his life at this period," and we cannot say whether he was living alone in chambers, or whether his wife was with him, neither do we know how he obtained the means of livelihood. Two years after his admission to the Middle Temple, Fielding started the Champion, and his essays in that paper may be read in the recent edition of his works published by Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. They contain little of significance, and do not give their author a place among the British essayists. Mr. Leslie Stephen says truly that his performances in this line "can scarcely be reckoned on the same level with Johnson's, or even Goldsmith's, to say nothing of Steele and Addison." We should be inclined to say, on the other hand, that Fielding's essays are infinitely below the level of Goldsmith's or Johnson's; and that Mr. Dobson thinks so is evident, for not one of them appears in his selection of eighteenth-century essays.

In the month of June, 1740, Fielding was called to the Bar, and it is conjectured that he applied himself steadily to the practice of his profession, "if, indeed," as Mr. Dobson adds, "that weary hope deferred which forms the usual probation of legal preferment can properly be so described." He travelled the Western Circuit, but his briefs, if he had any, did not deprive him of leisure. The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews and of his Friend Mr. Abraham Adams appeared in February of the year following, and must have been rapidly written, for Pamela, to which the novel owes its inspiration, had only been in print two months. That once famous story is, in the judgment of most modern readers, immoral in conception, and in execution by no means free from indelicacy. Yet this was not the impression of Richardson's contemporaries, and the author professed, no doubt with sincerity, to have written the book "in order to cultivate the principles of virtue and religion in the minds of the youth of both sexes." This was not Fielding's design in his travesty, and yet his novel, despite some gross scenes, is the wholesomer book of the two. In point of genius, too, it stands on a higher level, and has added at least one immortal character to the literature of fiction. Parson Adams, like his successor and younger brother, Dr. Primrose, may be called an eighteenth-century worthy, and is as much alive as any character of Shakespeare's. We laugh at Mr. Abraham and his eccentricities, but never lose our respect for him. Truly does Mr. Dobson say:—

"If he is not the real character of the book, he is undoubtedly the character whose fortunes the reader follows with the closest interest. Whether he is smoking his black and consolatory pipe in the gallery of the inn, or losing his way while he dreams over a passage of Greek, or groaning over the fatuities of the men of fashion in Leonora's story, or brandishing his famous crabstick in defence of Fanny, he is always the same delightful mixture of benevolence and simplicity, of pedantry and credulity and ignorance of the world. . . . Not all the discipline of hog's blood and cudgels and cold water to which he is subjected can deprive him of his native dignity; and as he stands before us in the short great-coat, under which his ragged cassock is continually making its appearance, with his old wig and battered hat, a clergyman whose social position is scarcely above that of a footman, and who supports a wife and six children upon a cure of twenty-three pounds a year, which his out-spoken honesty is continually jeopardising, he is a far finer figure than Pamela in her coach and six, or Bellarmine in his cinnamon velvet."

Joseph Andrews was not at first so successful as Pamela, and Gray, the first critic of the age, expresses no enthusiasm for the story; yet he allows that the characters have a great deal of nature, and that Parson Adams and Mrs. Slipslop are "perfectly well." Pope may have read Joseph Andrews, which was published two years before his death, and as to Fielding's relations to Pope, we are left again very much to conjecture. There had been a little sparring between them in earlier years, but the novelist had since praised the poet generously, and Mr. Dobson judges upon good ground that the attempt made to connect Fielding with the controversy that arose out of Cibber's famous letter to Pope was simply ridiculous.

The biographer comments pretty fully on the novelist's three volumes of miscellanies, and transcribes some forcible passages from A Journey from this World to the Next, which appeared in the second volume. One of these passages is the meeting with Virgil, Addison, and Steele; in another Shakespeare comes upon the scene, and "foreseeing future commentators and the 'New Shakespeare Society,' declines to enlighten Betterton and Booth as to a disputed passage in his works, adding, 'I marvel nothing so much as that men will gird themselves at discovering obscure beauties in an author. Certes, the greatest and most frequent beauties are ever the plainest and most evidently striking, and when two meanings of a passage can in the least balance our judgments which to prefer, I hold it matter of unquestionable certainty that neither is worth a farthing.'" This straightforward opinion is characteristic of Fielding, and is not without pertinency in the present day, when the plain meanings of some poets are made abstruse by their commentators, and when a profound purpose is frequently discovered in the most careless phrase of a Shakespeare or a Browning.

The Miscellanies appeared in 1743, Tom Jones in 1749, and the author's personal history in the interval between those dates is "exceedingly obscure." It is probable that his wife died towards the close of 1743, and Mr. Dobson is "inclined to suspect" that this was the most trying period of his career. He was troubled with gout, and it is probable that his married life was one of continual shifts and privations. As we all know, Fielding never understood "the great bread-and-butter question;" and his reckless generosity, when he had a few pounds to spare, left him always in difficulties. He was one of those men whom it is impossible to help. With him, the sensibility of the moment outweighed all sense of prudence and of justice. "Once, so runs the legend, Andrew Miller made him an advance to meet the claims of an unfortunate tax-gatherer. Carrying it home, he met a friend in even worse straits than his own, and the money changed hands. When the tax-gatherer arrived, there was nothing but the answer,—'Friendship has called for the money, and had it; let the collector call again.' Justice, it is needless to say, was satisfied by a second advance from the bookseller. But who shall condemn the man of whom such a story can be told?" Mr. Dobson asks the question, and the answer is that Fielding's impulsive virtue is very nearly allied to vice. He was something better than a reckless spendthrift. He had qualities deserving of warm praise, both as a man and as a citizen, but his impetuosity and extravagance, his incapacity to see the difference between what was pleasant to his feelings and what was just to others, not only brought trouble on himself, but, what was of more importance, upon the woman dearest to him and upon the children dear to them both. Steele acted in the same way, and suffered the same consequences; and if we praise Oliver Goldsmith for his charity to the fallen and to the poor—and such tenderness of nature always claims our sympathy—we ought not to forget that others suffered from his sincere but careless kindness, and that he died two thousand pounds in debt.

The paucity of biographical information about Fielding forces Mr. Dobson, as we have said already, to play the part of a critic; and this, no doubt, he does, on the whole, admirably. He treats too lightly, perhaps, the faults of Tom Jones, but admits that "one of the wisest and wittiest books ever written cannot, without hesitation, be now placed in the hands of women or very young people." The truth is, as Mr. Stephen has pointed out, Fielding's moral standard is far from elevated. His heroes are not only unheroic, they are ignoble. Booth is contemptible, and Tom Jones has the vices of a coarse man and the virtues of a common-place one. He is free from hypocrisy, it is true, and is so far manly, but the absence of one vice which he hated is no apology for the sins he "had a mind to." Fielding as a novelist stands at the head of our fiction in the eighteenth century. In spite of Scott and Jane Austen, of George Eliot and Thackeray, he is still one of our greatest novelists, and might be one of the most popular, had not the grossness of his pictures banished him from "the best society in the world." He was apparently unconscious of this grossness, and that his purpose in the main was moral need not be questioned; but the grain of his mind was of a coarse texture. "Poor Fielding," as his biographers and critics love to call him, is not to be classed with men who have few redeeming qualities. He had many, both as an author and a citizen. Every one who has read Tom Jones would like to endorse in its fulness the genial criticism of Coleridge, and if he cannot do this, he will prefer the broadish humour of the tale to the "hot, day-dreamy sentimentality" of Richardson. As a man, too, Fielding sinned and suffered; but as a magistrate and philanthropist, his conduct, if not always wise, gave evidence throughout of a generous, self-denying nature. In a good case he was not the man to shirk labour, and his free and cheerful spirit in spite of pain and poverty and disease, his love of children, and his charity in judgment should not be forgotten, either by moralist or critic. Mr. Dobson's narrative is, we think, more painstaking than attractive. He has set right, or tried to set right, a number of trifling details; but he is conscious throughout that his hold upon the subject is uncertain, possibilities and probabilities having often to be substituted for facts. This is no fault of the writer, but it makes the story bald. Why the passages extracted from Fielding's works should be copied in the original form, every noun being, as in German, printed with a capital, we are at a loss to understand. Happily, no such folly is committed in the principal editions of the novels. Neither is Mr. Dobson always consistent in the practice, some extracts being printed after the modern fashion.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Temptation of Christ. By George S. Barrett, B.A. (Macniven and Wallace.)—It is not easy for a preacher to say anything about the Temptation the substance of which may not be found in Mr. Maurice's admirable sermons on that subject. Still, this volume has a value and a place of its own. We must own that we have not found much profit in the discussion on what is theologically called the "impeccability" of Christ. We can understand something of the intense suffering which the contact with evil must have caused to him, a point on which Mr. Maurice dwells with great force, but beyond this we can hardly go. It is in the application of the lessons of the Temptation to human life that we find the chief excellence of these sermons. The eighth and tenth of their number, entitled "The Life of Temptation" and "Christ's Victory the Pledge and Power of Our Victory over Sin," strike us as being particularly forcible. The writer does not wholly escape the danger which always besets those who write monographs of this kind. What he says about the passage in St. Mark, "He was with the wild beasts," strikes us as being highly fanciful. Is there any need to think of it as anything else but one of the Evangelist's picturesque expressions? Surely the imagination of "a fierce and bloodthirsty crew of wild beasts of prey, each one intent on his destruction," is not even true to the circumstances of the scene? But the volume generally is characterised by sound sense, as well as by liberality of view.

The Life of Sir William Logan. By Bernard J. Harrington, B.A. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Sir W. Logan was a Scotchman of Canadian birth. His father sent him to be educated at Edinburgh, where he became dus at the High School under James Pillans, who was then rector. (It is interesting to learn, by the way, that the rector's class consisted of 200, the third class of 130, and the first, or lowest, of 200; there must have been a fine field here for the survival of the fittest.) He distinguished himself again at the University, but left it, to follow commerce; and commerce again he abandoned, when the time came that made it possible, for geological science. His first introduction to this, the business of his life, was the being set to superintend some smelting operations in Wales. He made a survey of the country which attracted the favourable attention of persons qualified to judge. But the work to which his best years and energies were given was the geological survey of Canada, a "herculean task," as Professor Sedgwick called it, which he did not, indeed, live to finish, but with which his name is indissolubly connected. He was exactly the man for the work. Enthusiastic in temper, robust in constitution, and placed by circumstances above the suspicion of personal ends, he conciliated the support which was wanted, and then carried out the plans with admirable energy. The anecdote of how he spent a night in the woods, without food or tobacco (indeed, he never smoked), in the midst of a thunderstorm, perfectly content because he had discovered what he wanted to know, and was seen next morning "emerging from the bush, hammer in hand, occasionally pounding a rock as he advanced," is curiously characteristic of the man. No small physical gifts were wanted for the doing of such work as this. It is satisfactory to find that both Canada and England appreciated the man who possessed them. Sir W. Logan died in 1875, being then in his seventy-eighth year.

On Foreign Soil. By the Author of "Amigo's Little Girl." 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—Why this story should have this title, it is not easy to say, as the scene, during the greater part of it, is laid in England. However, there is abundance of German and French scattered about the pages, and once, but not very happily, in "facilis decensus Averni," the author ventures into Latin. The story is of the feeblest kind. The hero begins with high hopes of making proclivities, so that his uncle, a Mr. Schopenhauer, and gives up all belief in a convert of him. He ~~gives~~ ^{gives} him up. Then an admirable clergyman, whom we should call a Broad Churchman, if he did not disclaim the title, restores to him his faith, and ultimately his love. Meanwhile, he loses his property, an unknown heir suddenly appearing. This episode in his career, however, seems to the author hardly worth relating; and she dismisses it in a few pages, holding out the hope that as the new possessor is in bad health and childless, he will soon recover the estate. We really can say nothing in praise of On Foreign Soil, except that the author has an excellent purpose, and has apparently read and thought about topics of serious interest. Literary skill, or any power of telling a story or drawing character, we cannot discover.—The Signora. By Captain E. Lyon. 3 vols. (Remington and Co.)—Captain Lyon has possibly a clear idea of the story of his novel; few of his readers, we venture to affirm, will be able to say as much of themselves, when they have got through these volumes. The first four chapters describe events in England, events of the most confusing kind. Chapter the fifth takes us to Genoa. Then we are carried back to England. And so we have change after change. After a very considerable experience, we can safely say that this is the most puzzling story that we have ever come across. Unfortunately, it has no such charm of style or fullness of matter as would make a reader spend much time over disentangling the confusion. Above all things, the author must learn to tell his story plainly.

Kate. By Asmodeus. 3 vols. (City of London Publishing Company.)—This is certainly a clever book, though the writer wants practice in his art. The good things—and the career of Marissa, the too ingenious and ambitious hero, and the sayings and doings of the municipal authorities, are particularly good—do not make up a good story. There is much, too, that is certainly not good. Not even the ultimate reformation of Delamoor, and the satisfaction of seeing how the germ of something good can be made to grow even in a roué, can reconcile us to this introduction of his character. We found also the incidents of third-rate sporting life very tedious. These and his disagreeable characters the author introduces with an excellent purpose; but he has hardly sufficient skill at present to deal with them satisfactorily. That there is much promise in the book, however, is evident.

Sacred Scriptures of the World. By the Rev. Martin K. Schermerhorn, M.A. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.)—Mr. Schermerhorn has here "compiled, edited, and in part retranslated" "selections from the most devotional and ethical portions of the ancient Hebrew and Christian Scriptures," adding "kindred selections from other ancient Scriptures of the world." There is a certain magnitude about this scheme which baffles us. The present writer cannot pretend to reach the commanding position which the author has reached, and from which he surveys all the religions of the past and present. We must content ourselves with such description of it as we have quoted from the title-page, and with saying that the book is a handsome volume of more than four hundred large-octavo pages.

Good Samaritans. By W. Davenport Adams. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—We have no wish to deal unkindly with Mr. Adams, whose name as an industrious worker in literature has been familiar to us for many years. Still, we must say plainly that he has not fulfilled, in respect to the volume now before us, his duty to the public and to the author to whom he has had recourse. "I put forward this volume," he says, "as avowedly a compilation only." "I am indebted to a considerable number of authorities." Every chapter should have been furnished with a list of these authorities, and everything borrowed should have been acknowledged in the usual way as a quotation. If Mr. Adams will neglect these main requirements of literary duty, he must not be surprised, however excellent his intentions, to have some hard words used to him.

A Year in the Andes. By Mrs. Rosa Carnegie-Williams. (London Literary Society.)—Mrs. Carnegie-Williams's "year" was really very much less, as she reached Bogota, her place of residence, on September 23rd, and left it again on June 15th. For this reason, probably, she shortens her narrative, and gives seventy-three pages out of a total of two hundred and seventy to her journey out, and fifty to her journey back. We do not know that there is any particular reason to complain of this, except that the voyage from Southampton to the South-American coast has been described quite often enough. The pictures of scenery and life are fresher, and make the book sufficiently readable. The grammar admits of being improved. Some one, we read, "sent we two Señoras some melon and claret;" and there is a tendency to use a familiar kind of false antithesis. Why should it be said of a man described as "very intelligent, that although buried, as it were, alive in a certain place," "he is anxious to know the news, and very glad to receive a newspaper?" What natural?

Tyrants.—Or, the Secret Society. By C. L. Johnstone. (Tinsley Brothers.)—This belongs to a class which is numerously represented just now, of the works of fiction concerning which one wonders profoundly how any man ever had the idea of writing them, or imagined that they could live. It is childish in style, and the matter is a compound of guide-book, descriptive of countries and cities, with the wildest and silliest fabrications of the scare-makers to whom the International and Nihilism furnish congenial material.

Half-Hours with Some Famous Ambassadors. By George Barnett Smith. (T. Fisher Unwin.)—We are bound to say that there is more of book-making than of literary work about this volume. Mr. Barnett Smith does not seem to have gone to original sources, but to have contented himself with easily-accessible books. There are documents in our State Paper Office, at Simancas and elsewhere, which might make some really good "half-hours" with ambassadors, famous or other. This we do not find. The book does not even give what is promised. The ambassadors, in the first place, are not all "famous." Even when they are famous, we do not hear much about them in their character of ambassadors. Sir R. M. Keith may or may not have deserved the title; but the first chapter is really the story of Queen Caroline Matilda of Denmark. We have three pages about Keith, with some quite common-place details. Then the writer quietly says:—"Place aux dames! Having traced the career of Colonel Keith to his settlement at that Court, when he was to reap his greatest diplomatic laurels, we now come to the history of that unfortunate Queen, &c." Keith is mentioned again more than once, but always in a subordinate way. As for any particulars of a diplomatic contest, which, of course, took place, there is but little indeed. Talleyrand, the subject of the next article, was undoubtedly famous; but we hear little of him as ambassador. The familiar incidents, the well-worn anecdotes reappear, but of his diplomatic career we have no satisfactory account. The articles on Gondomar and Metternich are more to the point. That on the Chevalier d'Eon is out of place, and so is that on Lord Malmesbury, which is really a repetition of the miserable story of Queen Caroline of Brunswick.

The Bible: its Revelation, Inspiration, and Evidence. By the Rev. John Robson, D.D. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Dr. Robson takes, on the whole, a conservative line. He does not accept the division of Isaiah, a view which has for it a considerable weight of opinion, and he also holds to the Mosaic or, anyhow, the early origin of Deuteronomy. This makes his views on inspiration the more interesting, and inspiration is certainly the most urgent question of modern controversy. Till that finds an adequate answer, it seems impossible to meet with any success the attacks of scepticism. Dr. Robson draws a distinction between the Mahommedan and Christian views. The mechanical or scribe theory is the theory of Mahommedanism. The Koran was written, think the devotees of Islam, by Mahommed, as by the pen of Allah. The advocates of verbal inspiration among us hold the same view. Dr. Robson draws out what he considers to be the distinguishing Christian theory with much ability. Here are passages from his argument:—

"Hence we may expect to find in the writers of the Bible an individuality as complete as in any profane writers. We may expect to see the influence of race and culture. The characteristics of the nation will appear as well as the characteristics of the individual; the science of the age and the errors of the age may impress themselves on their writings; nor need we suppose that the historical references even, which they may make, rest on any other basis than the records of the nation or the teaching of their schools. Inspiration gives knowledge and power in a sphere to which ordinary human faculties do not extend—the sphere of divine purpose and will; but it leaves those whom it has instructed to communicate their message after their own fashion. . . . He [Moses] had nothing but the science or tradition of his time; these were the facts with which his inspiration had to deal. And how would inspiration deal with them? It gave him insight, but insight into what? not into science, but into the existence of God, his purpose, his will for man's life, conduct, and salvation. This was the great purpose of all God's revelation; and the inspiration of the Bible deals with the facts of nature and history only in so far as they affect these. Now, the purpose of the narrative of creation is to show that the world originated from God, that He is its Creator, and that He prepared it for man's abode. That is the revelation which Moses' inspiration enabled him to see in the cosmogonies of his time, and it is all we need lay stress upon. Let those who choose, by all means try to reconcile geology with the first chapter of Genesis; but let them do it as an attempt to reconcile modern with primitive science. To call it reconciling Science with Revelation, utterly misapprehends Revelation. To call the discrepancies between geology and the first chapter of Genesis proofs that it is not inspired, is equally wide of the mark. Its cosmogony was the cosmogony of the age and country, and was known to the Israelites before it was written by the inspired penman. His inspiration was not given him to instruct him in those facts. There are indeed some things in the chapter which might make us believe that his inspiration did extend even into this sphere. Its marvellous harmony with the great epochs of the development of life on the globe, as discovered by modern science, so great that it might be accepted as a poetic rendering of them, seems almost to indicate that the power which gave insight into spiritual facts gave insight also into those facts of nature with which modern science deals. But these were not the truths which the Israelites learned from inspiration. The truth they learned from it was that God, who had created the earth, who had prepared it for man's abode, who had first placed man upon it, was their God, who had given them his law, who required their service, who would reward them for obedience and chastise them for rebellion.

But the whole of these visions deserve careful study.

The Religions of the Ancient World. By George Rawlinson, M.A. (Religious Tract Society.)—These eight chapters, founded on lectures which the author delivered from the Camden Chair of Ancient History in Oxford, form an admirable résumé of the whole subject. We may note in the chapter on "The Religion of the Ancient Egyptians" some valuable remarks on the so-called Egyptian Trinity. "It is true," he writes, "that they had a fancy for triads, but a triad is not a trinity. The triads are not groups of persons, but of attributes; the three are not coequal, but distinctly the reverse, the third in the triad being always subordinate; nor is the division regarded as in any case exhaustive of the divine nature, or exclusive of other divisions. Moreover, as already observed, the triad is frequently enlarged by the addition of a fourth person or character, who is associated as closely with the other three as they are with each other. Cudworth's view must, therefore, be set aside as wholly imaginary." The chapter on "The Religion of the Ancient Romans" may be commended as especially useful to those who are following the common line of study.

We have received:—The twenty-ninth issue of the concise and useful abridgments of the Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and House of Commons, edited by E. Walford, M.A., and published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus.—A new edition of Sir Bernard Burke's Dormant, Abeyant, Forfeited, and Extinct Peerages of the British Empire. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

LORD HARTINGTON broke silence on Thursday in a speech which we have criticised elsewhere, but of which we may say here that two-thirds of it were excellent, and the other third most injudicious. The two-thirds were devoted virtually to the condition of Parliament and our relations with France, and on both Lord Hartington was most wise. As regards the former, he pointed out that although useful legislation had been accomplished, it had been only accomplished with most unnecessary friction, labour, and wear-and-tear, and that most of it was of a non-political kind. Political legislation would "sooner or later" be inevitable, and it was then that the Closure would be tested, and that the necessity for maintaining the character of the House which has absorbed all governing power would be most strongly felt. Upon this subject Lord Hartington evidently spoke from the most fervid and immovable conviction. He recurred to it again and again, and adjured his audience to press it upon their representatives. He then turned to the relations of this country and France, and acknowledged in eloquent terms the immense difficulty which French statesmen, with so many troubles pressing on them, feel "in arriving at a calm and temperate settlement" of troubles such as have arisen in Madagascar. Nevertheless, he intimated such troubles exist, and are not terminated by Mr. Shaw's release. They are, too, of some moment, for though he called them "unimportant," he congratulated himself and his hearers that Parliament was not sitting to embarrass their settlement.

It was on Egypt that Lord Hartington, as usual, went wrong. We hardly understand the provocation which induced him once more to suggest a date for the evacuation, but he did it. We have quoted his words elsewhere, but the drift of them was that our mission in Egypt was only to restore good government, that the mechanism was advancing rapidly, and that the Khedive could, if he were wise, enable the British either to evacuate Egypt, or greatly to reduce the occupying force, before the reassembling of Parliament. As it is certain that the Khedive neither will nor can remedy the main evils of his country by that time, the object of this statement is doubtful, but it will be understood on the Continent and in Egypt itself to mean that by February her Majesty's Government wish the occupation to cease, and intend that it should. That conviction must paralyse everybody engaged in the work, from the Khedive, whose throne will be in danger, to the Europeans, who will fear for their lives, and the Ministers, who will see no good in conciliating temporary sojourners in the land. Station-masters might as well offer to obey passengers by the express. Verily, the East will this time have an excuse for its most permanent sentiment, "the patient, deep disdain" of which Mr. Arnold sings.

The Comte de Chambord was buried at Göritz on Monday, amid a crowd of French Legitimists, numbering, it is said, 2,000. The Comte de Paris was, however, not there, nor any of his family. The Comtesse de Chambord, a childless woman of high Conservative ideas, has all her life hated the Orleans family, at once as her husband's heirs and his rivals, and she resolved to give an open proof of her feeling. She signified that she could not allow the Comte to be chief mourner at the funeral. This meant, according to Courtly etiquette, that she would not recognise him as King—for a King must go first at the funeral of one of his own House—and in this sense the Comte de Paris understood it. He at once refused to attend, and, declining an offer made by some leading Legitimists to secure him the first place by force, set off for Gmünden. The Legitimist nobles did not follow him, and this is supposed to indicate that they deserted him, but this is not the case. They owed respect to their late chief, who was in no way responsible for the ill-advised, if natural act of his widow.

There seems to be no doubt that the body of the French Legitimist party, now consisting of a few thousand gentlemen, three-fourths of the Clergy, and perhaps half of the Breton peasantry, regard the Comte de Paris as King. Those present at the funeral, though forbidden by the Austrian authorities to make any demonstration—not, we imagine, out of fear of France, but fear of Prince Bismarck, who distrusts the French Royal family—signed a declaration accepting him as "Head of the House of France," a convenient euphemism for "King." None of the Royalist papers reject him, though the Univers waits to know his sentiments about the Church; and still less does any one acknowledge the only possible rival, Don Carlos, now "eldest" of all the descendants of Hugh Capet. He is regarded as a foreigner, and his claim as a piece of arrogance without historic justification. The Comte de Paris, it is said, fully regards himself as King of France, and, indeed, when complaining, in private conversation, of the insult passed on him at Frohsdorf, called himself so, but he is most anxious to avoid demonstrations which would give the Ministry a pretext for expelling him from France. He desires to remain tranquilly at Eu, his favourite seat, and not to pass the rest of his life in Austria or England holding an unreal Court, with his son, perhaps, to succeed him in his exile.

The French Government will probably leave "Philip VII." alone, but it is not so certain that the Chamber will. A strong antipathy exists there to the Orleanists and their social pretensions, and a deep-seated fear of the Army. It will be argued that all countries expel Pretenders, that "the King" in France will be a focus of discontent, and that so long as he is there, the Army might at any moment proclaim him. Charles II. of England, Louis XVIII., Napoleon I., Napoleon III., all came back to thrones from exile, and one would think it an advantage to keep a Pretender within reach of a policeman, but the Republican majority will not think so. They will not be able to bear the malaise of perpetually expecting a military plot with its centre at Eu, and will prefer the imputation of violence. M. Ferry, it is evident, thinks the Chamber will not be tranquil, and we fully expect to hear of a formal demand for the expulsion of "the King." Whether the Orleans family will be included is more doubtful. The Comte de Paris was allowed to remain when he was heir to the Comte de Chambord, and it will be hard to expel his kinsfolk because he has become head of his house. The anxiety to be rid of the Duc d'Aumale may, however, make the majority illogical, as well as unjust.

The danger of a war between France and China has greatly increased. The attack on Hué, made without orders, followed by the new treaty extorted from the King, has given new power to the war party at Peking. In that treaty the King is made to concede the sole protectorate over Anam to the French, who are, moreover, permitted permanently to occupy Tonquin. The Chinese are touchy about the protectorate, and absolutely determined not to bear the French in Tonquin within reach of the disaffected province of Yunnan. The Court of Pekin have, therefore, ordered 15,000 regulars to the Tonquin border, who, as the Governor-General of South China remarked on Wednesday to the correspondent of the Standard, "desert" in great numbers to join the Tonquinese or Black Flag army. They have also ordered their Fleet, sixty vessels in all, to Tonquin waters, have collected large supplies of munitions at Shanghai—these are purchased in San Francisco—and have, finally, given such a cue to their Ambassadors and principal Governors that they all say the Franco-Anamite Treaty means war. All this may be bounce, but it looks very like earnest, and the Chinese mob thinks so, and is getting furious.

On the other side, the French Ministers show no signs of retreating. They have ordered Admiral Meyer and the Fleet in Chinese waters to go up to Canton as a naval demonstration, apparently as evidence that they are in earnest. They have despatched 1,000 men to Tonquin, and are collecting from the Marines, the Foreign Legion, and the forces in Algeria, 4,000 more to be sent to the same destination. They profess still to disbelieve that China will fight, and perhaps regard the whole affair as a game of brag. They are, in fact, committing themselves to war, if China resists, by every day's proceedings; and if the issue depended solely on them, hostilities could not be avoided. Fortunately, Lord Granville, who does not want endless trouble with a blockade of the Treaty Ports, is holding back China, and the French people remain, as the Americans say, "to be heard from." It is nearly impossible to believe that they will permit the Government to drag them into a considerable war on the other side of the world, in order to seize Tonquin, when they can have the rest of Anam without war.

Lord Derby on Thursday made a very sensible and in one way bold speech, at the Manchester and Liverpool Agricultural Show. He doubted if there was much reality in the cry for peasant-proprietary, for if there were, companies could easily buy large estates and sell them to the smaller applicants. He thought, however, that security for tenants was only just, though he doubted the expediency of going much further than the Agricultural Holdings Act. If the Irish system were adopted, the landlord would become a rent-chargeholder, and would spend nothing on the improvement of his property, which in England would be a great loss to agriculture. Still, "if farmers, as a body, were to ask for fixity of tenure, he believed they would get it, because no power could resist them;" but he did not think the farmers really desired it. Many Peers, we suspect, will consider Lord Derby's admission injudicious; but it is strictly in accordance with the fact. It would be practically impossible to resist such a demand, with all the County Members voting for it, all the Irish Members, and at least half the Members for great towns. It is not, however, likely to be made. The English farmer does not want to tie his son to the soil, or to deprive himself of the chance of trying a new farm, or to be compelled to hold on through such a cycle of bad harvests as the one just ended.

Prince Bismarck has given France a third, and, it is to be hoped, a final lecture. In an article of the 4th inst. in the North-German Gazette, obviously inspired, France is informed that the reason of German hostility is solely the French refusal to consider the Treaty ceding Alsace-Lorraine as of perpetual obligation. "We only demand of France unreserved recognition of the state of things now created by the justice of history and by treaties, in order to be able to continue on a permanent footing of friendly relations with her." Germany will adhere to the existing arrangement, "to the last man." For the rest, "whosoever the French nation may cast its eyes in order to extend the sphere of its influence, it will never be met by German rivalry"; and, indeed, French foreign policy has already since the peace obtained results which may flatter the pride of France, "as well as gratify those who have her material interests at heart." "Why cannot everybody keep the Tenth Commandment," said the millionaire, after dinner, "as I do?" Prince Bismarck, indeed, goes further than the millionaire, for he tells his adversary,—"I am content; therefore covet anything you please anywhere, provided it is not mine. Covetousness of my property leads to chaos and universal war." The Prince has played many rôles in his time, but we should not have fancied that the part of Pecksniff would have attracted him at all.

The Emperor of Austria has discovered, as we expected, that discontent in Croatia is serious, but has for the present sided with the Magyars. He has sent back Tisza, the Hungarian Premier, to Pesth, with assurances of his full confidence, and has accepted the resignation of the Slavonian Ban of Croatia. He is not to be replaced for the present. In his stead, General Ramberg has been appointed Royal Commissioner, with virtually unlimited powers, and especial orders to restore the Hungarian arms which were pulled down in Agram. The General will restore order, of course, in the capital; but military force is sorely taxed to cope with an agrarian movement, and the Croatian riots are in great part agrarian. The peasantry in large bodies are attacking the landlords, and plundering their houses. This discontent of the peasantry is showing itself all over Hungary, and is a rebellion against wretchedness, intensified by a feeling that the better classes are of a different race and language. In the most serious outbreak of the kind which the Emperor has had to face—that of the Gallician peasants in 1848—the Government went with the masses; but they fear the Hungarians, who are very determined, who possess a militia, and who might make common cause with the Germans against the dreaded Slavs.

Mr. Chamberlain has addressed a letter to the Battersea Radical Association, which seems to imply that the Government have decided to separate the County Franchise Bill from the Redistribution Bill. He says:—"I have always assumed that the first step in the direction of reform would be the assimilation of the borough and county franchise. Public opinion must ripen considerably before it would be possible for any Government to go further, and the final settlement of the franchise question must of necessity be postponed until there is evidence of a sufficient general agreement on the subject. I believe that the wisest course for all reformers at this moment is to unite on what is immediately practicable." We have always maintained that this would be the wiser course, even at the risk of the Lords insisting that they will not pass a Franchise Bill unaccompanied by Redistribution. Moreover, the rural population have a right to a voice in the Redistribution Bill, which might easily be so drawn as to involve a practical revolution.

The Prince of Bulgaria has issued a Manifesto, confessing virtually that his assumption of absolute power was a mistake, and convoking a grand National Assembly to consider a new Constitution, which will be submitted by a Commission. He has also recalled M. Zankoff, the Liberal leader, exiled two years ago. Two explanations are offered of this change of policy. According to one, the Russian Government has forced it upon the Prince; and according to another, he has been driven into it by anger at the interference and despotism of the Russian Government. The latter is, prima facie, the more probable explanation; but the other is conceivable, if, as we suspect, Prince Alexander is favourable to the Austro-German alliance. In that case, the Russian Government, relying on Slavonic feeling, would prefer a Constitution, which would enable the Assembly to tie the Prince's hands. The struggle between Austria and Russia in the little Courts of the Balkan is becoming exceedingly keen, the States being still unwilling to form a federal alliance which would enable them to defy external interference.

For once, the first account of a calamity proves to be below the truth. In spite of some contradictory statements and some possible exaggerations, it is quite clear that the convulsion in the Straits of Sunda, which on August 25th and some following days alarmed western Java and eastern Sumatra, was of historic magnitude. Sixteen volcanic cones rose in the Straits themselves, making all charts useless and navigation dangerous; the volcanoes, suddenly become active, threw stones so vast that they destroyed the great temple of Boro Buddha (Great Buddha), one of the wonders of the world, built when priests from India were ruling Java; and the tidal waves rolled over entire districts. Even if we distrust the extraordinary and detailed telegram from New York published in the Daily News of Monday—and its geography is certainly vague—the official accounts are sufficient to prove that both in Sumatra and Java entire districts have been submerged, and that the loss of life probably exceeds 100,000. Indeed, matters may be even worse, for the Governor-General has telegraphed that from some of the districts affected, Lampong in particular, he can obtain no information, and a survey must be made before the entire extent of the catastrophe can be realised. It is supposed as yet that among the dead are 800 Europeans, chiefly soldiers, quarry overseers, and minor officials; but there may have been sailing ships in the Straits at the time.

The news from Zululand is not pleasant reading, but we do not know that it directly concerns us. Cetewayo, furious with defeat, and perhaps with the British for giving him bad advice, is rallying his party within the Reserves, and has compelled the Government of Natal to send a few hundred men to the Reserves to watch him, and prevent his making the Reserves a base of invasion. He has been joined by considerable numbers of Zulus, the chiefs opposed to him have collected their men and are marching on him, and it is believed that in a few days we shall hear of a final and most sanguinary battle. The loss of life will be terrible, but the British cannot stop it, and if from the battle some one party emerges completely victorious, there may be order again. Of course, on the spot the whole affair is ascribed to the release of Cetewayo, but before he was released the chiefs had commenced to fight among themselves. Our mistake was not in restoring him, but in restoring him without his full power and his whole territory, and a formal recognition of him as the supreme Chief. Even in Zululand, any authority, however despotic, is preferable to anarchy.

The election for Rutland ended on Friday week in a crushing defeat for the Liberals. The county is very small, and purely agricultural, while most of its landlords are Conservative; but there has been no contest for forty years, the registration has been neglected, and it was fancied that much Liberalism might be latent. Mr. Davenport Handley, a popular landlord, was, therefore, put forward by the Liberals, and approved by the Farmers' Alliance; Mr. J. W. Lowther, a thorough-going Tory, being the Conservative candidate. Mr. Handley, however, received only 194 out of 1,054 votes,—that is, he was beaten by four to one. It is asserted, as usual, that the farmers were coerced, that the agents went round among them, and that they do not believe in the ballot; but the truth is, we fear, that they remain Tory. If the Liberals can convince them of Liberalism, the landlords will be as powerless as they are in the Scotch counties.

The Spaniards appear to be convinced that the recent émeute in Spain, which was put down so easily that the King has now left his dominions for Vienna, was fomented by the French Republicans. They, it is said, found the money which induced the regiments to revolt, and used S. Zorrilla as their instrument. The story is stoutly denied, but both in Italy and Spain the French Republicans have now a double motive for overthrowing the Government. King Humbert has joined the German alliance, and King Alfonso will, it is believed, accede to it before his return. France will then be surrounded, and, as it were, strangled, by enemies whom it is impossible to attack, each link in the chain protecting the other. The only method of breaking the chain is to upset the Monarchy in Spain and Italy, and the French Republicans, therefore, feel that not only their cause, but that of their country, is forwarded by intrigue.

The Chancellors of Berlin and Austria have met by appointment at Salzburg, and have held long conversations, extending over parts of three days. All kinds of rumours are therefore spread, and it is even said that the chances of a French Revolution, and the possible need of combined action against France, have been the subjects of discussion. There is no need, however, of any such violent hypothesis. The allied Powers touch almost every State in Europe, and their attitude towards each must involve an occasional necessity for counsel. The affairs of Austria in the Balkan alone are of endless complexity. She is struggling with Russia in Serbia, Roumania, Montenegro, Bulgaria, and Turkey; all those States are forming new combinations, some of them cemented by marriages, and she can take no step without the consent of Germany. Then there is the reported Spanish offer to join the alliance to be considered, and considered carefully, for if it is accepted, the Spanish Republicans will ally themselves more closely with France. And further, Roumania has asked to be admitted into the alliance. There is ample material for discussion, without imagining that Prince Bismarck sees war either with France or Russia in the near distance.

Marwood, the hangman, is dead of pneumonia, and for some inexplicable reason the occurrence has been treated as an event of public importance. The Times placed a notice of him in its obituary, supposed to be reserved to eminent persons, and the papers, especially in the provinces, have been full of accounts of him, of his kindness, his homeliness, his skill in the management of the long drop, and his industry in his trade of cobbler. We are told that he took to the work voluntarily, that he was very proud of his profession and constantly talked about it, and that he intended to open a museum above his shop, containing all the ropes and relics he had collected at various executions. All this is highly morbid and discreditable. There must be a public hangman, and it is conceivable that he might be a decent man; but the reasons which make it expedient that executions should be private make it also expedient that the operator should be forgotten. Grave-worms are God's creatures, and blameless; but their biographies are not for print.

Nothing can be more right than the advice that Englishmen should take a warmer interest in the West Indian Islands. They are among our oldest possessions, they are perplexed with many problems, and they ask for an attention they do not receive. One argument, however, recently pressed for attending to them is utterly false. We have, it is said, a special responsibility to West Indian Negroes, because in our unwise Liberalism we gave them emancipation. We might as well say that because we relieved the Catholics of the penal laws we owe a special responsibility to Romanists. Emancipation is not a gift, but the cessation of a crime. The State authorised certain noblemen and gentlemen to rob the West Indian labourers of their wages, to sell their services, and to whip them at discretion. Then it ceased to authorise those crimes. That we are specially responsible to the negroes because, for more than a hundred years, we degraded, and plundered, and terrified them, till the race has even yet not regained its morale, may be true; but to say that we are responsible for ceasing to do those things, is to adopt Hebridean morality, in lieu of Christian. In those islands, they had once an idea that if a man saved another from drowning, he was bound to maintain him all his life. He had given life, and life must be sustained.

The Standard, of Friday, has an amusing account of the kea, a variety of green parrot in New Zealand, which has lately been placed under ban by the Legislature. Anybody is to have a shilling who kills a kea. It appears that the bird, which is naturally gaminivorous, a few years ago, during a severe winter, found it impossible to procure food, and haunted the carcass butchers' sheds to eat bits of mutton. It approved the mutton, though mutton is not indigenous to New Zealand, while the kea is, and presently discovered, whether by inductive ratiocination or experience, that sheep were made of it. So it attacked the sheep. Flocks of keas visit the folds at night, settle on the sheep, whose wool gives a bird a fine purchase, and peck and peck till they reach the kidney fat, which they eat, while the poor sheep dies in agony. English dogs also, when they take to sheep-eating, always gorge themselves with the kidney fat, often neglecting the flesh, and killing sheep after sheep for their dainty. The shepherds in New Zealand sometimes lose a sheep a night, and the kea is declared to be as costly a pest as the rabbit. We should have imagined a little tar would have protected the sheep; but how does it happen that the beast when he feels the bird's claws does not roll? Would a breed of sheep which had learned to roll because of the kea survive all other sheep? It ought, on the Darwinian theory.

We confess with pleasure that we have been taken in by Mr. Healy and the Western Mail, and that no Liberal paper has published the rabid nonsense about the Ministry which we quoted last week from the Gloucester Journal. All the stuff about "the hateful and atrocious Gladstone, whom 'twere flattery to call a rascal," appeared, it is true, in its columns and in a leader, but in a form which showed clearly enough the writer's intention. This was to satirise by exaggeration the senseless abuse in which so many Tories occasionally indulge, and to suggest that if such be the Government, what must the people be? The writer has been a little run away with by his own joke; but nobody who read his article as a whole could doubt that it was written with a sincerely Liberal intention, and by one who thought the Tory prophecies of woe more than ridiculous.

LORD HARTINGTON AT SHEFFIELD.

THE Heir-Apparent, while in his father's dominions and with the King still living, rarely says much aloud. He does not want to embarrass, he does not want to be snubbed, and he does not want to reveal himself prematurely. He is quite aware of the fact, which all outsiders forget, that on ascending the throne he will accept a new set of conditions, which will profoundly modify some of his convictions, and all his notions of what is practicable. He will occupy, to begin with, a new position towards all men and towards history, and will be bound by a new set of responsibilities and pledges. Consequently, he, if an able man, withdraws a good deal into himself, and thinks "self-suppression," "reticence," "reserve," and "caution" words of the highest meaning. Lord Hartington is the Heir-Apparent of the Liberal Party, and we are not, therefore, surprised either because he has said little in the past Session, or because he made his speech at Sheffield a little too colourless for his admirers. He intended to say as little as he could, and though he said that little weightily, he succeeded. He hardly alluded to the future, except in the remark that measures which would excite warm political feeling were sooner or later inevitable, and that the full danger of obstruction, and the full necessity of maintaining the character of the House of Commons, would not be felt till then; and even as regards the present, he was reserved and careful. The little he did say was, however, on all subjects but one, excellent. Nothing could be better, for example, than his remarks on that most grave of existing questions, the relations of this country with France,—remarks as important in their tone as in their phraseology. Lord Hartington, it is evident, has no desire to quarrel with France, and still less desire to utilise her troubles; but he is not disposed to assert that she gives no offence, or to refrain from insisting that she should do justice. He thoroughly admits that the very weakness of France, and the multitude of troubles on her hands, increase the difficulty her statesmen find in doing the justice they would easily do in calmer times, but still he insists that it should be done. "It was a mistake to suppose that the arrest of Mr. Shaw was necessarily a ground of quarrel between us and the French Republic, and it would be equally a mistake to suppose that the release of Mr. Shaw has removed the ground of difference between us and our neighbours." In other words, France must explain her agent's conduct at Tamatave a little more satisfactorily. That is the true line to take, and the French Government, if they are wise, will recognise that, as Lord Hartington has taken it as fully as the Foreign Office, the matter deserves their serious attention. It is no Tory and no Radical Chauvinist who is giving them that grave hint. No Englishman thinks without horror of a quarrel with France, and the troubled sense of insecurity it must necessarily involve; but no Englishman is ready to endure insult from France, such as her agents at a distance, who delight to feel their power, are far too ready to offer. The two nations, to remain in amity, must act as courteous equals, and be ready, when they have unwittingly given offence, to make gracious reparation. Otherwise, a sense of bitterness will remain which, on the occurrence of any accident, may produce an explosion. The materials are there, and we respect Lord Hartington for the courage with which he maintained, in a place like Sheffield, where the opinion is specially unpopular,—that in delicate negotiations "the public welfare and advantage do not suffer at all by the suspense of the activity of Parliament." Secrecy is often mere affectation; but, as he said, in difficult affairs the introduction into council of every busybody, every candid friend, and, perhaps, every secret enemy, is not expedient. Concessions are much more easily made, especially by proud men in temporary embarrassment, when the few present are intent on averting, and not on exasperating the difficulties which arise from amour-propre. No one can doubt that many of the questions asked in Parliament by the Parnellites are intended to make peace difficult, or that with the Recess some of the most formidable obstacles in the way of the Foreign Office have disappeared.

It is only upon Egyptian affairs that Lord Hartington partially breaks his reserve, and in his reference to them he has, we think, done mischief. Either he dislikes the experiment we are trying, deeming its success impossible, or he is convinced that the country is impatient of a continued stay in Egypt, for he is never content without reiterating that we are immediately going out of it. He admits as fully as any of his critics the gravity of the task we have to perform there. "It is no light thing to restore authority which has so rudely been shaken, especially when that Government is, regarded from a European point of view, so defective as in many respects the Government of Egypt is. It is no light thing to reconstitute authority which has almost been cast down by armed insurrection, and which has rested and which still rests upon foreign armies of occupation." But, nevertheless, he not only believes that we shall do it, but believes it so strongly that for the second time he fixes dates, and suggests that, "If they are wise, the Khedive and his Government will make good use of the time which lies before them before the British House of Commons again comes together to demand an account of the situation; and will be able to show such a list of reforms accomplished, and guarantees for freedom and order given, as will make it an easy task for us, even in the opinion of the most timid of our critics, greatly to reduce, if not altogether to remove, the Army of Occupation from the soil of Egypt." The form of that remark is conditional, but the immediate impression throughout Europe will be that the British Government desire and intend that the occupation should end by February, and that they will accept the appearance of reform as sufficient reason for departure. If that is their policy, we had much better not have gone to Egypt at all, for we shall be compelled either to go there again, or to witness in silent vexation a régime under which every promise we have made to the people will be violated. And if that is not their policy, then we cannot see the wisdom of telling all men in Egypt that we shall not stay, and so making all Egyptian officials and rebels look forward to a near future when they will no longer feel the restraint imposed by the presence of a civilised Power. Even the Khedive is human, and if he is human, can be in no hurry by advanced legislation to hasten the period when the last sentinel shall depart, and he will be left alone with five million foes.

THE ROYALISTS OF FRANCE.

WE do not believe that the Royalist party in France is dead, or that it will adopt the theory of election, or that it will be broken up by internal dissensions. On the contrary, we believe that the party, such as it is, is a little stronger than it was because of the death of the Comte de Chambord. That event makes the grandson of Louis Philippe, the Prince who calls himself Comte de Paris, King of France, so far as hereditary claim can confer such a title; and in spite of the squabbles at Frohsdorf, which recall those of Versailles under the old régime, and the indecision of newspapers which are not quite independent and are waiting for their cue, it is sufficiently clear both that the Comte de Paris accepts the position, and that the few convinced Royalists of France accept him. The Comte de Paris is a cautious man, fond of dignified quiet, and indisposed while he can help himself to be driven into exile, during which the management of his party will be very difficult, and the Chamber in a fit of annoyance may sequester the possessions of the family until its members have signed some oath of renunciation. Englishmen, perhaps, think that fear unreal; but the House of Orleans has lost its great fortune twice, French Republicans at once dread and dislike the money-power of their rivals, and the example of Prince Bismarck, who has sequestered the large property of the Guelfs on strictly political grounds, has demoralised the conscience of Continental statesmen. The Comte, therefore, avoids demonstrations as far as possible; but by signing himself "Philippe," by notifying his cousin's decease to the crowned heads—a task which otherwise would have fallen to the nearest relative—by receiving the homage of great Legitimists like the Duke de Rochefoucauld-Bisaccia and General Charette, and above all, by insisting on his right to precedence at the funeral—an absurd claim, unless he attends as King—he has sufficiently announced that he assumes the position occupied by the Comte de Chambord. He will in all probability do nothing in consequence of his claim, and certainly nothing hostile to the Republic; but he makes the claim, and unless we utterly misread the ideas of the party, the Legitimists will acknowledge it. They cannot help themselves. They may not like him personally, but they are bound in the chains of their own theory. He is by that theory King of France, and their duty is not affected either by his character or his opinions, or his grandfather's treachery to his House. A bitter fanatic here and there may pretend to believe that the eldest Bourbon instead of the eldest French Bourbon, is heir to the titular throne, but he will yield when he finds the Pope opposed to him, and for the rank and file no hesitation is so much as possible. Even were the claim of the Comte de Paris unsound, the average Legitimist would not abandon him for the foreigner; and the claim is as sound as history, prescription, and the admission of Henri Cinq can possibly make it. The Comte is, therefore, head of the Royalist party, which henceforward is united, and will be managed by a man of much prudence, sound though borné intelligence, and great acquaintance with the realities of the situation. It will, in fact, be fairly well managed.

The Royalist party is, therefore, stronger for what has happened, and the true question of interest is the extent of its strength. This, though indefinitely below that of the Republicans, is not quite so slight as many writers, uninstructed by the jealousy of the Republican chiefs, choose to assume. In physical strength, the Royalist party is, of course, hopelessly weak. The peasantry of France, who for electoral purposes and purposes of insurrection are almost the nation, have obviously accepted the Republic, which in every local election obtains more and more supporters. The "doubtful" Councils-General have been carried this year in dozens, and within five years, if the Constitution survives and no great catastrophe occurs, the Royalists in the Senate will be as few as they now are in the Chamber; and the Legislature, when sitting for the election of a President, or for a revision of the Constitution, will be unmistakably Republican. The artisans of the cities are not only not Royalists, but are anti-Royalist to such an extent that if monarchy were restored they would have to be held down by military force. The people, therefore, of France may be called Republican, nor is there much chance of the gradual conversion of which we hear so much. If the Comte de Paris waits for that, he will wait long. The peasantry adhere to their opinions. Great masses of men accustomed to self-government do not surrender the right or declare themselves incapable, nor do Frenchmen willingly set privileged classes above themselves. The old belief in the Bourbons and loyalty towards them are dead in most provinces, and dying even in Brittany; and the people, if left to themselves, would, if they wanted a temporary Dictator, choose one within the Republic. A Restoration such as occurred in England, with the consent of the vast majority of the people, is, we believe, impossible. They would dread too much the recurrence of the ancien régime, still regarded with horror. But still, the Comte de Paris is not without his chance. Experience shows that the French people, once defeated, or out of heart, or panic-struck, will allow others temporarily to choose rulers for them. They do not in such moods care to resist, they will not support the defeated Government, and they know—taught as they have been by a century of Revolutions—that they can if they please, when they like, upset any Government they choose. They accepted Louis XVIII. at the hands of foreigners, Louis Philippe at the hands of a few representatives, Louis Napoleon at the hands of the officers, M. Thiers at the hands of the classes dirigeantes, who, after the German victory, found themselves absolute in the Assembly called by M. Thiers. If any great misfortune befell the Republic, such as a visible defeat in the field; if external affairs went wrong enough to produce panic; if the Republic seemed to menace property; if, in the religious conflict, the Republican chiefs affronted the little remainder of religious feeling left in France, the people might, and probably would, let the classes dirigeantes try again; and the classes dirigeantes, the wealthy, the upper bureaucrats, the higher officers, the men of social position, have all a kindness, more or less developed, for the historic monarchy, and for the régime of inequalities which would accompany it, and which would so aggrandise their position. They would turn to the only alternative available—the old Monarchy—and if that were possible, try that. The Comte de Paris makes that possible, and this, and this only, is his chance. It is not a good one by any means. It is so thin, that it hardly deserves attentive consideration, but still it exists, and must be acknowledged by those who try to forecast the immediate future of France. It is so acknowledged by the Republican chiefs, who must know France, and who are even now discussing whether they had not better expel the Bourbon family from their country. They want only, their papers say, a fair excuse. They would not be so jealous, if they saw no chances for the Royalists, even though their jealousy is sharpened, as we fear is the case, by social pretensions which they cannot ignore, and have not the moral strength to despise.

It will be observed that we have left out the third alternative, the acceptance of a Bonaparte, and we have done so deliberately. The chance of the Imperialists may arrive hereafter, but at present they are fettered by a chief as impossible as even the Comte de Chambord. Even if Prince Napoleon resigned or died, the Army alone could or would strike for Prince Victor, and the Army has no motive to do it which would not bring it quite as strongly to the side of the Comte de Paris. In either case the Sovereign could not rule for himself, and the General who would rule would be as powerful and as safe under the King as under an Emperor, and more dignified. Among the people, the Bonapartists no more prosper than the Royalists do, even Corsica at last electing Republicans. This generation has not forgotten Sedan, or the German invasion, or the imprisonment of the French Army, and till it has, any acceptable Pretender with history behind him will be preferred to Napoleon V. The Napoleonic legend may re-cement itself, and there is always the chance in the Bonaparte House of an individual with great personal qualities, or even genius; but for the present, the discontented would turn by preference to "the King," whose acceptance would, at all events, re-cement the history of France, and who could assume power without subjecting himself and his supporters to the dangerous judgment of a plébiscite. That he ever will be in circumstances to assume it, we disbelieve. We look rather to see France, with all careers open as they are now, throw up men with a capacity for governing under Republican forms, and with the direct help of the people; but still, the death of the Comte de Chambord has made of the old Monarchy the most conceivable alternative. We shall be greatly surprised if the Chamber does not think so too, and if on its reassembling the furious majority does not mark its sense of the change which has occurred by demanding the expulsion of a family which has the unfortunate possession of so much history that it can never be forgotten, and can never be treated exactly like any other.

WILL FRANCE FIGHT CHINA?

IT will be time enough to discuss the annoyances which a French invasion of China must produce—and they will be many and considerable,—when war has actually been declared. At present, black as the prospect looks, the biggest Power concerned, the French people, has never been consulted at all. Affairs are in such a condition that if the Governments are left alone war is inevitable, for that of China will not surrender Tonquin, and that of France is moving against Tonquin under a conviction that Peking is only bragging; but the Governments are not the only referees. The French people is master in France. It has given some sort of consent to some sort of action in Tonquin, which it was carefully told would be of no importance; but it has not sanctioned war with China. To us, looking on quietly, without the fixed idea that Great Britain will suffer which so moves some of our contemporaries, it seems next to impossible that the French should give that sanction. As we understand the foreign policy of the French Deputies, they are inclined in small affairs, requiring no heavy loans and involving no serious drafts upon the Army, to let the active politicians in Paris follow their own devices. If the latter see their way to pleasant little acquisitions like Tunis, or North-west Madagascar, or the New Hebrides, without great expense, and by using only the 18,000 men paid for Colonial service, they may make those acquisitions, but the Chamber will give them neither fresh millions nor regiments of the Line for any such purpose. The Deputies will keep their children and their treasure for the great struggle of the future by which they hope to recover their prestige in Europe, and, if it is humanly possible, their lost provinces. It was under this determination that they regulated the descent on Tunis, which otherwise would have ended in an Italian war, and under this that they compelled M. de Freycinet to desert England in the Egyptian expedition. They would undertake nothing large with Prince Bismarck looking on, and with the European struggle still unsettled. That is a perfectly intelligible policy, and one by no means so ignoble as it is sometimes declared to be, and it is certainly the policy of the people. That after deserting an ally, as they did in Egypt, a country which keenly interests them, the French electors should consent to manufacture a war with China merely as an enterprise, is to us still incredible. They are very ignorant, and their Government is very unscrupulous in its statements; but still, sooner or later they must know approximately the truth. They cannot, in the face of Marquis Tseng's warm affirmations and the full information of the English newspapers, be fed with lies for ever. They must hear at last that the invasion of Tonquin means one of two things,—either a long campaign in Tonquin, or a march on the Chinese capital. If French statesmen choose the former, they must conquer a tropical province full of hills and marshes and rivers, defended by a martial population who are reinforced week by week with an endless supply of Chinese soldiers, armed with good Californian rifles, acting from a base supplied with all things, and guided by German and American advisers. If the French are defeated at any point, they will be exterminated; and if they are not defeated, they will hold nothing but the land on which their troops are encamped. The defence of Tonquin can be maintained for two years, and as French conscripts die rapidly, and French Generals will attempt nothing without sufficient force, they will not conquer the province without expending £15,000,000 sterling and 40,000 men. If, on the other hand, the French statesmen strike straight at China, they must march upon Peking, that is, must send 30,000 men at least—the actual number will be greater, for the specialty of French Generals, as we saw in Tunis, is to waste mere conscripts—14,000 miles, forward all supplies except food, including coal for their steamers, maintain their army in a country where they have no foothold, and conquer a capital defended by 100,000 men, who, though not good soldiers, care nothing how many die. They will not do it, even if they succeed, for a smaller expenditure of men or money than the conquest of Tonquin would involve; and when they have done it, will have no compensation except the right to waste a corps d'armées in garrisoning Indo-China. The French cannot colonise, even if they wanted to do so, there is no revenue above expenses to be obtained, and the trade will go, as trade always does go, even in Cochin China, to Englishmen, Germans, and Americans. This is the very best prospect before them, while it is always possible that they may be defeated, and that in carrying on their operations they may incur the active hostility either of the English or the Germans, whom their officers will treat with an arrogance certain sooner or later to be resented. Of course, if the French are willing to undergo these sacrifices and face these risks, and put their whole strength into the task, their road to conquest is open; but in fighting China, they engage in a serious war, precisely of the kind on which since 1870 they have refused to embark. What is the reason for believing that they have changed their minds? We do not believe they have changed them.

We shall be told that French honour is involved; but are the French particularly concerned about honour in such cases? They cannot endure retreat in Europe, and, when forced to yield, display a persistent vindictiveness hardly to be expected from their character; but outside Europe they have always, when necessary, retreated without concern. They gave up their American possessions. They gave up their Indian possessions. They gave up Mexico. They gave up Syria. They gave up Egypt. In none of these cases did the people display any serious resentment, and what is there in Tonquin to excite so much enthusiasm? To avoid a conflict with China is only to do what Russia has done, in spite of much more serious provocation, within the last two years, and this is the only sacrifice the French are called upon to make. Their petty defeat at Hanoi will be amply avenged by the submission of the Court of Huế; while, as to material interests, they acquire the virtual sovereignty of the whole of Lower Anam, and stretch their dominion from Saigon to Tonquin, in an unbroken line, over territories which it will take them years to organise, and which they can extend northward just as far as they choose. The Chinese are perfectly ready to leave them unmolested in Anam; indeed, they not only made that offer to M. Bourrée, but signed a Treaty agreeing to everything, except the renunciation of their nominal suzerainty, which need no more matter to the French Viceroy of Cochin China than it matters to the King of Burmah, the Regent of Nepal, or the Chiefs of the Shan States. The French Chamber will know before it has sat a week that an indemnity can be obtained for the death of Captain Rivière, that their flag will be saluted all through Indo-China, and that they can have all that is worth having in Indo-China without war, if only they will leave Tonquin alone. At the same time, they will know that if they do not leave it, they must accept a long and sanguinary war of the exact kind which the peasantry, the conscripts, and the junior officers most detest, with Prince Bismarck smiling the while at such a waste of force, and with all the world agreeing to disregard France because she is fully occupied. We cannot believe that the Deputies will declare war, or will hesitate, if need be, to sacrifice either M. Challemel-Lacour or the Ferry Ministry to the desire of their constituents for peace. If they will not, then indeed Englishmen will have to consider very gravely the policy of France, which will then be seen to be directed not by the people, but by a governing class full of ambition and of greed; but the contingency has not yet arrived. As we have said, the French people is really, as well as legally, master in France, and the French people has not yet sanctioned a war with China.

THE RUTLAND ELECTION.

IT would be unwise, of course, to exaggerate the meaning of a defeat such as the Liberals suffered in Rutland on Friday week. No seat has been lost, and no Liberal much expected victory. The county is small, it is purely agricultural; and its landlords, with one marked exception, are generally Conservative. It has of late years had no political history, but has returned for election after election Conservatives unopposed. It is, in fact, just the place where the minority has only a fair chance at a General Election, when the voters are really and consciously appointing a Government, instead of merely electing a representative; and consequently, may be carried out of their more selfish selves by high political interest and excitement. Mr. Gladstone's reign would not be cut short by any result of the Rutland by-election, and political passion, therefore, was comparatively shallow. Nevertheless, the election was not so uninteresting as some of our Liberal friends believe. They attach a great deal too much importance to some pleasant arguments which are not sound. They think the coming suffrage will change all things in the rural districts, and forget the great probability that the reform may not arrive for years. It is quite possible that before household suffrage is introduced into the counties, the Lords, who know quite well how dubious even Liberal farmers are about that matter, may force a dissolution, which, even if the Liberals win, may leave Mr. Parnell with the casting voice, and open an endless chapter of accidents. They say the county is sleepy, but there is nothing in its position, almost in the centre of England, to make it sleepier than any other agricultural district. They say it is small, and as a county so it is; but it has 1,700 voters, and it is no smaller than many a district which in a great county holds the balance of power. The representatives for North Lincoln, or North Devon, or even the West Riding, who boast of the size of their electoral areas, would not be pleased to know that within those areas any district equal to Rutland was as hopelessly hostile as Rutland showed itself to Liberalism. They would think it a very dangerous sign indeed if over well-defined spaces within their own boundaries they could not attract the support even of a respectable minority. There is nothing special about Rutland except its long freedom from contests, and the consequent absence of electoral organisation. Everybody voted without being drilled, voted as he pleased, on the spur, so to speak, of the moment,—a fact which, to our thinking, deepens the discouragement of the result for the defeated party. There was neither time nor organisation for trickery, the election was a sort of rush, and the result was that an exceptionally strong Tory, a Lowther—without, we believe, an acre in the county—was returned by a majority of three-fourths. The truth is, that the Liberals are, as regards the strictly rural districts, too sanguine; that everywhere outside the cities they have still work to do, and that all over England there are broad tracts, definable patches of country, where their principles have made no way at all; where the farmers, as a body, do not like them or believe in them, and where but for Dissent or the presence of Whig landlords, or other cause of the same kind, they would be politically nowhere. Everybody who knows the country knows that this is true, and we see no good in concealing it, or denying that it is one of the facts which do no credit either to the intelligence or the energy of Liberal politicians. Their business is to conquer these districts, and they do not do it.

They will tell us next week, in querulous accord, that it is not their fault, that they are powerless against the landlords, and that the landlords are all for the sake of their own interests Conservative; but the explanation is insufficient. We doubt the power attributed to the landlords. That there are landlords and agents here and there strong enough, rich enough, and tyrannical enough to make hostile voting dangerous, is true; but actual coercion has become exceedingly rare, and will henceforward, under the Corrupt Practices Act, be rarer still. In most places now-a-days, the great body of tenants who vote with their landlords do it either because they approve their views, or because they are indifferent, or because they prefer even a fancied selfish interest which is immediate to a political gain which is remote. If they were once convinced on the other side, they would act on their convictions, like any other class; and, in fact, whenever they are moved enough to assert independence they do act independently enough. They know quite well that neither landlords nor agents like perpetual worry for remissions, exemptions, improvements, and the like, but, being sincerely interested in them, they act on their impressions as if neither landlords nor agents had tempers, or could make them felt. The landlords have "influence," of course, just as priests in Ireland have "influence;" but, whenever the tenants are in earnest, the influence of either class is less than nothing. How many tenants can a hated landowner without personal force of character send to the poll anywhere, or how many could the most popular landlord induce to vote for a measure supposed to be certain to send down the value of wheat? Let the Liberal convictions of the farmers be only as strong as their conviction that dear wheat is good for them, and all the coercive influence would crumble into pieces, just as the much stronger coercive influence of the manufacturers crumbles when the "hands" are excited. The thing is no matter of speculation. We all see it occur at every election in Scotland and Wales, where over county after county every magnate moves one way and every tenant the other. What power, or influence, or means of coercion do the landlords of Rutland possess which the landlords of Scotland and Wales do not, or where is the proof that the farmers of Rutland are less sturdy than Scotchmen or Welshmen? The truth is, the Liberals have converted Scotland and Wales, and have not converted Rutland and places like Rutland; and this in part, in great part, is due to the single cause that they have not tried. On the farmers' special grievance, insecurity, the Liberals have recently waked up, and have carried measures which, as farms once more become valuable, will be felt to deserve a gratitude, that, just now, while farming is the most depressing of trades, and whole bodies of tenants can hardly be coaxed to stay on the great estates, is not very fervent or deep-seated. But the standing grievance of the farmers, that Liberals do not feel for them, is not removed. We do not hesitate to say that if any other great industry had endured for two years suffering such as the farmers of arable land have endured for seven—waiting as they have done for the approach of bankruptcy, as slow and as inevitable as the tide—ten speeches of sympathy would have been made by Liberals where one has been directed to the farmers. The cycle of trouble is probably over and a cycle of sunshine come again, but that political effect of the bad time has not ceased to work. And finally, the Liberals have not met the grievance we plead on behalf of the farmers, have not tried heartily to bring home to them what Liberal principles are worth, or what they are. The tenantry are just as capable of comprehending the Liberal creed, if only it were brought home to them, as any other class in the community. But it is not brought home. There are ten teachers of the creed in any medium town for one in a district like Rutland. Every Liberal who speaks there thinks himself bound to talk agriculture, which he very often only half understands, instead of talking Liberalism, which he thoroughly understands, and about which he can speak with the force which comes from sincere conviction. Why should the man who in Birmingham would show that Liberalism did not involve national dishonour, in Rutland begin talking of foot-and-mouth disease? The farmer feels for the national honour as much as any man. The farmers can respond to the larger teaching of Liberalism as well as anybody else, and are only irritated by the perpetual dwelling on special Acts which, as they know quite well, they could have forced a Tory Ministry to pass also. It is in Rutland, and all districts like Rutland, as it was in Liverpool. If we want Liberalism to win, we must show that Liberalism is the better creed; throw the petty questions of the "interests" aside, and teach the voters directly why Liberalism is wise, and Conservatism not. Landlordism, forsooth! Has landlordism in Rutland one-third the power it had in Midlothian, when Mr. Gladstone shattered it without one appeal to the personal interests of the constituency?

THE MEASURE OF JUDICIAL SENTENCES.

ONE of her Majesty's Judges has broken the habitual silence of the Bench, in the face of criticism, by an article in the Nineteenth Century on "Inequality in Punishment." It is put forth by way of answer, indirect rather than direct, to the complaints made, in the Press and else where, of the spasmodic and uneven character of the sentences passed on criminals by Judges of all kinds, from the Lords Justices of Appeal to the village "Beak." Lord Justice Fry does not "investigate the justice or injustice of these complaints." This is just as well, as he would only waste space in proving what is easily established by reading half-a-dozen newspapers while the Assizes are going on. "People will glibly complain of the inequality of two sentences," because there is ample stuff for glibness. There is no use disguising the fact that not only are the sentences passed by two different Judges terribly unequal, but the sentences passed even by the same Judge often exhibit an extraordinary inequality. Lord Justice Fry's answer to the charge is substantially the somewhat official repartee, "If you are not satisfied, try and do it better yourself." But it is couched in the philosophical form of an attempt to determine the measure of punishment, and, by showing the impossibility or difficulty of doing so, in effect to lay down the impossibility or difficulty of saying that one punishment is equal or unequal with another.

The idea of punishment he traces to the idea of the connection between suffering and sin. He refuses to recognise the prevention of future crime by the individual, the prevention of future crimes by other individuals by the deterrent effect of punishment, the reformation of the offender, or the setting right of the wrong done by the offender, as the basis of punishment. He even denies that, except historically, revenge lies at the root of justice. The root-idea in punishment is simply, according to him, the a priori notion naturally implanted in the human breast, which, when it sees sin, at once anticipates suffering, and when it sees suffering, immediately detects sin. We are, therefore, all of us inevitably imbued with the same notions which prompted the Pharisees to impute sin to the man born blind, or his mother, simply because he was blind; and to throw stones at the woman taken in adultery, not because we disapprove of adultery or are without sin ourselves, but because, when we see a sinner, we instantly think he ought to suffer, and if no one else makes him, we will heave half a brick at him, in the name of Justice. It may be remarked that this theory is an excellent explanation of the reason why Justice is blind. People who act on instinct generally act blindly, and in punishing sin Justice acts as blindly and as unerringly as Leech's street-boy, who on seeing the black-cloth-coated lay figure at the shop-door, called out,—"'Ere's a bloated aristocrat; let's punch 'is 'ed!"

Still, there is, no doubt, something in the notion of the inevitable connection between sin and suffering. As Lord Justice Fry reminds us, it forms the basis of the dramas of Æschylus and Sophocles. It is, too, a happy thought of his to connect the reformation theory with the punishment-of-sin theory by the connection between suffering and learning, the πάθος and μᾶθος of the Greek tragedians. But it is to be observed that the explanation is not sufficiently general to be accepted as a real solution. Judges do not, as a matter of fact, punish sin as such. They punish crimes. Now, crimes are not merely sins, looked at from the policeman's point of view, instead of the parson's. Many sins are not crimes; while, on the other hand, many crimes are not sins. Bigamy is a crime, but fornication, which is equally "sinful," is not. On the other hand, planting tobacco in England is a crime, so is killing pheasants without a licence; but neither of these occupations is currently regarded as a sin. The desire to connect sin with suffering is therefore not an adequate basis for justice. Further, the notion of the necessary connection between suffering and sin, though it has an element of truth in it, is yet one which becomes less firmly fixed as education and civilisation advance. It was a distinctive mark of the Teacher who superseded the Pharisees that he derided the idea that those on whom the Tower of Siloam fell were sinners beyond all the dwellers in Galilee. It was a mark of the progress of thought when Euripides traced acts to their consequences in acts, and not to the suffering inflicted by the Gods, or by a blind Nemesis, as his predecessors had done. By discarding revenge, which historically Lord Justice Fry admits is the origin of judicial punishment, and substituting the desire to connect sin with suffering, he is really committing what scholars call a ὑποστρεφόμενον, or, in plain English, he is putting the cart before the horse. The connection between sin and suffering is, in our view, evolved from the desire for revenge. The savage, when his child breaks a basket of eggs, takes him up and breaks his skull against a rock, in revenge. The child, when a chair falls on his foot, kicks and bangs the chair in revenge. The Californian miner or the backwoods settler hangs the horse-stealer, not because he wishes to connect suffering with sin, but because he wants to have his revenge for the loss of his horse, to prevent the man hanged from robbing him again, and to hold out an example to others. But from the instinctive desire to hit when one is hurt, and the experience that other people hit when they are hurt, comes the notion of punishing those who hurt. It is a common-place in jurisprudence and ethics that retaliation is the essence of early justice. The State takes revenge out of private hands, to prevent the disturbance of the State; but it only substitutes a fixed and formal scale of revenge in cold blood, for a hap-hazard revenge in hot blood. The uncivilised man attributed to Nature and to the Gods his own attributes. He knew that when he knocked a man down, he did it because the man had hurt him in some way. He knew that his tribe exacted an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. So when he saw an enemy knocked down by a thunderbolt, he necessarily thought that the man had offended Heaven in some way. If he was poor, and the man struck by lightning rich, he imputed the stroke to vengeance on excessive pride and excessive prosperity. Extended to a wider scale, the tyrant who robbed and murdered often came to a bad end, less often openly and directly because people would tolerate him no longer, than indirectly because his people would not fight, or secretly at the blow of some Heaven-sent avenger, an Ehud or a Charlotte Corday. The extension of the idea of revenge to the visitations of the Gods or of Fortune on men thus gave rise to the idea of offences against the Gods, which were sins, being connected with the misfortunes and suffering which were the Heaven-sent punishment for them; and vice versa, when men saw the punishment, they imputed the sin.

We maintain, then, that historically and philosophically the idea of revenge is the basis of justice. And it is an enduring basis. The popular conscience did not call for the lash for garroters, or for the gallows for the Phoenix Park murderers, because it had any philosophical sense of the fitness of things in connecting the suffering with the sin. It was moved by a feeling of revenge. The fact that the Irish have sympathised with the crime of the murderers, and not with the justice inflicted on them, is a proof of this. Your Irishman may be credited with the same desire to connect sin with suffering as your Englishman, when the sin is against himself; but when the suffering is inflicted on those whom he regards as friends by those whom he regards as foes, the desire for establishing the connection vanishes, and he only sees the hand of the stronger inflicting vengeance on the weaker. The progressive leniency which is exhibited towards political offences is another proof of the same thing. When a political uprising scattered death and famine and violence through the land, and meant a struggle for existence for every one, treason was regarded as the blackest of crimes, and was punished with the most barbarous of punishments. But since the great mass of people have ceased to be affected by political revolutions, and the State is either strong enough to put them down without much trouble, or the revolutionists are strong enough to become the State, political crimes are regarded with comparative indifference, and, therefore, more mildly punished. Revenge, even now, is at the bottom of criminal justice. There is undoubtedly a certain feeling of it lurking in the public mind, which demands satisfaction. It is this feeling which is outraged when crimes are let off too cheaply. When the rich had it all their own way, they were little likely to suffer from personal violence, but they were especially open to attacks on their property. Hence the ferocity with which the latter class of crimes are still pursued, in comparison with the former. Now that the democracy is rising, crimes against the person most affect those on whose feelings ultimately rests the law, and they begin to cry out against the heavy punishments inflicted on an embezzling servant, as compared with the leniency with which the Bench looks on crimes of violence. Their feelings of revenge are directed more against those who make them go in fear of life and limb, than against those who rob others of what the Democracy themselves have not got.

The measure of punishment in the popular point of view, then, is to be gauged partly by the feeling of revenge against particular crimes. This changes from time to time, as one class or another of crimes becomes more formidable to society. Of course, there are other objects of punishment. But in our view, they are secondary. As often happens in the progress of society and civilisation, the secondary aims have a tendency to become more prominent and more immediately important than the primary. Though there is still a feeling of revenge to be satisfied, it is far weaker and far more easily satisfied than of old. Even the feeling of the necessity of terrifying people out of the commission of crimes, the idea of deterrent justice, is becoming weaker. Experience has shown that the violence of a punishment is not necessarily the measure of its protective effect, even when it is in accordance with popular feeling. Moreover, as society has become stronger, it looks less to the immediate than to the permanent springs of action. It aims at prevention rather than cure; or rather, aims at curing the cause, instead of merely removing the effects of the malady. Hence it is that the reformation theory of punishment has been pushed, and will be pushed still more, to the front. In fine, it is with the administration of justice as it is with the feeling of love. Though it is, and must be, based on physical and elementary desires, it is nobler, stronger, and more helpful, the further removed it is from directly-felt dependence on its basis. The more we lose all thought of the foundations in the contemplation of the superstructure, the more the building has attained towards perfection.

The practical result is that there is no impossibility in laying down certain general rules as to the infliction of punishment. It is the business of the Legislature, as more directly than the Judges feeling the force of popular ideas and sympathies, and as being able to deal with the matter in a broader and more scientific spirit, to lay down the relative gravity of crimes, and assess maximum punishments accordingly. It is the business of the Judges to assign punishments within the maximum, according to the circumstances of the individual case. While minds differ opinions will differ about the punishments which a particular case deserves. But already legislation is moving in the direction of laying down more precise rules as to the amount of punishment to be inflicted for different crimes. It has already adopted a different measure in the cases of the casual offender and the habitual criminal, the adult and the juvenile convict. Further progress will have to be made in this direction, and the balance struck between the conflicting claims of the sentiment of revenge, the prevention of crime, and the reformation of the criminal. These are not matters for the individual Judge. He ought only to take into account what are called extenuating or aggravating circumstances. If his discretion were confined within those limits, we should hear fewer complaints of the want of it, and Lord Justice Fry would not have been called on to defend his colleagues of the Bench.

LOCKED-UP HOUSES.

THE Police have lately made a slight concession to the weakness of London householders. They have put out a notice advising them, if they mean to go away for the summer leaving their houses altogether untenanted, to mention the fact to the Superintendent of the district. When this officer knows that a house is thus unguarded, he will give orders to the constable on the beat to keep a more than commonly sharp eye on it. The Police do not guarantee that this watch will be of any avail, and they warn householders not to run the risk which will still be incurred by leaving a house empty, while anything of value remains in it. But they no longer ignore the fact that houses are sometimes left in this way, and the result will probably be to place some slight additional obstacle in the way of the London burglar. In the present year, this notice comes a little late. Indeed, it seems not unlikely that the occurrence of several robberies of empty houses in the suburbs was the immediate cause of its being issued. For a long time the police have insisted on shutting their eyes to the existence of such a phenomenon as an inhabited house left without any one to take care of it. It must be supposed that they have at least become convinced of the weakness of any philosophy which refuses to take note of actual facts.

The Police would hardly have put out this notice, had not the practice to which it relates been on the increase. As regards professional London, the conditions of life during the summer have gradually undergone a considerable change. The migration to the sea-side, if there were children in the case, or to foreign parts, if there were not, is no longer the only outing of the year. For some months before or after this the household live in the country, and the master of it goes backwards and forwards to his work in town. This often makes it convenient for the servants to go with the family, and when this happens the question at once presents itself,—What is to be done with the house? The answer usually given is,—put in a caretaker; and in the majority of cases, this is accepted as the only course to follow. Occasionally, however, there is a difficulty in finding a caretaker. Caretakers are to be had, indeed, for the asking; but then, it is not every one who claims this responsible title that is fit to have the care of a house. No one likes to pay for having a house neglected, yet this is often the kind of service which the money paid to a caretaker secures. Then, perhaps, a daughter who has been in Edinburgh in the dead season remembers the rows of shut-up houses, each with a card fastened to the knocker asking that letters and parcels may be left at such and such address. Why should not what is done in Edinburgh be done also in London? The suggestion is not at once adopted. Gloomy pictures are drawn of the ravage that may be wrought when the house is left to silence and the thief; sage remarks are made upon the alliance between penny-wisdom and pound-folly. But stories at once thrilling and pertinent are not wanting on the other side. The sins of caretakers are many, and among them that of participation in robbery is not unknown. There are instances in which a caretaker has telegraphed to her absent master the news that the house has been broken into, and in the end it has turned out that the breaking-in was merely done to save appearances, and that the house was really opened to the invaders by the caretaker's own hand. So sometimes the proposal to leave the house to itself gains the day, and the family depart for the summer. For a time, perhaps, they feel all the happier for the thought that their home is not in the possession of some strange person, who, though herself a woman, may have a husband who is not very reputable, and, what is worse, not very clean, and a young family of both sexes, who "favour" father or mother just in the very points where one would most like the type in each case to die out. From the first, however, there is something forced in this professed sense of ease. It is but a cover for corroding fears that are not allowed to find expression. Now and again, however, they find, not expression only, but realisation. The day comes when the telegram so often fancied actually arrives, and you learn that your house has been robbed. Your first instinct is to cheer yourself with the reflection that there was nothing in it that a thief would much care to take. You remember all the times you have heard or read that the professional burglar never makes an entry without having informed himself as to the nature of the booty to be appropriated, and you think with satisfaction at how low a figure he would estimate all that you have left behind you. Burglars do not care for books; the beauties of Chippendale or Sheraton furniture are sealed to them; even china has the double defect of being easy to break, and not very easy to get a price for. There is something soothing in these reflections, and when you at length come up to the door, it is more with curiosity than with serious alarm. The first word from the policeman in charge undeceives you,—“It's a bad job,” he says; and when you falter forth that there was not much to take, he answers, with a terror-compelling smile, “there was a good deal of damage, though.” When you get into the house—which you probably do through a window, in a fashion which goes far to put you on a level with the burglar—you at once see the justice of his remark. There was a good deal of damage, and a good deal of damage has been done. The criminal and semi-criminal population of London is not entirely composed of professional thieves. It is largely made up of boys and young men, who, as yet, are only professional thieves in desire and intention. They are thieves in the sense that the children in Old Indian families were Covenanted servants. They mean to be so as soon as they can, and, in the interval, they are quite ready to get themselves into training for future distinction. To such as these an empty house is a sort of Haileybury,—a college where they may qualify themselves for the work which their fathers did before them, and which they look forward to doing in their turn. The absence of anything which is really valuable—valuable, as political economists say, in exchange—merely moves them to show their contempt for a house so destitute of solid wealth. The “gimcracks” by which they are surrounded supply them abundant opportunity for giving their irritation vent. As they think of what the house might have contained, they wreak their vengeance on what it does contain. The pleasure of “making hay” seems universal at a certain age, and by the time that every lock has been wrenched off, and the contents of every drawer and cabinet brought into hotchpot, there is a good deal to make hay with. If to this we add that they are seldom strictly sober, that their sense of decency is about on a level with that of an anthropoid ape, and that the entrance which has once admitted them without detection by the police may, if they are careful, admit them again and again, for weeks together, we shall have said enough to suggest the kind of spectacle which meets the owner's eye and nose as he wanders over his dwelling. It will speak well for his self-control if, when he goes out of town that night, he has no harsh word for the unhappy author of the suggestion that in Edinburgh they do without caretakers.

For Edinburgh and London, it cannot be denied, are not governed by the same rules. We do not profess to assign the reason. It may be that the London Police are less numerous or less efficient than the Edinburgh Police, or that the Edinburgh rough is less daring or less inventive, or that the houses are built and fastened more securely in Edinburgh, or that they lie closer together, and so can be more easily watched. The cause of the difference the reader must find out for himself, but its existence, if he be wise, he will take on trust. Even if he has given notice to the Police Superintendent, and is to leave home for the autumn this very evening, we counsel him to spend the afternoon in hunting for a caretaker, or better still, to import a policeman and his wife.

DEMOCRACY AND LITERATURE.

THE unanimous approval of Mr. Gladstone's action in offering a pension of £250 a year to Mr. Matthew Arnold has been broken by one voice, and not an unimportant one. The Editor of Truth constantly tries to express, and sometimes succeeds in expressing, the extreme democratic view, and he distinctly condemns the grant. Acknowledging to the full Mr. Arnold's rank in literature, and expressing a personal appreciation of his writings, he declares him not entitled to the pension, because, as an Inspector of Schools, he receives £700 a year, and is therefore not “needy.” Considering Mr. Arnold's special services to education, services far beyond those of the regular Inspector, and the income he could make in a dozen ways if he did not give up his time and his freedom to the State, he is very badly paid; but then so are most State servants, and of course £700 a year, though it will go such a little way, is not “need.” Three-fourths of the clergy live as educated gentlemen on far less, and officers in the Army think themselves prosperous when they have reached that point. But is not Truth encouraging the worst foible of the Democracy, its jealousy of all rewards that it understands, in pressing such an argument? In a true Democratic State, would no one be deserving but the pauper, and the only allowable claim on the community be want of things to eat? That want, suffered by those who have distinctly benefited the community by their work, or their thought, or their perceptiveness of natural facts, is a claim we, of course, are most ready to admit, more especially when, as in some well-known cases—Cruden's, for example—the work itself, being by its nature unremunerative, has produced the want. We only wish the little pension list now used to meet such cases—a pension list which may never exceed £1,200 granted in any one year—could be exclusively devoted to them, and feel sure that even then it would be insufficient. It is not only authors who are poor; but thinkers, inventors, discoverers, artists, and even public servants, though for the latter there is usually some kind of provision. But surely there is another aspect of the question, and the community owes to those who enlighten, or serve, or elevate it, or make it prosperous, or in any conspicuous way conduce to its welfare as a whole, something besides charity, some public and unmistakable recognition, some sign of gratitude and appreciation. Almsgiving is a duty in certain cases, but so also in certain others is admiration, and the expression of it in its most visible, and to many men, rich as well as poor, most pleasant form. Men do not dislike presents because they are well off, if only the presents are given either from admiration or affection. We all acknowledge that by groups, when we contribute to testimonials to the living, or share in subscriptions for a sum to be given to a man who has done service; and if the service is of a kind which moves the whole community, the community may wisely do the same. It seems to us that in our modern society service, unless political or military, so far from being too much acknowledged, is not acknowledged enough; that the community evades too readily its obligation of recognition, or, to put it in another way, of friendliness to those who, by their use of their gifts, have entitled themselves to be considered benefactors. It is the rarest thing in the world for the State—that is, for the whole community—to do anything whatever for the poet or the historian, the discoverer or the man of science, even in the cheap way of granting honours; and of concrete recognitions, except this wretched little snippet of the Civil List, there are none at all. There has not been in the last half-century, so far as we know, a single proposal in Parliament to recognise the services done by any thinker or man of genius to Englishmen or to mankind, as we have time after time recognised, and justly recognised, the services of soldiers and sailors. Men of genius are rewarded, it is said, by the public. Very often they are not—Mr. Arnold, for instance, a man of singular grace of prose diction, has probably made less by poems which every year rise higher in the estimation of the competent than he could have made in one year of successful journalism—but grant that they are, what has that to do with it? It is not charity we are asking for them, but acknowledgment. It is not out of charity that you send to friend, or mistress, or collaborateur the jewel which is treasured for life, but in acknowledgment that your life is the better, or happier, or brighter for him, and it is that sense we want the community to express its admiration. If it does not feel it, cadit questio, the thing is impossible; but none the less is it an ideal, and every approach towards it a thing to be welcomed, and not deprecated. England is the better because, though it has voted nothing to Mr. Arnold, it has so far understood and appreciated him that a Minister can act as if it had. The booksellers have not left Mr. Tennyson to starve; but suppose Parliament, in a fit of emotion, to vote him its thanks and £5,000, as it would do if he had taken a town, would the community be the better or worse for it, less bound together as a living organism with a brain and a heart, or more? We do not want more pension-power given to any Minister. Though so strictly guarded now that even his limited right must be a burden to a Premier, and a source of endless thought, inquiry, and fear of opprobrium, it has often been abused, and the Minister may not be one who responds fully to the kind of national sentiment we should like to see expressed. But if England were the ideally Democratic State that Truth would wish, we suppose, to see it, we should hope that ever and anon, perhaps twice in a Parliament, a grant in “national recognition” would be proposed to some thinker, or poet, or discoverer, or artist who had so revealed himself to the whole nation that the vote could pass. Such a vote would be but a present to a man, say, like Mr. Darwin—the richest, perhaps, among men of science since Lord Henry Cavendish, who raged at his banker for suggesting that his floating balance was positively too large—but an honorific present is not the less sweet because one does not “need,” while to many it would be the most acceptable form of recognition. The poor taxpayer? We are supposing the taxpayer to be the giver, the willing giver, heartily endorsing or urging his representatives.

We wonder if that objection about the taxpayer is final, and if the Democracy, when fully enthroned, will acknowledge no obligation binding on itself towards the masters of thought. It may be so, for Princes are ungrateful, and Demos, though he wears clogs, is clattering fast up the steps of a throne. There is absolutely nothing to go by, for there never has been an educated Democracy yet, with each man in it capable of forming an opinion, and an uneducated Democracy can only recognise heartily what it understands. It as yet comprehends feeling, but not thought, and would vote a statue to Mr. Plimsoll sooner than to Mr. Arnold. Mr. Tennyson’s service, or Mr. Darwin’s service, or Mr. Carlyle’s service, or the service of the man who invents the electrical accumulator, or of the man who works out a calculating machine, is as invisible to the mass as the service of Beethoven to a community with discordant tympana would be. They might trust their leaders, but that would not be national recognition. One would hope that as the community became more enlightened, free, and homogeneous, it would feel more keenly the emotion which, say, literary service or charm wakes in the few; but we do not as yet quite like the signs. Graciousness, friendliness, “sweetness,” altogether, to use Mr. Matthew Arnold’s words, are not the graces one finds most fully developed in the Democracy. America honours but does not formally recognise her men of genius. In France, though the recognition in some classes is so keen that even the national dislike to subscribe gives way to it, as in Lamartine’s case, the nation has done nothing to honour living genius, except in the case of M. Pasteur; and though it has in Italy, Italy is almost as little of a democracy as England, where a vote of thanks in Parliament to Darwin, or Stephenson, or Wheatstone, or Tennyson would rouse the laughter of surprise. Still, we are not without hope. Genius and service begin to be recognised very warmly by those who understand, and when the million understands, we do not know why it should be less grateful. Public honour done to great actors pleases a mass very low down, and that is because histrionic power is one of the few intellectual powers they readily comprehend. In France, they say the people of little towns honoured by the residence of a genius will move a market-place or silence bells rather than he should be disturbed. No one, even in Britain, would be surprised if all the people in any one city, say, Oxford or Edinburgh, insisted on contributing to a gift to a great genius, and the step from that unanimity to corporate action is not a long one. The Democracy may yet be grateful to genius; but meanwhile, one of its mouthpieces rather daunts us, when he objects to a grant to Mr. Arnold because it is not alms.

IVAN TOURGÉNIEF.

ON last Sunday, Ivan Tourgénief, after a long and painful illness, died, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, at Bougival, near Paris. The Thackeray of Russian literature deserves more than slight notice. Ivan Tourgénief was born at Orel, in 1818, and belonged by birth to the class of landed gentry. For generations, men of his name and blood have, as earnest reformers, played a part in Russian politics. According to the custom of the Russian gentry, the boy Ivan received his first instruction from foreign tutors. After studying from 1834 to 1838 at Moscow and St. Petersburg, he passed two years as a student in Berlin, where he had for at least one winter Michael Bakounine, the notorious Nihilist, as room-mate. Here the young Tourgénief studied chiefly history and philosophy, which latter subject he often laughed at in his later works as unprofitable and unpractical. Tourgénief then returned to St. Petersburg, and accepted a place in the Home Office, which he soon relinquished, to devote himself to literature.

His first attempts were scarcely more than imitations of Poushkin and Lermontoff, and passed unnoticed. In 1846, however, he wrote a short story, which was accepted by Belinski and appeared in the Contemporary, and this was sufficient to direct public attention to his talent. A little later, Tourgénief went to Paris, where in the following years he wrote his “Recollections of a Sportsman,” which at once made him famous. Although every one of these sketches was written with a social tendency, although they were all published in the Contemporary, under the editorship of the suspected Belinski, they passed the Censor without difficulty. Official wisdom evidently saw in them nothing but landscape-painting and good descriptions of a sportsman’s life. In 1852, the sketches appeared in book form. In the same year, Gogol, the Russian Dickens, died, and the cemetery of the Donskoi Monastery, near Moscow, could not hold the concourse of the people of all ranks which streamed thither to do honour to the first Russian novelist of real power. The outburst of mingled admiration and sorrow alarmed officialdom, and when Tourgénief shortly afterwards published an article praising Gogol, he was banished to his own property. It was only the entreaties of the liberal-minded Alexander which, two years later, restored him to freedom. Tourgénief spent the next years in Germany, France, and Russia; in 1863 he settled and built himself a house at Baden-Baden, in order to live near his friends, the Viardots. After the events of 1870, the Viardots removed to France, and Tourgénief followed them. His later life and sad end are familiar to all.

Tourgénief’s first large work, “Recollections of a Sportsman,” is perhaps his best. The “Recollections” are thrown into the form of short sketches, of which the ablest are “Khor and Kalinitsh,” “The Devil’s Dale,” “The Singers,” “Kasjan,” “Two Days in the Forest,” and “Forest and Steppe.” As a landed gentleman, Tourgénief naturally took much pleasure in hunting; he has, besides, all the passionate love of nature of the Slav, and shows warm sympathy with the people. In spite, however, of the patriotism which colours these sketches, their writer is evidently a man who has lived among foreign nations, and freed himself of all local prejudices. We shall first consider his power of interpreting nature, for this is a faculty inherent in his blood, and many of these sketches, such as "Forest and Steppe," are nothing but landscape paintings in words. The Slav, impressionable and sympathetic, has a more intimate connection with nature than other races; he still believes in spirits of field, and fell, and stream, still hears the wail of suffering in the wind, or the roll of anger in the thunder. These feelings have been wonderfully depicted by Tourgénief. He is of his day a realist, a hater of empty phrases, and he has not only observed long and closely the different moods of nature, but is sympathetic enough to be able to represent them with touches of "natural magic," which give life even to scenes sometimes lacking in human interest. In "The Devil's Dale," some shepherd boys are sitting round a watch-fire, telling each other ghost stories or fairy tales. One is about a sheep which talks, another about a landowner who cannot find peace even in the grave, &c. Now and then the dogs shiver with fear, and then with a howl rush forth into the darkness. "Suddenly, somewhere in the distance, rose up a long, piercing, sobbing sound, one of those incomprehensible sounds peculiar to the night, which often come in the deepest silence, and wax nearer, till they seem to stand still in the air above, and then at once die away, as if in flight." Some of these pictures, too, are of rare and ideal beauty:—"The dry warmth of midnight spread over the sleeping fields its soft coverlet; the moon had not yet risen, and the numberless files of golden stars seemed to move in slow order towards the Milky Way. As my eye followed their movement, I realised the slow and rhythmic progress of the world." But generally he is impressed rather with the untameable power than with the beauty of Nature. "Out of the forest the deep voice of Nature speaks to man, 'I have nothing to do with thee; I am, and rule, but thou must struggle, even in order to live.'"

His numerous sketches of animals are almost perfect. We like best the ugly dog, 'Valetka,' who always carried his stump of a tail between his legs, and who was always chased from kitchen and from yard. "In hunting he was tireless, and had a keen sense of smell. His master never thought of feeding him. But whenever 'Valetka' caught a hare, he devoured it to the last shred with the keenest pleasure, lying somewhere in the cool shade of a green bush, or at a polite distance from his master, who then cursed him in all known and unknown languages."

This book, too, contains almost a natural history of the Russian people. Nearly all the sketches are taken from among the dwellers in the country; Tourgénief pictures the houseless serf, shows peasant after peasant, gives type after type of landowner and aristocrat. The peasant is, in his pages, an extremely good-natured, easily satisfied man, clever, ready, and of robust health. By nature endowed with cunning, with wit and humour, the Slav resembles the English idea of the Irish Celt. Tourgénief looks upon the peasant as the stay and prop of his country; he dwells with preference upon the peasant's rooted love of home, shows his reverence of Tsar and Church, and his ready self-sacrifice to either, describes again and again his love of family and the sacred strength of the old-fashioned tie of kinship, as seen in the commune. The people is a religious one, with love of peace and depth of pity. Take the free peasant, Ovssianikof. Childless, he looks upon himself as a patriarch, and although he is held in honour by the highest and by the lowest, he yet knows his place. In his clothing and manners he follows the old customs, and although conscious of his worth, he seems as devoid of vanity as of self-assertion; he does not praise the past, for although not entirely satisfied with the present, he yet acknowledges progress, but can see "no new order." "The old is dying out, and the young has not yet been born." But in sketching character Tourgénief seldom gives us ideals, he prefers to paint nature as it is. The prosaic peasant, Khor, who has never been to school, grumbles that the dreamer Kalinitsh succeeds with bees because the idler has learnt to write. Another serf, Stiopushka, was related to no one, no one knew him; they saw him, it is true, kicked him now and again, but never spoke to him, and his mouth seemed never to have been opened since his birth. In the sketch "Death" Tourgénief shows "how strangely the Russian dies," without fear or complaint he awaits the stroke as if it were about to fall upon another. There is a miller who, while carting some mill-stones, is mortally hurt; but not till much later does he go to the doctor, who prescribes absolute rest and quiet, "for the worst is to be feared." But the miller will not stay and be treated by the surgeon. "No. I must go home; a man must die, it's better to die at home; if I died here, who would see that affairs at home were set straight?" Sutschock, who, when his boat disappears under his feet, and the hunter, whom he has been rowing, is impatient, keeps winking with his eyes, and seems about to go to sleep, although up to his neck in the stream. He has to be ordered to keep his head above water.

But if Tourgénief, when painting the peasant, colours his portrait too darkly, he may be said to leave out all the lights in his pictures of landowners and aristocrats. One landlord is good-humoured, but hard-hearted; he looks upon his serfs as upon his cows, and kills one animal, when unprofitable, as readily as the other. Another gentleman cares for them but as instruments of pleasure, &c. The aristocrats employed at Court or in the public service live in his pages as Tartars, with a slight exterior polish of manner. They are all either spend-thrifts, who ruin others as well as themselves, or fools honoured with servile reverence. Debauchees, tyrants, wild beasts of all sorts have sat to him for their picture. Of their extravagance, debauchery, and cruelty, he gives fearful instances. The book is one long protest against serfdom, and the evil effects of the system upon enslavers and enslaved are portrayed with a master-hand. It is said that this book decided Alexander to abolish slavery. But Tourgénief does not hope that this measure or that any measure will be effectual; for "the Russian peasant is capable of stealing from himself." This book, however, shows less pessimism, less fatalism, than any of his later writings; it is not only as a book well worth the reading, it was a deed well worth the doing.

As he grows older and takes his models from the drawing-room, the gloom deepens. His novels which deal with problems of love and marriage may now be referred to. Here, he shows himself a man of his time; either the sensuality is somewhat more pronounced than is natural, as in his "First Love," or it is feverish and unhealthy, as in "Hélène," or mad, as in "The Three Portraits." His women often declare themselves first, as in his "Faust." "To what have you brought me?" cried Vera; "don't you know that I love you?" And most of these women have something of the cat, or snake, or elf. Tourgénief loves abnormal characters; he does not see life fairly, he is a pessimist. "Love is never the free union of free souls of which German Professors dream; no, in love, the one person is slave, the other lord!"

Up to the close of this period, that is up to 1861, Tourgénief's works, whatever may be their faults, had reflected the best spirit of his race. In "Fathers and Sons," however, published in 1861, Tourgénief loses touch of the people. As we have seen, he hoped but little from the abolition of serfdom, and the bitter disappointment of the youth of Russia at the results of the measure seemed to him insane. This is the more unfortunate, inasmuch as this novel in regard to form is perhaps the best of all his works, as it is certainly the most widely known. He who aforetime protested against serfdom now protests against the materialism and Nihilism of the Russian youth. Tourgénief treats Socialism as mere ignorance. In order to understand this movement, therefore, it will be necessary for the Englishman to read not only Tourgénief, but also that book on "Underground Russia" which shows the passionate self-abnegation and heroism of the dreamers whom Tourgénief depicts as "mostly fools." Take his treatment of the principal character, the student Bazarof, who is the apostle of the new creed. Bazarof does not die upon the scaffold, but of blood-poisoning, contracted while dissecting a corpse. His death is entirely accidental, and entirely useless. For Bazarof has given up his wild dreams and conquered his strong passions; he has returned home, and is resolved to practise medicine and play the part of a useful citizen, and just when we can hope all from so strong a character, he dies, a prey to blind chance. No wonder the book was badly received in Russia, and its author censured.

But Tourgénief heeded neither warning nor blame. In 1867 he published "Dym." Nihilism seemed to him nothing but "smoke;" "the desperate hope" of the youth of Russia was incomprehensible to the pessimist, to the man of the world, who had long ceased to believe that anything unselfish could come from human nature. In his latest works, however, Tourgénief has not lost his humour; although his pictures have become caricatures, his hand has not lost its cunning. How he describes the art enthusiasts of to-day,—the men who never speak of Raphael or Correggio, but of the "divine Sanzio" and the "inimitable Allegri"! "They adore," he writes, "every doubtful, obscure, or mediocre talent as a 'genius,' and phrases such as 'the blue Italian heaven,' 'the lemon-trees of the sunny South,' 'the scented mist of the sea-shore,' are the stock-in-trade." "Ah, Ivan! Ivan!" cries Michael, enraptured, "let us go to the South! let us go to the South! for in soul we are indeed Greeks, ancient Greeks!"

With all his faults, Tourgénéf has enlarged our estimate of the talent of the Slav. Unfortunately, the best faculty of his race was somewhat lacking in him: he was deficient in sympathy. The enthusiastic love of the Slav for the ideal, had he possessed it, would have softened the harshness of his pessimistic realism, would have given him mental and moral balance, and made him healthy. This was not to be. The Slav genius, feminine in its sympathy, idealism, and faith, most of all in its passionate self-abnegation, still awaits the coming of an adequate interpreter.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE WISH TO BELIEVE.

SIR,—In the interesting article on "The Wish to Believe" which appeared in your last issue, and for which I thank you heartily, the writer has on one point slightly misunderstood my meaning; and as the question is one of some interest, I would ask you kindly to insert these words of explanation. He says that I seem to hold that the wish to believe which ensures impartiality—that sort of wish which I had explained in my previous essay—cannot be legitimately separated in its effect from the wish which—as I explain in the present essay—makes the mind sensitive to the full force of evidence in favour of the truth of the belief wished for. The writer, while allowing that the kind of wish which ensures impartiality as being inseparably bound up with the desire that the belief should be true, has the effect I speak of in giving the mind a keen perception of the evidence in favour of belief, contends that a similar sensitiveness is given also by the wish to make up a plausible case, and instances Mr. Chaffanbrass's quick perception of the plausibilities of the evidence in favour of Phineas Finn's innocence. Now, I have nowhere denied that other influences may stimulate the mind and make it sensitive to favourable evidence, as well as the strong wish to believe, if one can believe truly; and undoubtedly, the motive which actuated Mr. Chaffanbrass is one such influence. His wish, however, was not a wish to believe, but a wish to make his jury believe; so that it would, anyhow, not come under my immediate subject. But apart from this, I had no intention of denying that any strong motive gives keenness to the mind, and a certain sensitiveness thence resulting. I only attempted to show some of the various ways in which anxiety for belief, if true belief be possible, may aid the mind in its appreciation of evidence, as well as quicken its critical faculties, this latter effect being presupposed as the conclusion of my former essay. I do not, therefore, say that such a wish is the only stimulating power, but that it is the only power which stimulates alike the appreciating and critical faculties, and consequently helps in the search for truth. This conclusion I express on page 473, in words almost identical with those used by the writer in the Spectator.

There is, however, one element distinctive of this "wish to believe," which seems to me to affect both the impartiality of one's judgment, and the power of the wisher to appreciate fully evidence in favour of the desired conclusion,—so far linking these effects inseparably. I speak of the sense of the reality of a problem, and the importance to oneself of its true solution, which lights up with reality all that bears on it. This it is, as we saw in my former essay, which makes the mind keenly alive to difficulties against belief, and which must enter into the wish, as I then explained it; and it seems to me to be this very same element which I show, in pp. 472, 473, and 477, to be indispensable to the full appreciation of certain arguments, which may be adduced in favour of belief. I do not speak of the merely imaginative side of realising, which the barrister, who wishes merely to get up a plausible case and impress his jury, may very well have, but of that deeper aspect of it of which I have spoken in my essay, and which involves a sense that facts pointing to a conclusion are facts with consequences affecting the world and oneself. This sense connects the "wish to believe" with the sense of responsibility in reasoning, and with that most potent motive-power, the instinct for self-preservation,—self-preservation, that is, from the unknown dangers which ignorance may entail;—the strong wish to believe being, under this aspect, the passion for knowledge. This is the only element which, as being the common cause of the two effects of the "wish to believe" which I have considered, seems to me to render them so far incapable of an entirely separate treatment.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS' COMMISSION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Canon Trevor is no doubt right in saying that it is a mistake to attempt to govern the Church by Courts, instead of by Bishops and Synods. The Royal declaration before the Thirty-nine Articles only reaffirms the ancient constitutional rights of the Church, when it says that Ecclesiastical questions are to be decided by Convocation. It is here that the proposed changes in the Courts will, I am afraid, break down, and fail to produce peace. The cause of all the trouble has been that those who desired to worship as Cranmer and Ridley in the First Reformed Prayer-book allowed them to worship, and as Bishop Cosin, the author of our present "Ornaments Rubric," distinctly says they may worship, found themselves forbidden to do so by a Court whose constitutional authority they denied, and whose bias was scarcely concealed; while other and more popular sections of the Church were allowed to break the plainest provisions of the law with impunity, if not with approval. The grievance was not diminished by the fact that the Canons order Bishops and Deans to conduct the worship at Holy Communion in cathedrals after the "ritualistic" fashion, and that the Canons are flagrantly disobeyed. How will the new Courts remedy this? Either the new Final Court of Appeal will support the Judicial Committee in reading a "not" into the Ornaments Rubric, or it will interpret that document according to its plain, natural, and historical sense. In the former case, matters will continue precisely as they are. In the latter, we may well have the equally great grievance of a distasteful ritual being forced upon unwilling congregations. What is wanted is liberty for congregations who wish to worship as the whole Catholic Church has ever worshipped, and as the English Church accordingly allows, to be able to do so without being persecuted. On the other hand, those who prefer the accustomed worship of later times have an undoubted right to be protected from changes which they dislike. This can only be secured in one of two ways,—by allowing different kinds of services in the same building at different hours; or by allowing different sections of a congregation to have their own place of worship, without interfering with the parochial system. This latter plan would, of course, meet the difficulty of preaching which may be distasteful to any section of the parishioners. The question, then, would resolve itself into a matter of adjustment and arrangement. And here the Bishop, with a fairly elected council of clergy and laity, might come in, and be entrusted with absolute power, it being, of course, distinctly understood that no party purpose is to be served, but liberty of worship according to their convictions to be secured alike for Ritualists and non-Ritualists. Under such a plan as this, provision might also be made for those popular "mission services" in the evening which, with free seats for all alike, and the Prayer-book conspicuous by its absence, the non-churchgoing classes are found by experience so gladly to attend.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE CLOSING OF THE HIGHLANDS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As I feel sure that you do not wish to misrepresent facts, I venture to point out a strange inaccuracy in your leading article on "The Closing of the Scottish Highlands," in which you say:—"Visitors at Braemar cannot obtain leave to cross the Dee during the shooting season, and only grudgingly at any time." There is hardly any district known to me where the whole river scenery is so fully open to the tourist as that of the Dee, for about twenty-four miles, viz., from Ballater to four miles above the Linn of Dee, as for the whole way the road commands a perfect view of the Dee, and its beautiful windings through mountain and valley scenery. Within these limits there are five bridges, two of which lead to Balmoral and its private grounds, another to Old Mar Lodge and its private grounds; the other two are open to the public beyond dispute, as they form part of the highway at Invercauld and at the Linn of Dee, near which both banks are open to the public. There is also a good ford above Castleton of Braemar, available for tourists on foot or in carriages.

There are also numerous drives and walks to objects of interest available to the public, such as the Waterfalls of Corriemulzie, the Linns of Quoich and Dee, the Colonel's Bed, the Bynnoch and the Derry Valleys; and for the mountaineer or botanist the ascents of Lochnagar and Ben Macdhui, notwithstanding the notice you quote about the latter. Having spent several happy seasons in these parts, I can vouch for the freedom as well as for the variety and picturesque beauty of the many excursions open to the public here.—I am, Sir, &c., Braemar, August 28th.

[We gladly allow G. K. H. to enumerate the ways which at Braemar are still open to the public. Our allusion was to ways that are shut.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE LAW OF TRESPASS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent, "J. L. P.," speaks of there being no specific law in Scotland making trespass in itself an offence. Do not his remarks apply equally to England? Is it not a fact in this country, too, that no punishment can be inflicted on any one unless some damage (however slight) can be proved, or that the "trespass" is "in pursuit of game?"—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. FOOTE AND THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

SIR,—Nothing but a grave sense of duty could induce me to trouble you with a communication upon this painful controversial subject; but as you have given space to a letter from the Rev. Prebendary Row containing many misconceptions upon which I am able to throw some light, I am constrained to ask you to bring the following remarks before your readers. Some years ago, it fell to my lot to be officially engaged to attend a lecture by Mr. Foote, for the purpose of recording every word of his discourse. The lecture was upon "Geology." The depth of insight into the problems of the science displayed by the lecturer showed him to be a master of his subject, and the excellent "style" of his language proved him a scholar and a man of refinement. A representative body of about a score of gentlemen from a Christian Association were present, specially deputed to meet the lecturer, for the purpose of refuting his arguments (I say "refuting" advisedly, for the conduct of the gentlemen displayed that they were not there to discuss), and the calm, respectful manner in which he heard and replied to the questions put to him proclaimed him a gentleman with a deep sympathy with human feelings. The scene was an impressive one to me, by virtue of my office. A single spectator, amongst a large body of men heated and disputing, and the furious, almost fiendish, malignity with which this score of Christian (?) disputants hurled not reasoning, not argument, but fanatic ignorance, in the teeth of their single opponent, and the serene, kindly countenance with which that single opponent met the rage of this Christian (?) onslaught, brought more vividly to my mind all that I had read of the struggles of the early Christians to lift their voice against the blindness of their fellow-creatures than anything I ever before or since experienced. I have not since seen Mr. Foote. Whether or not the continuance of this Christian (?) persecution has embittered him against the sect, I am, therefore, unable to say; but I think it not unlikely. If it has, he is none the less entitled to the sympathy of feeling men, and since it is so extremely difficult to do justice to one whose opinions are repugnant alike to his witnesses and to his judges, I would conjure your readers to reflect deeply before passing censure upon the man, and to remember that our duty and our only safety in judging a case like this is to submit it to a rigid arithmetical reasoning, the solution of which we should abide by, however shocking that solution may be to our predilections. The first of the two bases upon which your reverend correspondent founds his justification of the prosecution is, that the allowing of the publication of the paper censured would be "allowing the author of Christianity to be made the subject of a most indecent and utterly misleading caricature." "The vile caricature," as he calls it, he describes as "neither reasoning nor argument," but "an indecent parody of our Blessed Lord," published with "the deliberate purpose to insult, grieve, and appeal, not to reason, but to obloquy, abuse, and the lowest passions," and he advances this statement as

"the true state of the case." I am bound to assure your readers that a greater misrepresentation of the case could scarcely have been conceived. In the first place, the publication was not a "parody of our Blessed Lord," and I can only conclude that what the crowd in front of the shop-window from which your correspondent caught a glimpse of the sheet prevented him from seeing, he has unwittingly allowed his imagination to fill in. The sheet, if a parody at all, was merely a parody of those incidents in the life of Christ which, while they neither add to nor detract from the beautiful character of Christ per se, are looked upon by the light of modern reasoning as incredible. One example will suffice to explain what I mean. The words "turning water into wine" were accompanied by an illustration, showing water being poured out of one vessel into others containing wine. I submit that in the case of any other book than the Bible, this sample illustration would have been looked upon not as "vile and indecent," but as legitimate satire, showing how events which sentiment pictures in ethereal light may be capable of explanation in the simplest and commonest form; and that had the satire been applied to any creed antagonistic to Christianity, many who now deprecate it would have looked upon it as amusing and forcible, and not devoid of "reasoning and argument." The second of your correspondent's arguments is that the prosecution of Foote was justifiable, as a means "to prevent a wanton insult from being offered to the great mass of the people of this country." If the prosecution is justifiable because the opinions attacked in Mr. Foote's person are obnoxious to the majority of the people of the country, then the persecution of Christ and the Apostles by the Jews was justifiable on the same grounds. Surely your correspondent does not wish to admit this! Yet he must, or withdraw his present argument.—I am, Sir, &c., FIELDING AND SARAH ANDREW.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you permit me to say, not in comment on, but by way of foot-note to, your very fair and sympathetic notice of the "Men of Letters,—Fielding," that the date of his love-affair with Miss Andrew is now no longer "unknown"? Since the book was published, I have been able to trace it definitely, with the aid of the late Mr. Keighley's papers, to November, 1725. There is no need to reproduce the story here, as it is given in full in the Athenæum for June 2nd, 1883. But I may add that it bears upon another doubtful point noticed by your reviewer. It shows that in November, 1725, Fielding had left Eton, but had not left England for Leyden; and from Mr. Keighley's memoranda, it further appears that, under the year 1728, the Album of the Dutch University contains the following record of his presence there:—"Henricus Fielding, Anglus, ann. 20, Stud. Lit." As his first play, Love in Several Masques, was produced at Drury Lane in February, 1728, it follows that this entry must have been made in January, 1728. Thus the period of "about two years" during which Murphy says he was at Leyden must have been between November, 1725, and January, 1728. These, I am well aware, are the merest trifles of biography; but even trifles—as any one who writes about Fielding will probably discover—become of seductive importance, in the case of one who "abides our question" as little as the author of "Tom Jones."—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

AT THE PIT-MOUTH.

'NEATH yon bleak hills that spread across the shire,
Like earth-waves heaved by some convulsion strong,—
Where shrubs refrain from flower and birds from song,
And daily riseth smoke, and nightly fire,
And burrowers in the blackness never tire,—
In the mine's jagged pathways sleeps a throng
O'er whose prone bodies Death hath swept along,
While at the pit-mouth roars their funeral pyre.

Grind with thine heel yon ant-hill; crush their town,
And, stooping, mark swift journeyings to and fro.
Why doth the Unseen deal so fierce a blow,
Strives He in doubt's dark sea our faith to drown?
O preacher! quoting texts with soothing zest,
Whispered yon emmets: "All is for the best?"

THE RUIN.

BEFORE my mind an old-world vision grows,— Dim aisles, bright altars, priests, a rev'rent throng,—
Where now o'er crumbling walls clouds sail along.
Through yonder Time-touched arch no splendour glows,
Its stone-spun frame the shelt'ring hills enclose.
Those mournful shafts, enclasp'd by ivies strong,
When echoed they the final strong-voiced song,
Or mutely witness'd sacrilegious blows?
'Twixt earth and sky I see the dwindled men
Working for God; beneath, the master-mind,
Whose boundless artist-soul no creed can bind,
Planning undying fame with rule and pen.
His tomb lies shadow'd by yon buttress gray:
Go, muse how men, and all men's works, decay.

THE SACRED BOOKS OF CHINA.*

THERE are some books which seem to owe their charm to their obscurity. The Yi-King is at best but a tawdry collection of divinatory sentences; nevertheless, two thousand commentaries have been written upon it, while Confucius is said by Dr. Legge to have exclaimed, in a moment of enthusiasm, "If some years were added to my life, I would give fifty to the study of the Yi, and might then escape falling into great errors." Whether the hope expressed by the Chinese sage would have been realised will appear doubtful to spectators of the polemical storm that has recently agitated the world of sinologists in respect of this ancient classic, culminating in the declaration that the two thousand commentators, together with Dr. Legge himself, have either made confusion worse confounded, or have been forced to admit their inability to discover its meaning. The new theory, as far as we can understand the not very lucid statements of it that have been made public, is that the Yi-King is principally nothing more than the remnant of an antique, rudimentary, phonetic dictionary, drawn up by some exceedingly remote ancestors of the Chinese who were members of what is called the Bak family, and, of course, came from Bactria, or thereabouts, carrying with them as they migrated eastwards some traces of Accadian culture, but content to leave behind them as their sole literary monument a few lists of meanings of similarly-sounded syllables, and a silly ballad or two, all which an ignorant or ill-intentioned Chinese literate long after improperly manipulated and "surreptitiously" interpolated with divinatory words, to suit the prejudices of the age or serve his own purposes. With the merits of this pretty quarrel, which we shall leave Dr. Legge, who is well equipped for the struggle, to fight out as best he may, we are not here concerned. The Yi-King which the Chinese revere and still regard as a treasury of hidden wisdom, in which the explanations of even such modern facts as the steam-engine and the telegraph may be found by those who know how to search for them, is the Yi-King commented upon by the two thousand commentators, and translated by Dr. Legge,—and it is with this Yi-King, as alone rightfully entitled to be ranked among the sacred books of the East, that we have to deal.

The classic consists of a text and ten appendixes or original commentaries, often, but on wholly insufficient grounds, attributed to Confucius. Speaking of the text, the learned translator says, "The subject-matter may be briefly represented as consisting of sixty-four short essays, emphatically and symbolically expressed, on important themes, mostly of a moral, social, and political character, and based on the same number of lineal figures, each made up of six lines, some of which are whole, and the others divided." The aim of the essays, however, is chiefly divinatory, to which the didactic and philosophic portions of them are subordinate. As they have come down to us, each essay consists of a short and, commonly, very enigmatical sentence attributed to King Wàn, who lived in the troublous times of the twelfth century B.C., explaining the meaning of each hexagram, as the linear figures are termed, taken as a whole, followed by a number of sentences, usually six, declaratory of the wisdom hidden in each line and ascribed to the son of the King, the Duke of Kau. We agree with Dr. Legge, who sees much less of a mystery in the book than is generally supposed to be the case. The main idea, not hard to perceive, though alternately swamped by the diffuseness and obscured by the meagreness of the phraseology, is the establishment for geomantic or divinatory purposes of a sort of parallel or analogy between the differences of the hexagrams and the changes of the Kosmos, of the three "powers,"—Heaven, Earth, and Man, in their divine, their physical, and their moral phenomena respectively. The spirit of the whole is more or less that of Taoism, the beginnings of which lie far back in Chinese history, but the elements of the Confucian philosophy are also distinctly indicated. The ascending and descending scale of duties, the orderly subordination of all through the family head, the magistrate and the minister to the Emperor, himself the servant of Heaven, and the orderly government by all, from the Son of Heaven down to the peasant family-father, taught in the Analekts and resumed in the Great Learning, are, more or less inarticulately, inculcated in the Yi-King. No scheme of social and political philosophy has ever yet been framed out of China that can compare in absolute justice of intention with that which the great philosopher of the Middle Kingdom elaborated out of the wisdom of the ancients who preceded him. The duty of the prince and minister to govern with justice is as much insisted upon as the duty of the citizen to render obedience to authority. The prince is no despot, he is the servant of Heaven, bound to execute its decrees in the interest, not of himself, but of the people; who are not his people, but are regarded as an absolutely free commonalty, owing nothing to the ruler but obedience, and that not for the purpose of adding to his wealth or increasing his power and glory—the very term "glory" is unknown in Chinese—but for the purpose of assuring their own good, and so far only as the prince, acting under the inspiration of Heaven, does actually seek their good.

The elements of the hexagrams are whole and broken lines. The whole line represented the male, the strong, the upholding, the producing influence, the yang of Chinese philosophy; the broken line the female, the receptive, the complementary, the ordinating and subordinating influence, the yin of the same philosophy. Perhaps the original idea was given to the ancient diviners by the stalks of the ptarmica sibirica, which they employed in their mystical exercises, being sometimes found whole, sometimes broken. More probably, the whole line represented continuity, the heaven vault, visible by day or by night; the sun, reappearing day after day unchanged; man, whose vigour is perennial; the broken line, discontinuity, the earth, with its summer wealth of greenery and winter meagreness of vegetable life; the moon, waxing and waning, and for a part of each month disappearing altogether; woman, whose days are full of accidents from which those of men are free. The very word "yi" is written by a character composed of parts representing the sun and moon respectively, the symbols of permanence and change. As an illustration of these remarks, a brief comparison of the first hexagram, composed entirely of whole lines, with the second composed entirely of broken lines, will be useful. The former symbolises Heaven, that "directs the great beginnings of things," the power and comprehension of the great man, the superior man, who represents in his degree heaven upon earth, the orderly force that sustains the physical and moral universe. In the lowest line we see the "dragon," the symbol of divine influence, quiescent in the under-waters; in the next, on the earth prepared to act, in the following lines, in full development of energy, aspiring skywards, on the wing in mid-air, finally limited in his range by the topmost line which forbids excess. The hexagram of broken lines, on the other hand, teaches the virtue of docile subordination, the docility of strength striving to complement the ruling and productive energy symbolised by the first figure, so as to effect the unity of completion, not the docility of weakness or of orderless concession, illustrated by the cube of the earth straight and square under heaven; the unselfish self-restraint of the minister, who neither seeks his profit at the expense of the people, nor his glory at the expense of his prince; the tied-up sack symbolic of the fulness of accomplishment; the yellow garment of the hue of earth, a colour of "correctness;" the parted dragons fighting for supremacy significative of the strife of unordered influences.

Without the appendices, of which the third and the fifth are the most important, the text of the Yi-King would be nearly unintelligible. Even with them, the chief value of the classic lies in the wisdom which successive generations of Chinese writers have extracted from sentences pregnant in their eyes with the germs of all the philosophies. Dr. Legge's wonderful knowledge of Chinese literature has enabled him to present the essence of the commentaries in a clear and attractive form, while his own luminous and suggestive observations add greatly to the interest and instructiveness of the volume. His remarks on the theology of the Chinese are especially valuable, but we are inclined to doubt the propriety of his translation of the Chinese "Ti" by our word, "God." God in Western parlance is not merely the Ruler, but pre-eminently the Creator of all things. Now, the notion of a divine creation is altogether foreign to the Chinese mind. The conversion of Chaos into an ordered Kosmos by spiritual agency is the starting-point of Chinese cosmogony, but of the origin of matter in the chaotic state the Chinese have no theory whatever. Man is under the rule of Heaven, but does not owe his creation to Heaven; the common legend of his origin is indeed a disgusting one. Ti is the unknowable, the God of agnosticism, the ruler of Heaven—Heaven being the great sustaining principle symbolised by the sky-vault—as the Emperor is the ruler of earth. Ti, again, is spoken of by Chinese writers as possessing a "shan," which is merely the intellectual soul of man, as distinguished from the "kwei," or animal soul. Ti, in fine, is no god; he is at the best an Anaxagorean deity, a sort of embodied pantheistic influence, the vision of some of the more subtle and imaginative among the practical minds of China. Power is ascribed to him, and wisdom, but neither goodness nor mercy; nor is he presented as an object of love, but simply as the ruler of things, or rather, of the interactions of natural powers, audible in the thunder, visible in the wind, seen in the brightness of the sun, felt in the warmth of the south, manifest everywhere in "the purity and equal arrangement of things," beneficent at least on the whole, but rather in fact than in intention; not certainly specially regardful of human interests, but occupied in the diffusion of the principles of right government and correct subordination throughout the triple universe of heaven, earth, and man.

[FIRST NOTICE.—THE DAUPHIN.]

THE first volume of the monumental work in which the Marquis de Beaumont records the results of his laborious researches, extending over twenty-five years, deals with one of the most momentous, eventful, and romantic periods of the history of France, and is a remarkable example of some of the best qualities of the historian and biographer. The patience, calmness of judgment, and lucidity that befit the one, the comprehension, sympathy, and power of realisation, without which the other is a mere reconstructor of skeletons, are conspicuous in the work of M. de Beaumont; and the interest of the book is so great, its style is so polished, this product of vast labour is so little laborious to peruse, while it fully maintains the dignity of historical literature, that the reader is never suffered to be oppressively conscious of the toil that it represents. The remarks of the Duc de Broglie, in his preface to his "Studies" of Frederick the Great and Maria Theresa, upon the fascinating nature of those researches into the mysteries and explorations of the by-ways of history which have but recently been rendered possible by the opening-up to the diligent student of the archives of several European Courts and countries, with the discoveries, the disillusionment, and the rehabilitations that they bring, apply with striking propriety to the exhaustive labours of the Marquis de Beaumont. Only the absorption of one's whole mind, imagination, and taste could enable the toiler to execute such a task as these volumes imply; one which is no doubt rewarded, in so far as its guerdon can come from the outside, by the appreciation of the author's fellow-countrymen and brother-students, and which cannot fail to receive full recognition from English readers of history. The book is a monument of industry, and an example of thoroughness that ought to be as stimulating as it is remarkable. The introduction is in itself a manual of instruction relating to the documents that have been consulted, the foot-notes are invaluable to readers who profit at their ease by all this digging and delving into the far past at one of its most memorable epochs; the author assembles and groups the events, the characters, the features, the great personages, the political and social aspects, the actual history, and the collateral and prospective interests of the time, with remarkable skill, while he indulges but little in the picturesque, and impartially preserves the proportions of his subject,—France, from the birth to the death of Charles the Victorious.

The present volumes are concerned with thirty-two years of the life of the Prince who has been, of all princes, the most variously estimated. It will be deeply interesting to arrive at the summing-up by the Marquis de Beaumont of the life and character which he approaches in the spirit of rehabilitation, but upon which he is as yet far from pronouncing, while he marshals the great array of contradictory and conflicting testimony, and throws upon it the light of evidence gathered from public and private documents and correspondence of all grades of interest and importance, down to household account-books. It is unnecessary to say that every book with any bearing on his subject has yielded up its essence to his compelling hand. Thus his work is a monograph and a history, a plaidoyer and a judgment; and he begins with these words, quoted from M. Charles Lenormant,—"C'est une admirable prerogative de l'historien que la faculté qu'il a d'instruire de grands procès de révision, et de faire casser, après plusieurs siècles, des sentences dictées par l'iniquité ou l'erreur." The author approaches the history of Charles VII. by the lengthy and arduous path of close examination of the sources of the ever-recurring accusations against the King whose memory has had such strange vicissitudes; the son of poor, mad Charles le Bien Aimé and the She-Wolf of Bavaria, the father of Louis XI., the lover of Agnes Sorel, the distressful Prince for whom the Maid of Orleans fought, and who handed her over to her enemies and to the stake, the alleged avenger of the Duke of Orleans by the blood of John the Fearless, and the rewarder of the liberality and loyalty of Jacques Cœur with confiscation and exile.

The royal child, between whom and the throne two brothers, soon to be removed by death, stood, was born during a lucid interval in his wretched father's madness, named Count of Ponthieu, and surrounded with every luxury known at the period, utterly neglected by his vile mother, early habituated to the sight of violence and cruelty involved in the high-handed proceedings of John the Fearless, and exposed at ten years old to the dangers of the popular rising headed by Caboches, and supported by the familiars of the Duke of Burgundy, when the King and his sons were made to wear the white hood, which was the sign of sedition, terror reigned for three months, and the scaffold was a fixed institution. (The story of 1793 is only a repetition of history, with additions.) In the Dauphin's tenth year a romantic episode occurred; this was the betrothal of the royal boy to the daughter (aged eight) of the Duke of Anjou—always called King of Sicily—and the wise and beautiful Yolande of Aragon, grand-daughter of King John of France. The betrothal took place at the Louvre; the wicked Queen Isabeau of Bavaria and the doomed Duke of Orleans were present; then Yolande took away her future son-in-law to a happy home at Tarascon, where for a short period he was at peace, not disturbed even by the invasion of Henry V. of England, and the terrible disaster of Agincourt. The first letter of Charles VI. in existence is that by which he appoints his son Captain of the Castle of Vincennes in 1415; in 1416, the Prince received the Duchy of Touraine, for which he did homage to the King, and thenceforth took his place at the Council. The real ruler of France was then the Duke of Anjou (King Louis of Sicily); the Queen was infirm, and Charles VI. was hopelessly insane. The Duke of Burgundy was the personal and political enemy of Louis, and was always conspiring against him; but death played the game of John the Fearless. The Duke of Anjou died in February, 1417, the Dauphin, a devoted friend of Burgundy, two months later; the fifth son of Charles VI. became the heir to the throne, for his elder brother, the Duke of Guyenne, had died two years previously, and began at fourteen the life of disaster and rescue, defeat and victory, which has been so variously represented; one view making him a mere shuttlecock of fortune, while another puts him forward as having well and duly earned his title of "Charles the Victorious."

142-422. Paris: Société Bibliographique.

The events of the English invasion, and the murder of the Duke of Orleans by the dread-nought Duke of Burgundy, followed by the civil war that was destined to a duration of twenty years, with but brief intervals of truce, are familiar to most readers; while the grand and terrible episode of Jeanne d'Arc, whose story is an indelible stain on both England and France, sets apart the historical period covered by the life of Charles VII. with special distinctness; it has, however, remained for M. de Beaucourt to invest every portion of it with vital interest, and to give to that far past vividness and solidity that fill it with actual interest. His record of the political and military events that occurred between 1417 and 1422 is very full, and will present to English readers, if not an unknown page of history, a novel picture, in which the figures are full of life and movement. The Duke of Burgundy plays a leading part in the events of this epoch, the author holding that he was exclusively guilty of the treason of inviting the intervention of Henry V., and that the Armagnac leaders were innocent of it. Paris at this period backed the enemies of order and legitimate right, and hailed John the Fearless, the excommunicated murderer of the Duke of Orleans, in unnatural alliance with the wicked Queen, as a hero and deliverer, after his relentless slaughter of the King's subjects in its streets and prisons. The King (only a name) and the Dauphin, against the Queen and the Duke, France successfully invaded by England,—what a drama is unfolded by the history of that terrible time! What great figures pass before the mind's eye of the reader of one eventful chapter, which includes the attack of John the Fearless upon Paris and his seizure of the persons of the King and Queen, and ends with the death of Charles (once le Bien Aimé), in 1422; and brings before us the figure of the victorious English King, at the very moment when his triumph seemed assured, and the proclamation of Henry VI. as King of France and England, at Saint-Denis. Few "strange stories of the deaths of kings" surpass that of Charles VI. in sadness. He died in solitude, a few servants, "des gens de petit estat," formed all the Court of the poor King, who had borne the burden of a weary life through only fifty-four years, just twenty more than those of the victor of Agincourt, whom he outlived two months. "At his death," says M. de Beaucourt, "the popular sentiment, long repressed in Paris by the Burgundian and English domination, broke out." The following extract from the Journal d'un Bourgeois de Paris is an echo of the general regret:—"Ah, très cher Prince, jamais n'aurons si bon, jamais ne te verrons! Maldicte soit la mort! Jamais n'aurons que la guerre, puisque tu nous as laissé. Tu vas en repos; nous demeurons, en toute tribulation et en toute douleur." The madness of Charles the Well Beloved did not altogether obscure the qualities, rare indeed in history, which called forth the tribute of the funeral oration recorded in Fillastre's Histoire de la Thoyson d'Or:—"Bien lui est pour vray ce nom donné, car de tous les hommes qui estoient en son tems, grans et petis, ne fut oncques plus humain de lui, plus clement, ne plus aimable. En ses paroles, ne profera oncques villain mot d'aultrui. En ses faits, il se débitoit faire bien et plaisir à chascun." Even a glimpse of clemency and humanity is welcome, amid the cruelty, mercilessness, violence, and rapine of that age.

The plan of M. de Beaucourt's work is simple; he gives in a condensed chapter the events of a certain period, and follows that by several chapters in which all the incidents grouped in the foregoing are treated in detail, with a fullness of discussion, illustration, and association leaving nothing to be desired. The summary chapters would make an excellent small history in themselves. The full detail of the Dauphin's actions during the interval between his entrance on the scene of public life and his flight from the capital in 1418, not to re-enter it for nineteen years, disproves the formerly most accredited version of his character; that which represented him as "un roi sans caractère, sans valeur personnelle spectateur inerte et indifférent des grandes choses accomplies de son temps." At first he may have been little more than a puppet, because he was little more than a child, and he had to face a condition of disaster constantly augmented by fresh calamities; but the record of the Dauphin from 1418 is certainly not that of an "effacé." The circular which he issued from Bourges to the Princes and the cities in June, 1418, calling upon them to render him obedience, and to pay no heed to anything issued under the Great Seal, which had been carried off by the rebels, is a noble document, and there is abundant evidence of his personal activity and actual rule. A great trust in God and in the People, fidelity to his word, and simple courage without anything of the "fanfaron" about it, would seem to have been the chief notes of the character of the royal youth; that he became moody and suspicious as he grew in years is not surprising, considering his blood and his early experiences. A chapter devoted to his campaigns, to the taking of Tours, the march on Burgundy, the negotiations with the Parisians and then with the Court, the three months' truce with Henry V., the Treaty of Troyes, and the dawn of a reconciliation with the Duke of Burgundy—destined to lead to the crime of the Bridge of Montereau—is of great interest; and it is succeeded by a careful exposition of the character and conduct of John the Fearless, which leads up with dramatic skill to the scene of the murder, narrated by M. de Beaucourt in all its details. Was the young Dauphin guilty or not guilty of planning and preparing that retributive crime? M. de Beaucourt believes in his innocence, and supports his view by very strong arguments, adding that those who endeavoured to incriminate the Prince were formally given the lie by even the most hostile of his contemporaries. The author holds that "all was fortuitous in the event of Montereau," and indeed it is not difficult to believe that it may have been so, for the time was one when the blow followed the word with electrical swiftness, and a murderous fray was an every-day occurrence. But for the formal retribution, so impressive to the popular imagination and fascinating to the historian's mind, by which the treacherous murderer was held to have perished by treachery, that explanation might long ago have been accepted. When Francis I. passed through Dijon in 1521, he was shown the skull of John the Fearless. "Sire," said the monk who pointed out the hole in the skull, "that is the hole through which the English passed into France,"—a clever saying, but not quite true. The English had held a firm footing in France—and were much beholden to Duke John for it—for two years before the murder of the Duke of Orleans was expiated at Montereau. The result of the incident was frightfully disastrous to the Dauphin and to France; hostilities were eagerly renewed by the Burgundians, who allied themselves with the English, and France became the wretched victim of the fierce and protracted straggle. One of the finest passages of M. de Beaucourt's work is a description of the dreadful state of the country and the sufferings of the people. The history of the war from its outbreak to the Treaty of Arras is deeply interesting, but its most important features and its grandest figure—Joan of Arc—belong to the second epoch of the work; they have to do with the Dauphin, not with the King. Amid the violence and the misery of the time, we get glimpses of poetry, pageantry, and splendour which brighten up the scene; for instance, at the marriage of the Prince with his long-betrothed Marie of Anjou, and that of the subsequently famous Bastard of Orléans with the daughter of Louvet, President of Provence. It is a curious trait of the times, that when the Dauphin's marriage took place, in April, 1422, he was actually King of France, his father having died at Saint Quentin in the preceding October; but he was not apprised of the fact until April 24th, and on the 30th he assumed the royal title. Here M. de Beaucourt pauses, to form an appreciation of the character of Charles, which we must reserve for a second notice, and completes his history of the Dauphin's regency by following, as no other historian has done (with the exception of M. Vallet de Vireville, who has not gone deeply into the subject), the relations of the Prince with foreign Powers, and also by an elaborate study of his internal administration of the kingdom.

THE LATEST VIEW OF MORMONISM.*

MR. PHIL ROBINSON has the art of saying common-place things in an amusing and effective manner; but for the most part, his sayings are far from being common-place. He knows a great deal, and uses his knowledge with a pertinence of illustration that is often exceedingly attractive. As a traveller, he looks with something better than curiosity at the smallest objects in nature, and is always ready, like Burns, to sympathise with his "fellow mortals," no matter how lowly their degree. In the present tour in the United States, the sight of a bird or a prairie-dog is sure to call forth a kindly or humorous word, and though the progress "from pig to pork" in Chicago is said to be so rapid as to be even ludicrous, one can imagine Mr. Robinson feeling a touch of pity for the victim who, in thirty-five seconds from his last grunt, is hanging up in two pieces, "clean, tranquil, iced!"

* Sinners and Saints. A Tour across the States and round Them, with Three Months among the Mormons. By Phil Robinson. London: Samuel Low and Co. 1883.

Before getting to Utah and the Mormons, about whom the author has much to say that will be new to most readers, it may not be amiss to linger a little on the way. One of the first things that struck him in passing from New York to Chicago was the dearth of small wild life, when compared not only with England, which is so full of birds that all other countries seem by comparison birdless, but also with Europe and parts of the East. This remark is made on approaching Philadelphia, but at Chicago the sparrow, at least, thrives abundantly; further west, he lost it, and saw none between Omaha and Salt Lake City. Mr. Robinson's recollections of Omaha, the former capital of Nebraska, are not pleasant. "Before breakfast," he writes, "I saw a murder and suicide, and between breakfast and luncheon a fire and several dog-fights. Perhaps I might have seen something more, but a terrible dust-storm raged in the streets all day. Besides, I went away." And the dreariness of the country between Omaha and Denver Junction is said to be almost inconceivable. A weary journey through a land of desolation brought the traveller to Denver, which "must surely be one of the most beautiful towns in the States," and passing thence to Leadville there were glimpses of scenery never to be forgotten. Of this mining town a curious story is told. The police had just arrested two young ladies, one for wearing a sunflower in place of a hat, and the other for walking along with a tall lily in her hand, a sight which caused too much excitement among the Leadville youth. "I told Oscar Wilde of this a few days later. 'Poor, sweet things!' said he, 'martyrs in the cause of the beautiful.' He was on his way to Salt Lake City at the time, and I told him how the Mormon capital was, par excellence, 'the city of sunflowers;' assured him that the poet's feeding on 'gillyflowers rare' was not, after all, too violent a stretch of imagination, as whole tribes of Indians (and Longfellow himself has said that every Indian is a poem, which is very nearly the same thing as a poet) feed on the sunflower. The apostle of art decoration was delighted. 'Poor, sweet things,' said he, 'feed on sunflowers! How charming! If I could only have stayed and dined with them! But how delightful to be able to go back to England, and say that I have actually been in a country where whole tribes of men live on sunflowers! The preciousness of it!" Mr. Robinson adds that the seeds of the flower are made into an oil-cake for the benefit of the Red Man,—a fact, we suppose, too prosaic to be related to Mr. Wilde. That every man in the States, no matter whether black or white, should be called a gentleman, and every woman a lady, is extremely irritating to Mr. Robinson. He fears the meaning of the words will degenerate. "For myself," he says, "I adopted the plan of addressing every negro servant as a 'Sultan.' It was not abusive, and sounded well. He did not know what it meant, any more than he knows the meaning of 'gentleman,' but I saved my self-respect by not pretending to put him on an equality with myself." Sometimes, by the way, Mr. Robinson, who is fond of pleasant little jokes, reminds us too strongly of former humorists, and on one page the well-known reply to a man who boasted that he was self-made is imitated in this feeble fashion:—"I should think the Chinese were all self-made men. At any rate, they do not seem to me to have been made by any one who knew how to do it properly."

The greater portion of the volume is devoted to the Mormons, and we shall endeavour so to condense the author's elaborate account of these strange people as to convey the impression he derived from his residence among them. It will be seen that in many important respects it directly contradicts the statements of travellers, as well as of men and women once Saints who have returned to the Gentiles. In two points alone does the author agree with the opponents of Mormonism; he detests polygamy, and he allows that the women of Utah are not happy, in our acceptance of the word. "Polygamy," or as the Mormons prefer calling it, Plurality, is the most prominent feature of the system. Let us hear first of all what Mr. Robinson has to say about it. We read that it is not compulsory, and that some of the leading Saints are monogamous; that though accepted as a doctrine of the Church, it is not generally acted upon, and will before long be impossible except to the rich; "a twenty-dollar bonnet is a staggering argument against it." At the same time, we are told, in the strong language of a believing Mormon, that plurality is a revelation from God. "The United States," said the man, "cannot do more than exterminate us for not abandoning plurality. But God can and will damn us to all eternity, if we do abandon it." From which we gather that there are ultra strict as well as latitudinarian believers in the Mormon camp. Mr. Robinson thinks that, holding this belief, it is pure nonsense to ask the Mormons to give up polygamy and keep the rest, but his own statements give abundant proof that the creed is not held tenaciously. One day, for instance, he was talking to two ladies, plural wives, and expressed his fear that Mormon girls were not free to choose between monogamy and polygamy, plurality being a religious duty:—

"'Nonsense,' said the elder of the two, 'I was just as free to choose my husband as you were to choose your wife. I married for love.' 'And do you really believe,' broke in the other, 'that any woman in the world would marry a man she did not like from a sense of religious duty?' 'Yes,' said I, regardless of the fair speaker's scorn; 'I thought plenty of women had done so. More than that, thousands have renounced marriage with men whom they loved, and taken the veil, for Heaven's sake.' 'Very true,' was the reply, 'a woman may renounce marriage and become a nun, as a religious duty. But the same motive would never have persuaded that woman to marry against her inclinations. There is all the difference in the world between the two. Any woman will tell you that.'"

Mr. Robinson is convinced that the women of Utah do not, as a rule, object to possessing a second or third share in a husband's affections, and he gives some cases of recent polygamy, in support of his opinion. Two or three may be worth quoting:—

"A young and very pretty girl in the 'upper ten' of Mormonism married a young man of her own class, but stipulated before marriage that he should marry a second wife as soon as he could afford to do so. . . . Two girls were great friends, and one of them getting engaged to a man (by no means of prepossessing appearance), persuaded her friend to get engaged to him too, and he married them both on the same day. . . . A girl distracted between her love for her suitor and her love for her mother, compromised in her affections by stipulating that he should marry both her mother and herself, which he did."

Such instances are not rare, and a Mormon lady told Mr. Robinson she could name scores of the same kind. This problem of polygamy he considers "provocative and unapproachable," and one, therefore, which the United States Government had better leave alone.

Of the morality of Mormon men and the modesty of Mormon women, the author writes with unmeasured praise. "I can assure my readers," he says, "that the standard of public morality among the Mormons of Utah is such as the Gentiles among them are either unable or unwilling to live up to," and he adds that morality has a safeguard in the strict surveillance of the Church. Drunkenness is almost unknown; in many of the Mormon villages neither wine nor spirits are sold, and Mr. Robinson "never ceased to be struck by the modest decorum of the women" he met with out of doors. He was greatly pleased by his visit to Logan, a Mormon settlement with a population of 4,000 and a police force of two men, who are free from duty on Sundays and on "meeting evenings." It is a town without crime (there is not a licence for liquor in the place), and the industry of the emigrants has made it "surpassing in its beauty":—

"The clear streams, perpetually industrious in their loving care of lowland and meadow and orchard, and so cheery, too, in their incessant work, are a type of the men and women themselves; the placid cornfields lying in bright levels about the houses are not more tranquil than the lives of the people; the tree-crowded orchards and stack-filled yards are eloquent of universal plenty; the cattle loitering to the pasture contented, the foals all running about in the roads, while the waggons which their mothers are drawing stand at the shop door or field gate, strike the new-comer as delightfully significant of a simple country life, of mutual confidence, and universal security. And yet I had not come there in the humour to be pleased, for I was not well. But the spirit of the place was too strong for me, and the whole day ran on by itself in a veritable idyll. A hen conveying her new pride of chickens across the road, with a shepherd dog loftily approving the expedition, in attendance; a foal looking into a house over a doorstep, with the family cat, outraged at the intrusion, bristling on the stoop; two children planting sprigs of peach blossoms in one of the roadside streams; a baby peeping through a garden-wicket at a turkey-cock which was hectoring it on the side-walk for the benefit of one solitary supercilious sparrow—such were the little vignettes of pretty nonsense that brightened my first walk in Logan."

Of Nephi, another settlement, the traveller has a similar story to tell, and there his host is said to be a good illustration of what Mormonism can do for a man:—

"In Yorkshire he was employed in a slaughtering-yard, and thought himself lucky if he earned twelve shillings a week. The Mormons found him, 'converted' him, and emigrated him. He landed in Utah without a cent in his pocket, and in debt to the Church besides. But he found every one ready to help him, and was ready to help himself, so that to-day he is one of the most substantial men in Nephi, with a mill that cost him $10,000 to put up, a shop and a farm, a house and orchard and stock. His family, four daughters and a son, are all settled round him and thriving, thanks to the aid he gave them—"but," said he, "if the Mormons had not found me, I should still have been slaughtering in the old country, and glad, likely, to be still earning my twelve shillings a week."

The material prosperity of the Mormons is beyond question, and their friendly and honourable conduct to the Indians, possibly forced on them by circumstances, contrasts favourably with the course pursued in many instances by the American Government. Mr. Robinson's final judgment of the people is that they are sober, industrious, God-fearing men, and he avers that never in his life has he come into contact "with more consistent piety, sobriety, and neighbourly charity":—

"It is a fact, and cannot be challenged, that the only people in all Utah who libel these Mormons are either those who are ignorant of them, those who have apostatized (frequently under compulsion from the Church), or those, the official clique and their sycophants, who have been charged with looking forward to a share of the plunder of the Territorial treasury. On the other hand, I know many Gentiles, who though, like myself, they consider polygamy itself detestable, speak of this people as patterns to themselves in commercial honesty, religious earnestness, and social charity."

The author's view of Mormon life has the merit of originality, and he may be right in saying that no Englishman has hitherto had the opportunities he enjoyed of estimating it correctly. His statements are not wholly free from the perplexity he attributes to the subject. That they are impartial we do not doubt, but it is difficult to reconcile the fact that every Mormon is under the strict supervision of the church, one of the main doctrines of the church being polygamy, with the assertion that Mormon women are free to take what course they please with regard to matrimony. This is but one point among many likely to perplex a reader whose judgment of Mormonism as a social and political organisation is based on earlier authorities. It is possible there has been much misrepresentation, but it is scarcely possible that the unfavourable opinion formed of the Utah saints is wholly due to prejudice and calumny. On the other hand, if we may judge from statistics (see pp. 72-73), the writer's assertions are not without a firm basis. Certainly the kindness showed to Mr. Phil Robinson by the Mormons has been amply repaid in this volume, and every reader will be glad to receive the impressions of so shrewd and yet friendly an observer.

SOME BOOKS ABOUT SCOTLAND.*

In saying that there is a little of Dryasdust in Dr. Anderson's thought and style, we mean nothing depreciatory; on the contrary, we doubt much if he would have produced such a good book on Pagan Scotland if either the one or the other had been more ambitious. He is a pure archæologist, not a philosophical historian. He gives us no evidence that he is familiar with the museums of fact to be found in such writings as those of Grimm and Tylor, or with their enjoyable, if also somewhat audacious guesses at general truths. Through six lectures he plods carefully and honestly on, telling all he knows, and, in effect, all that is known, about Christian and Pagan, burials in Pagan times, Celtic art, and the famous Brochs, and other recent antiquarian "finds" in Scotland. When he pauses to reflect and speculate, he recalls the diligent and simple-minded scholar who, after long and patient reading of his book, takes off his spectacles, looks into the fire, and, after meditation, says naively, "I wonder if this is what these old fellows meant?" But if Dr. Anderson is not scientific, neither is he a dogmatist. He simply gives all the inferences as to Pagan life and customs which have naturally been drawn from recent discoveries of implements, ornaments, and the like in Scotland. This work is, however, emphatically the book of the Brochs, those ingeniously constructed strongholds, in the shape of circular towers of dry-built masonry, which are only to be found in Scotland, and of which the Broch of Mousa, in Shetland, is the most notable. Dr. Anderson's theory of the Brochs is that they were used as places for storing corn and food during war, and also as havens of shelter for women, children, and others not able or expected to fight; and there can be little doubt that he is right. Beyond question, the notion of turning a house outside in, placing its rooms within its walls, and turning all their windows towards the interior of the edifice, implies, as Dr. Anderson says, boldness of conception and fertility of resource:—

"The height of the wall, which effectually secured the inmates against projectiles, also removed its essentially weak upper part beyond reach of assault, while the pressure of its mass knit the masonry of the lower part firmly together, and its thickness made it difficult to force an entrance by digging through it, if such a wall could be approached for this purpose, when the whole of its upper materials were deadly missiles ready to the hands of the defenders. . . . The concentration of effort towards the main objects of space for shelter and complete security was never more strikingly exhibited, and no more admirable adaptation of materials so simple and common as undressed and uncemented stone for the double purpose has ever been discovered or suggested."

The articles found in the Brochs tell almost as interesting a story as the strongholds themselves; and there is no happier, perhaps because there is no more imaginative, passage in this work than that in which Dr. Anderson tells what he believes to have been the life spent in these strange interiors. As a storehouse of information upon the iron age in Scotland, Dr. Anderson's volume is, indeed, as valuable as in style it is unpretentious. Its beauty of type and wealth of illustration also deserve a word of hearty commendation.

Neither Mr. Mackay's volume on the "Poetry and Humour of the Scottish Language," nor Mr. Hood's on "Scottish Characteristics," is quite satisfactory; there is more than a suspicion of book-making about both. Mr. Mackay supplies a good deal of entertainment, but he should have styled his work "A Selection, with Annotations, from Jamieson's Scotch Dictionary," or at the best, "Poetical and Humorous Scotch Words, arranged in alphabetical order," with illustrations. It is a conglomeration of etymology and patriotism, the one rather far-fetched and the other decidedly provincial. Mr. Mackay has a perfect mania, indeed, for Celtic etymologies; thus, to take one of his first derivations, why trace back airles or airle-penny (the money given beforehand by way of clinching a bargain) to the Gaelic iarlas or earlas, when the Latin arrha will naturally occur to almost every reader? Sydney Smith talked great nonsense, no doubt, if he was not simply indulging in "chaff," when he spoke about the inability of Scotchmen to understand a joke; but it is no answer to him to say that his humour is inferior to Christopher North's. Smith's humour is precisely of that English variety that is most appreciated by sensible and earnest Scotchmen, who hold, with Balthasar Gracian, that "Jest may have its little hour, but let all the rest be given to seriousness." For it is generally used as a vehicle to convey weighty argument to the head; it is a sauce, and does not pretend to do duty as a solid. It is the ethereal humour of Charles Lamb that Scotchmen of this type, including even Carlyle, cannot understand, and lose all patience with. Such will probably not thank Mr. Paxton Hood for the attitude he seems to adopt towards them and their country. He appears too much in the character of Dick Swiveller's "being of brightness and beauty," who, having discovered some interesting savage tribes, is bent on making known their oddities to his civilised brethren. One almost hears him murmuring, ecstatically, "Those dear old Scotch ladies!" or, "Such quaint creatures these Scotch ministers must have been!" or asking, "Now, isn't that an awfully good story?" Scottish Characteristics is, indeed, a rather poor and padded book. Mr. Hood says that when he read Dean Ramsay's Reminiscences, which he characteristically described as "pleasant," "I thought—what, no doubt, many will think as they lay down this volume—how much has been omitted!" But the Dean's book is a much more substantial one than this, which is swollen out with long quotations, as from Scott's Antiquary, and from poetry, a good deal of this last being of a rather inferior character. It must be added that Mr. Hood's attempts to interpret Scotch speech by English spelling are not always successful. It is only fair to him, however, to say that he has evidently taken a genuine and keen delight in his self-appointed task of discovering and analysing "Scottish characteristics," and that some of his new stories illustrative of these—stories that are, at all events, new to us—are worthy to be placed alongside of Dean Ramsay's. Mr. Hood quotes the prayer, "Lord, we pray thee to remember the Magistracy of Lochmaben, such as they are!" The sarcasm here is obvious, and was probably intentional. The present writer can vouch for the accuracy of the following prayer, uttered in the presence of the magistrates of a town in the South of Scotland, who were being "churched" after election,—“Lord, bless all in authority over us, from the Queen on her throne, to the meanest burgh magistrate that wields the local sword!” In this case, the sarcasm was absolutely unintentional.

Mr. Scrope's Deer-Stalking in the Scottish Highlands is a reprint; but for nine readers in ten it will have all the charm of a new work. It is, in truth, a delightful book. Its subject is deer-stalking, in days when there were deer-hounds and when there was no Highland Railway, and it abounds in anecdotes and graphic descriptions, mixed up with shrewd advice about food, drink, clothing, and everything associated with sport of the old-fashioned kind. Mr. Scrope is (perhaps we should say was) a natural writer, whose strong point is digression, and whose writing, like the talk of Praed's Vicar, "is like a stream which runs with rapid change from rocks to roses." A very different book, of course, is Surgeon-General Munro's Reminiscences of Military Service with the 93rd Sutherland Highlanders, and it may seem to be straining a point to include it in a notice of books about Scotland. But it is very largely a book about Scotchmen, especially Scotchmen who served in the Crimea and in India during the Mutiny, from Lord Clyde downwards. It is full, too, of Scotch traits, if not of Scotch characteristics. The writer has this in common with Mr. Scrope, that his style is simple and unaffected. He can tell a pathetic incident with simple force.

BURKE'S HISTORICAL PORTRAITS.*

MR. BURKE opens his third volume with several chapters of notes on the last stages in the life of Cranmer, and he closes it with a similar series of remarks on events in the life of John Knox. These are the two greatest Protestant names of the period, and Mr. Burke takes care to mark his sense of their bad pre-eminence. We observe with satisfaction that he acknowledges in general terms the scandalous injustice and inhumanity of the proceedings connected with the trial, condemnation, and execution of Cranmer. We should have expected, however, that he would take up the historical difficulties and the legal questions point by point, and present a clear and definite argument. Instead of this, we do not find even a regular narrative,—only a selection of events, neither proportionably treated nor well arranged, and further confused by the interjection of paragraphs of other matter. It is difficult enough, no doubt, to express in a single sentence the substance of Cranmer's reply on his arraignment before the Special Commission at Oxford, in September, 1555, but there was no need to cram it into a single sentence. To say that it was "to the effect that at no time did he believe in the principles of the Catholic Church, although he had repeatedly sworn to those principles with the most open solemnity, and sent men to the stake for not maintaining them" (the italics are the author's), seems to us a representation of the facts incapable of acceptance by any fair-minded student. Mr. Burke also quotes a couple of pages of Dr. Martyn's examination of Cranmer, on which he grounds some adverse and conveniently vague criticism of Cranmer's answers; but he neglects to refer to the doubts that have been thrown upon this document, and to mention what Cranmer himself has left on record about it. Leaving aside the point that the answers were made extemporaneously and under protest as extra-judicial, we should have liked Mr. Burke to deal with this statement:—"After I had made mine answer, I required to have a copy of the same, that I might, either by adding thereunto, or by altering or taking from it, correct and amend it as I thought good; the which though both the Bishop of Gloucester and also the King and Queen's proctors promised me, yet have they altogether broken promise with me, and have not permitted me to correct my said answers according to my request." In relating the disputation at Oxford before Dr. Weston, Mr. Burke is constrained to admit that Cranmer, though "unprepared, made an able display of learning and research;" but he cannot abide Foxe's statement that Cranmer triumphed over Harpsfield, and leaves the question to the reader's judgment with a significant implication. Why did he not quote a couple of pages for the convenience of the reader? Most unfortunate of all is his shirking of any attempt to deal seriously with the difficulties of Cranmer's alleged recantations. Mr. Burke has the grace to give up all defence of Bonner, but he maintains unshaken confidence in Pole's character, imagines that Wharton refutes Burnet, and retreats under cover of the assurance that "the latest researches prove that the [sixth] recantation was solely the composition of Cranmer himself." But why does he not inform us where to lay our hands on those "latest researches"? Are they his own? And what are the results based on? In discussing the recantations of Reformers, Mr. Burke should not require to be reminded of a certain episode in the history of "the Prince of the Apostles."

Mr. Burke's treatment of John Knox also exemplifies strongly his characteristic method of discovering and declaring the truth of history. For how is it possible for him to look in mercy on "that runagate Scot," as Dr. Weston called him, whose influence modified the Book of Common Prayer to such deep offence of the Papists; this irreconcilable and unconquerable foe, the one man but for whose efforts "neither the wisdom of Elizabeth's Ministers nor the teaching of her Bishops, nor her own chicaneries, would have preserved England from revolution." The Reformation in Scotland, as Carlyle says, was not a smooth business; but that need not be relied on as any excuse for unnecessary harshness and violence in Knox. Still less, however, can such violence outweigh all results of the movement. If Knox's example and teaching issued in a certain sternness, narrowness, and even fanaticism, it generated a feeling that purified and elevated, that nerved the body to endure and the mind to aspire, and whose beneficent force is not yet within measurable distance of exhaustion. But from Mr. Burke's point of view, Knox's influence was wholly disastrous. He traces the origin of the movement in Scotland to the lower and middle classes, whom he describes as "immoral, superstitious, needy, grasping, and dishonest." True. And does he not see what a terrible indictment he thereby brings against the Church under whose sway the people lived in this deplorable condition? Can he fail to see that the friends of the Reformation will point to the later character of the same people as the justification of Knox, in spite of all his violence? On the reasons why the nobles joined the Reformation, we may have opportunity to touch on some future occasion; meantime, we must ask Mr. Burke's readers to refer to the ipsissima verba of McCrie, and to include the sentence that follows what Mr. Burke incorrectly quotes, so that there may be no ambiguity as to the meaning. Again, Mr. Burke relates that Knox's mother was a milkmaid at the mansion of the Earl of Cassilis; that he became a student for the priesthood at the University of St. Andrew's, where he was well conducted and pious, yet turbulent; that he was ordained priest in 1530, and that "in some years later he secretly embraced the Reformation, but did not publicly proclaim his Protestant principles till 1542." Now, here is a row of alleged facts, covering about half a page, for not one of which is there any basis that a historian concerned for the truth of history can accept. One or two of the statements are made by McCrie, indeed, but later investigations have shown the insufficiency of the evidence. Once more, Mr. Burke informs us that "upon the death of his wife, Knox was soon 'on the outlook,' as George Douglas relates, 'for a comely young virgin to wife.' His second wife was Margaret Stewart, daughter of Lord Ochiltree." Very well, supposing Douglas's allegation substantially true, is it to be wondered that Knox should anxiously wish to have some one to bestow a mother's care on his two young children, while he himself was severely pressed with affairs of Church and State? But Mr. Burke says nothing of this possibility. Nor does his injurious mode of expression prepare the uninitiated reader to hear without surprise that Knox's second marriage did not take place till more than three years after his first wife's death. The suggestion of the text is most-disappointing. "Further," says Mr. Burke, "the real facts of the case were that the young lady was a fanatic, and became a perfect slave to her tyrannical, gross-minded, old husband. Nothing, in fact, more clearly establishes the nature of John Knox than his brutal treatment of this sadly deluded young woman." Mr. Burke refers to no authority for these strongly-worded assertions, for a very sufficient reason. Other baseless calumnies we pass over. With regard to the intolerance of Knox, it is enough to point to the contemporary experience of every country of Western Europe. Their own "just experience" had taught the Lords of the Privy Council that Knox's policy was right. In some respects, Knox certainly misjudged Mary of Lorraine, but he took the true measure of the forces that she could not help representing. As to the unfortunate difficulty about her burial, Mr. Burke does not adhere to the authorities with historical strictness.

* Historical Portraits of the Tudor Dynasty and the Reformation Period. By S. Hubert Burke. Vols. III. and VI. London: John Hodges, 1883.

The smaller men are less severely handled. There is much, however, to provoke serious dissent in the chapter on "Clerics of the New Learning," although one is not sorry to see Mr. Burke do his worst on such men as Shaxton and Barlow. Latimer, in particular, is sadly misunderstood. Calvin, like all the others, is very inadequately estimated, apart from the episode of Servetus, which we do not by any means justify, although we should discuss it differently. The treatment of the men of the New and the Old Learning is of a piece with the rest. It is positively humorous to observe how gallantly our author shields Queen Mary from every breath of blame, at the expense of her Councils, and even to some extent of her Consort. In regard to persecution of conscience, one can see, theoretically, how miserably misguided both parties were; but we must not lay the flattering unction to our souls that we should ourselves have done otherwise, or that the persecuting spirit is yet extinguished. Mr. Burke's professions, however, do him much honour; he absolutely refuses to palliate persecution by any one—except for the extermination of Communism. But he undertakes too heavy a task when he attempts to prove the guiltlessness of the Church, arguing from the teaching of the Apostles and the solemn warnings of the early Pontiffs and fathers of the Church, and charging the wickedness upon worldly greed and ambition, rather than upon religion. It is obvious that in history practice is but too frequently divorced from principle. It is hopeless for Mr. Burke to demolish Puritan writers for malicious misrepresentations of the Council of Trent. He ought to know very well the meaning of the chorus of anathema against all heretics with which it closed. Down to the beginning of the last century the public opinion of Christendom undoubtedly justified the right and duty of civil government to support orthodoxy and punish heresy, even to the death; and this right was universally exercised. The only difference of parties lay in the definition of heresy and in the severity of punishment.

Since the foregoing was written, the fourth and final volume of the series has been issued, and our hopes of Mr. Burke's literary and historical amendment are completely dashed. The chief portion of the fourth volume is occupied with Mary, Queen of Scots, and with Elizabeth. It is, we admit, quite natural that Mr. Burke should lose no opportunity of lauding Mary and saying hard things of her opponents. "The hatred of Elizabeth was of a demon class." "Never, perhaps, in any land appeared such evil beings as Scotland then presented amongst her so-called nobles, never such heartless treason or such brutal unmanliness and greed, all mainly directed against a queen not only unoffending, but one of the most generous and lovable of monarchs and women." A very strange situation of affairs, truly! But we must decline to enter into any further argument with Mr. Burke. For where is the good of discussing points of constitutional history with a writer who deliberately stigmatises Elizabeth as an usurper, denying that her claim to the English crown has been fairly proved—proved, that is to say, "according to the constitutional laws of civilised nations?" What have "the constitutional laws of civilised nations" to do with the matter? And what has Elizabeth's legitimacy or illegitimacy to do with the matter? Elizabeth's title was just as good as her sister's, and if she had been displaced by Mary, Queen of Scots, the latter would certainly have been an usurper, until her title had been legitimatised, as her son's was legitimatised later on, by the authority of Parliament, which was the firm basis of the title of Elizabeth. It is impossible to part with this extensive work without expressing a painful regret that so much labour and so much earnestness should have failed to win from us a more favourable recognition.

GLIMPSES OF OUR ANCESTORS IN SUSSEX.*

THIS is a very entertaining book, and will be found to be so not merely by Sussex men, but by all who take an interest in the "auld lang syne" of provincial habits and customs. The first chapter, headed "The Sussex Diarists," is the best, and we shall reserve our notice of this excellent pièce de résistance till we have glanced rapidly through its successors. The second, headed "The Sussex Ironmasters," brings very vividly before us the fact, which many have heard and many have forgotten, that there was a time when "sleepy Sussex" was the Wales and Warwickshire of England:—

"As the modern traveller," writes Mr. Fleet, "walks or rides through such villages as those of Waldron, Robertsbridge, Lamberhurst, Ardingly, Mayfield, Maresfield, Ewhurst, and Ashburnham, or rambles through the remains of Tilgate and St. Leonard's forests, and as his eyes and ears take in only the sights and sounds of rural life—the slow-going plough, the browsing sheep, and the heavy-looking labourers—how difficult it is to conceive that these places have known any other kind of life than that in which they now slumber! And yet these were the places that furnished his Majesty's stores with guns and shot, in the days when Rupert and Monk and the Duke of York thundered day after day against Van Tromp and De Ruyter,—nay, it was the forges and furnaces of the Sussex villages which furnished the ships of the Drakes and Hawkins and Frobishers with the artillery which they used so well against the floating castles of the Armada."

Of the many thousands who pass St. Paul's daily, how few are the units who are aware that the railings round the great Cathedral were manufactured in the Weald of Sussex. The last forge in that county was closed in 1809, and the immediate cause of it was the failure of the foundrymen, through intoxication, to mix chalk with the ore, by reason of which it ceased to flow, and the blasting was stopped, and never renewed again. "And so"—says Mr. Fleet, with a sigh—"so ended ignominiously the Sussex iron-works."

"The Sussex Smugglers" is the subject of the third chapter, interesting enough in itself, but too much a matter of common knowledge to call for any particular notice. In the fourth chapter, "the Southdown shepherd" feeds his flock on the short, sweet grass which has covered the unwooded downs "since the day," as Mr. Fleet puts it, with a little proleptic exaggeration, when "the rounded backs of the ribbed chalk began to show themselves 'dolphin-like' above the waves." This chapter almost deserves to be described as fascinating, and we are sorry, indeed, to read that the shepherds' "wide-sweeping Downs are being pressed upon by the plough, on one side, and building societies on the other."

In "Sussex Character Sketched from Life," Mr. Fleet draws with much graphic power life-like portraits of Mrs. Colly, "the Sussex Cottage-wife;" Clio Rickman, "the Old Sussex Radical;" Mr. Mason, the bookseller, "the Old Sussex Tory;" Charles Verral, of Seaford, "the Sussex Country Doctor;" and others. These portraits, we repeat, are drawn with much graphic power, and will well repay reading for their intrinsic merits. But we must remark that there is nothing whatever to differentiate them from similar types in other counties,—nothing, in fact, whereby the lineaments of any one of them would have to be altered, if for "Sussex" in every case we were to read Kent, or Surrey, or Hampshire. In the chapter on the "Sussex Regicides and their Contemporaries," there is an abundance of historical facts of local interest, but none to call for any special comment, unless it be the conduct of Colonel Morley, who was Lieutenant of the Tower when Monk began his march from Scotland. The famous John Evelyn was Morley's old school-fellow. He read the signs of the times far better than Morley could, and strongly urged him to anticipate the course which Monk in the end adopted. Morley, from what Evelyn calls "jealousie and feare," refused to follow his friend's advice, and the result was that the latter had to intercede for Morley's life. It was obtained at the cost of £1,000; and "O the sottish omission of this gentleman!" exclaims Evelyn, "what did I not undergo of danger in this negotiation, to have brought him over to his Majesty's interest, when it was entirely in his hands!" Hereupon, Mr. Fleet joins issue, and says that "it may well be doubted, with all due deference to Evelyn, whether the part taken by Colonel Morley was not more honourable than that of Monk." This, of course, raises the question as to what epithet Monk's conduct really deserves to be linked with,—a question barren enough, indeed, from an historical point of view, but since men are still disagreed about it, of some interest still, as an ethical "poser." The question, it must be remembered, does not turn upon the immediate motives which decided Monk. Those motives were, probably, sordid and selfish enough, but if the course which he took be considered the best and wisest and most patriotic that was open to him, it is conceivable that an honourable man like Morley might have reached Monk's conclusion from different premises.

Sussex is not a county of great and sensational crimes, so the chapter on "Sussex Tragedies and Romance" is rather tame. It is marked, however, by a crime which has nothing of the "penny dreadful" about it, but has much that is striking and curious, and in one respect at least instructive. This is the murder of Mr. Griffiths, a well-known Brighton brewer, which took place so recently as February, 1849. The story is told very fully, quietly, and effectively by Mr. Fleet, and will be read with great interest by those who are not previously acquainted with it.

Of the chapter on "Sussex Poets," we have this to say. The four genuine poets who were born in that county are, strictly speaking, not Sussex poets at all. They are English poets, and provincialism has no art or part in them. Otherwise, there would be no absurdity in regarding Shakespeare as a Warwickshire dramatist, and Milton and Byron as London bards. Mr. Fleet is well aware of this, and says:—

"In looking back over the careers of Fletcher, Otway, Collins, and Shelley, the reflection is provoked how little they were connected with the places, or even the county, in which they were born. Collins, indeed, returned to die in Chichester, and alone, of our four great poets, rests in his native soil. Even he passed the greater part of his life away from it; and as for Fletcher, Otway, and Shelley, they all left Sussex in early youth, never to return to it, and all lie amongst strangers. Nor do their works contain the slightest evidence that their thoughts ever reverted to their native soil. They gave themselves up, heart and soul, to the wider sphere to which they were attracted, and merged their provincialism in the larger atmosphere of literature."

There is, however, a flock of minor poets—since, by a convenient fiction, we call these verse-makers poets—who have won and may justly bear the title of "Sussex poets." They are neither better nor worse than their fellows in other counties, and Mr. Fleet has a good deal to tell us, which is not without interest, about Hayley and Hurdis and Charlotte Smith and Charles Crocker, who "all linger in Sussex, and take delight in singing the beauties of Nature and Art to be found in it,—beauties for which their greater brethren had no eye or ear." The final chapters deal with certain "Social Changes in Sussex." They are short and amusing, but require no special comment.

We may now return to the first chapter, and let Mr. Fleet introduce his "Sussex Diarists" to the reader. They are eight in number, and their diaries abound in facts which are more or less amusing and instructive. It will be sufficient, however, for our purpose, if we confine our remarks to one of them—Mr. Thomas Turner, general dealer, of East Hoathly. This worthy tradesman, for a worthy tradesman he undoubtedly was, albeit, as we shall see, by no means a sober one, is, in Mr. Fleet's words, "The first and foremost of our Sussex diarists, in diaristic ability, our Sussex Pepys, and possessing many of the qualities of that Prince of Diarists. He is intelligent, frank, open-speaking, rather fond of recording his own failings, disposed to be social, a good man of business, but yet with a decided bent towards literature. In all these points, Samuel Pepys, Secretary of the Admiralty, and Thomas Turner, grocer, draper, hatter, druggist, clothier, ironmonger, stationer, glover, undertaker, &c., resemble each other, although one enjoys a world-wide fame, and the other only a local reputation." We all know what Pepys did,—what Mr. Turner did was to fully describe the life of a Sussex rural tradesman in the middle of the eighteenth century,—and for this, says Mr. Fleet, with undeniable truth, "he ought to be held in high regard by all students of social history in England." As we have neither space nor inclination to construct a picture of Sussex life from the extracts which Mr. Fleet has given us from this diary, we shall merely copy two or three of these extracts, to whet the reader's appetite for more. The diary itself has been edited by Messrs. Blencowe and Lower, for the Sussex Archaeological Society. But the publications of Archaeological Societies have, for obvious reasons, a very limited circulation, and they are by no means easy of access. Judging, however, from the extracts made by Mr. Fleet, it seems highly probable that a cheap edition of Thomas Turner's diary would not be a bad speculation. It extends from February 8th, 1754, to June, 1765, when Mr. Turner married his second wife, and thenceforward, post hoc or propter hoc, ceased diarising. From the very commencement of the diary, we are brought face to face with the great social evil of those days,—excessive drinking. The subject is too well known to need illustration, but Mr. Turner's personal experiences are peculiar. In regard to this vice, he was emphatically a man of good intentions, but in practice stopped, like Lamb, "on this side of abstemiousness." Conscious that "a low, moderate rate of diet" was best for his health, Mr. Turner opens his diary with rules for the regimen of his health. His drinking rule is thus set forth: "If I am at home or in company abroad, I will never drink more than four glasses of strong beer, one to drink the King's health, the second to the Royal Family, the third to all friends, and the fourth to the pleasure of the company. If there is either wine or punch, never upon any terms or persuasion to drink more than eight glasses, each glass to hold no more than half a quarter of a pint." Enough, in all conscience, for a moderate man! Far from enough for Mr. Turner. "I went to the audit, and came home drunk," he writes, "but I think never to exceed to bounds of moderation more." Hope told a flattering tale, for close upon the above is the following:—"Sunday, 28th, went down to Jones', where we drank one bowl of punch and two mugs of bumboo, and I came home again in liquor." Mr. Fleet coyly declines to say what bumboo was, but we know from Smollett that it was a mixture of rum, sugar water, and nutmeg. The really difficult word in the above passage is "mugg." If we know how much that vessel held, for we can estimate the punch-bowl's measure approximately, we should know what amount of liquor it took to upset a seasoned cask in those days. But bad as these private and tête-à-tête tipplings are, they are nothing to what took place when the fun grew fast and furious, at the social "parties" of these grave tradesmen and farmers. We must leave the reader to peruse Mr. Turner's account of these festivities, merely remarking that the clergyman of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Porter, a man of learning, and, according to his lights, no doubt of piety, took part in them. One of the wildest took place at his own house, but because there was no swearing, for Mr. Porter drew the line at swearing, and had recently preached as good a sermon as Mr. Turner ever heard—it being against swearing—"Mr. Porter declared these nocturnal orgies to be 'innocent mirth;' but I," says Mr. Turner, with sententious sagacity, "in opinion differ much therefrom." It must be noticed, too, that in spite of all these excesses, Mr. Turner was a great reader, and diligent in business, for he carried on a very extensive trade, and it is recorded that his son and successor turned over £50,000, and in one or two years as much as £70,000 a year. Moreover, it does not appear that his health suffered from his excesses. The probable explanation of all this is that the beer, and wine, and spirits were really what they professed to be. And this very unpretending explanation will probably also account for the fact, which Mr. Lecky dwelt on in his History, that so long as a country is prosperous, however gross in manners it may be, and low in morals, crime is rare. Illustrations of this fact are given in Mr. Turner's Diary, and they are corroborated by the state of England to-day, when the close connection of crime and drinking is admitted on all sides. Mr. Tennyson has, no doubt, explained the difficulty of reconciling these apparently contradictory inferences, when he speaks, in Maud, of "the vitriol madness flashing up into the ruffian's brain." But here we must abruptly close our notice of this entertaining book. It has not been written for archæologists only and antiquaries, but for the general reader, to whom we can cordially recommend it. It would be unjust, too, not to say something in praise of the local printers, Messrs. Farncombe and Co., of Lewes, for the pains they have taken with this book. It consists of three hundred pages, legibly and accurately printed, on stout, serviceable paper, with the edges cut in the American fashion. It is strongly and handsomely bound, and the price is very moderate.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE Contemporary is not very interesting. The most original paper in it is a dream, called "Medusa," and after the most careful reading we have failed to obtain more than an uncertain hint of its drift. The writer, Mr. H. A. Kennedy, every now and then puts down thoughts even startlingly strong, as, for instance, in his suggestion that temptation is part of the mystery of pain; but he follows out nothing, wanders from thought to thought, and leaves his main idea still obscure. The paper interests like a clever conundrum, and its author has more powers than one; but the riddle is beyond our guessing. "Stepniak's" article on "Russia After the Coronation," adds little to political information. The author, who speaks for the Nihilists, intimates that for the moment the Revolutionary party has exchanged assassination for insurrection; but he gives no hint of his friends' plans, and breaks away into the usual denunciations of the administrative system of Russia. That is bad enough, probably, but Stepniak must surely exaggerate the facts. It is next to incredible that the peasantry, 77 per cent. of that immense population, are stripped of the whole produce of the soil by the tax-gatherers, yet this is what he says. He affirms that, but for wages, the peasant-owners could not live, that payments from peasant-owner to peasant-tenant are not infrequent, the small proprietor actually paying to be rid of his land, that the taxation constantly exceeds the rent, and that scarcely any cultivator has more than twenty-six roubles, say, £2 12s. a year, left for his support. In other words, the Russian moujik is poorer than the poorest Indian ryot. The statement is visibly exaggerated, but there may be provinces in which things are very bad, and we know from the example of Ireland how deeply any pauperised district affects the imagination of observers. If the taxation bears anything like this proportion to produce, society in Russia must be in a very unstable condition, and the richer landowners in great danger. Mr. Howell shows, in a clear statistical paper on the finance of Trades Unions, that the great Unions survived the terrible depression of 1876-1881 partly by reducing their accumulations, and partly by the system of taxation known as "levies." When the depletion of their balances looks dangerous, they raise a "levy" of so many pence a head, which puts them comparatively straight again. The system has the merit of expansiveness, and of virtually creating reserves while leaving them in the pockets of the Unionists, but the demerit of making taxation heaviest at the end of a long depression. That objection seems economically fatal, but the managers cling to their "levies," and we suppose the truth to be this. Rates heavy enough to make the balances always safe would in bad years create more hostility, the funds being visibly rich, than the levies do. The workmen will be taxed to save their Unions, but not to keep them continuously prosperous. The hotter Sacerdotalists will not be pleased with the Rev. Edwin Hatch's account of the origin of tithes. He traces them to certain Carlovingian legislation for the benefit of the Frankish warriors, who took the Church lands on payment of a tenth. This payment was subsequently extended to all freeholders, the State finding it necessary to support not only the clergy, but the poor; and, when fully established, the resemblance to the Levitical tithe was insisted upon till it became an article of faith. Mr. Hatch should have given more illustrations of his theory, and altogether have made his essay less sketchy. Mrs. Haweis is discursive and amusing on "The Colours and Cloths of the Middle Ages," explaining most of the earlier English names for both with much cleverness. We wish, however, she had recognised more fully the reluctance of early times to recognise fine shades. In England, as in Bengal at the present moment, "red" meant anything from orange up to what we should now call "claret" colour, or to dark brown; and to this hour most of the shades are named not by arbitrary words, but by something which shows the shade intended. "Blue" is a name, but violet, pink, gold, lilac, &c., are only descriptive words. The fact seems to suggest that all the shades are comparatively new, invented or perceived since language had stiffened itself. There must have been, however, some bluntness in the common folks' perception of colours. The most instructive essay in the number is Mr. Jenkins's, on "Young Serbia," from which we extract the following:—

"When we compare the state of things under old Milosch, the father of Prince Michael, who was succeeded by the present Sovereign, with that which exists to-day, we see how remarkable has been the advance of the Serbians in political ideas and organisation. The able and imperious old Prince rarely resorted to the popular assembly. When he did, it was in characteristic fashion. The assembly met in the open air. The constituents came up to the meeting in crowds, escorting their representatives, and resolved to have something to say on the matters in hand. As many as ten thousand persons would assemble. Pigs were roasted in large quantities for their entertainment. Milosch came out and harangued them, telling them what he meant to do, and what he desired of them. His proposals were carried by acclamation, without useless expenditure of verbiage. The multitude then ate their pigs and drank their slivovitz, and went home with a sense of duty discharged to God and the country. Thus, within living memory, Europe had actually working under its eyes primitive institutions similar to those described in a memorable passage in Tacitus, and resembling those that preceded the oldest European constitution. From that to the parliamentary government of Serbia in 1883 is a long stride, and ages have been passed in a few years."

Under the present Constitution the Prince appoints one Member, and as he may appoint any one he likes, while the people cannot elect either a functionary or a lawyer, all the Members competent to govern are his nominees. This, however, is shortly to be altered; but the peasant electors, though they have fine elements of character, are not yet fit to govern. They are being educated, but at present, when they go to church, they stop outside. They are content to be certain that service for their benefit is going on, and see no necessity for stepping out of the air and light,—the most separate thing in the way of piety we have seen for some time.

Mr. Gladstone opens the Nineteenth Century with a translation of Cowper's hymn, "Hark, my Soul," into Italian, of which Italian scholars must judge; and Earl Grey and Mr. H. O. Arnold-Forster contribute two political articles. Earl Grey reiterates his old view that the Land Act has injured Ireland by sapping the security of property (as if the tenant had no property), and that the Government should do nothing beyond securing order, and removing obstacles to industry. As the Liberals believe that this is exactly what they are doing, the paper will convince few. Mr. Arnold-Forster shows by statistics how greatly British commerce depends upon her Colonial Empire, deprecates any idea of throwing the Colonies off, pleads for more considerate treatment of colonists when they make complaints, and would take every opportunity of deepening the social relations between the Colonies and England. He would, in particular, allow them a share in the administration of India, include them in the Penny Post—an admirable suggestion—and, so far as possible, extend to all the English law. Mr. Arnold, in fact, favours the federation of the Empire, though by an informal method, and if it can be attained without limiting the independent action of the Mother-country, most Liberals will be favourable to his ideas. Mr. Bromley-Davenport is ecstatic upon "Salmon Fishing," and thinks the world will be interested to know how he lost a big fish in a Norwegian fiord, whereas it will only wonder why he did not expand his most interesting description of the mountain ring round his Norwegian home, and of that especial cliff, which the peasants say can be seen through, and which he and they expect some day to overwhelm them. Mr. Kegan Paul contends ably for the admission of laymen to the head masterships of the public schools. The head masters, he contends, are no longer responsible for the religious instruction of the boys, and, in fact, do nothing clerical which could not be equally well done by a chaplain. We doubt that proposition greatly, believing that the chaplain, unless a master of standing, would be no more attended to than the chaplain in a prison, but with the main argument we cordially agree. The clerical monopoly limits too greatly the field of selection, and tends every day to limit it still more. Ameer Ali defends the effort of the Government of Bengal to strengthen the ryots' defences against eviction, but enters into details better discussed on the spot; and Mr. H. A. Jones, in language rather too high-flown, discusses the prospects of the modern drama. He thinks its present state deplorable, mainly because managers want to make their theatres pay, but sees ground of hope in the response of audiences to the closer demands on their attention made occasionally by the better playwrights. He expects, however, far too great a future for the drama, and forgets how many of its old functions have been assumed by other agencies, more especially the newspaper and the novel. Mr. W. H. Russell describes life in Ischia as it was before the earthquake most pleasantly, showing incidentally how deep and strong was the fear of residents that a catastrophe would occur; and General MacDougall states the result of his long experience as to recruiting. He is in favour of short service, of keeping steadily a full supply of men with the colours—say, as the lowest minimum, 700 per battalion—and of improving the position of non-commissioned officers. We are inclined to believe that the key to improvement is in the latter reform, and that if a serjeant's position could be made really attractive, more men and better men would at once enter the ranks, in the hope of attaining it. General MacDougall believes that the great grievance of the men to-day is over-work, arising usually from the thinness of the battalions. We have noticed Mr. Justice Fry on "Inequalities in Punishment" elsewhere, and do not find M. Joseph Reinach on "Republican Prospects" what Madame Mohl used to call "nourishing." The best part of his paper is the chapter on M. Clémenceau, in whom he disbelieves. He thinks him able, witty, and honest, but not a statesman or a great man in any way.

The Fortnightly is, on the whole, the most readable magazine of this month, though we note symptoms in it, as in all its rivals, that the multiplication of such publications is exhausting the ability available for them. The editors become more ready to accept poor papers by good names, and the writers become more tempted to force ideas out of themselves when they do not spontaneously arise. "Politics in the Lebanon," by "An English Resident," is evidently written by some one with an unusual interest in Syria. He affirms that France is steadily trying to extend her position in the

Lebanon, and to extend her protectorate of the Catholic Christians, which is diplomatically acknowledged, into a direct political protectorate of all classes, to be followed by annexation. To this end, she insisted on the departure of Rustem Pasha, who had governed so well, and endeavoured to force her own nominee on the Porte. This intrigue was defeated, and Wassa Pasha, an impartial and strong man, was appointed Governor-General; but France has not given up her project, and the "Resident" wishes to know whether England intends to assume a "bellicose attitude." England, we suspect, hardly recognises that anything is going on, and certainly does not expect a French annexation of Syria. When she does, she will probably have something to say, especially if she has herself quitted Egypt. The paper, though very interesting, is a curious illustration of the extent to which even able men believe the place in which they are interested the pivot of the world. The Baron de Malortie criticises sharply British policy in Egypt, from the point of view of a man who believes that in the East high-handed justice is the best policy, that England ought to stay in Egypt, or, at least, to announce that she will support her system, and that the financial burden ought to have been attacked first. We do not see anything novel in his statements, but he affirms that the yield of Egyptian land is over-estimated, that the taxation now crushes the peasantry, who pay their imposts with borrowed money, and that the usurers are the curse of the country. It is much of it true, we believe, but we are puzzled with one fact. If the land is so over-taxed, why are usurers competing to lend money on the security of that land? Mrs. Armytage's paper on dress has, at least, this advantage, that it has no moral; but it is not very interesting, though her conclusion that taste in female dress is improving will attract lady readers. She does not, however, explain the main causes of the improvements, which are the development of taste in colour, a development so great that it sometimes seems as if the new generation had acquired a sixth sense, an instinctive perception of harmony, the spread of the idea of fitness between the person and the dress, and the introduction of soft, pliable stuffs which make folds, instead of creases. Mrs. Armytage contends that really fine dressing cannot be accomplished cheaply, since perfect fitting is a highly-paid art, since manufacturers must be paid not only for the fabrics which succeed, but the fabrics which fail, and since the crowd force rapid changes in dress by vulgarising every fashion as it appears. Mr. Auberon Herbert once more presents himself as a smoother and more modern Carlyle, telling all politicians that they are liars, crying aloud for realities, but helping us forward, so far as we see, not one whit. His general idea is that all politicians are trying to please the people, which is only thus far true, that it is useless to propose what the people hate; but is it lying, to limit your ideas for patterns by the designs which the looms can turn out? Is every man to break his machinery, because it will not make exactly what he wants? Besides, the opinion of the people is a genuine element in the question. They find everything, and have a right to say in what directions their money and energy and lives shall be expended. A man does not lie because, being a civil servant, he writes under dictation despatches he disapproves. Mr. Ernest Hart fights against emigration from Ireland, declaring that migration would relieve the congested districts much better, and might be accomplished on a large scale, if the State would lend sufficient money. He does not, however, show how this money is to be repaid, and admits that the landlords' demand of rent from the reclaimers ruined them. Would not interest on loans ruin them too? He thinks all money spent on emigration dead loss, "money thrown into the sea," because the emigrant is gone, and can earn nothing for his own country. But if, by sending away Teague to be comfortable abroad, I double Pat's supply of food and stimulus to industries and contentment, the country gains as much as Teague takes away. The evidence shows that reclamation on any large scale is not profitable work to the undertaker, and why is John, who has saved something, to waste money on an unprofitable operation? Mr. A. P. Sinnett fights once more with considerable ability for the old and we fear hopeless cause that the Viceroy's Government in India should be allowed to govern, and should not be controlled from home, at every turn, in accordance with party exigencies or uninstructed English opinion. Those who have power will use it, and the House of Commons must govern even India. As to selecting a Viceroy who belongs to no party, whom is there to select, and how, when he is attacked, is he to be supported? The writer of the important paper on "The Radical Programme" continues his suggestions. His ideal is evidently to govern Britain as a free colony is governed, by a wide suffrage, without an established Church, with fuller and more costly education, with land set free, with small proprietorship encouraged by special taxation on large holdings, and with taxation arranged upon the principle of the impôt progressif. We cannot examine his suggestions here, but we would ask him if he really thinks a serious reduction of the temptation to accumulate would increase civilisation. Equal distribution at death does not, as experience proves, reduce the temptation to acquire, rather stimulates it; but the impôt progressif would, and so would a succession-tax on fortunes large enough seriously to relieve the State.

The National Review is a little heavy. We scarcely see either the interest or value of a paper like that of Mr. Harkness, on the Corporation of London, a collection of historical facts and statistics, sweetened by assertions that the Corporation has done good work in its time, and that it is a "great national institution." Who doubts it, or doubts either that a true Government of London would be a new living force in our midst, relieving Parliament, evoking ability now wasted, and performing a hundred functions now neglected or performed badly? No such objection, however, can be raised to Sir Bartle Frere's paper, on "Colonial Policy." It is, for him, unusually temperate and free from "eloquence." He denies that we have any Colonial policy, and advocates the creation of a Colonial Council at home, to be filled by the Agents-General, and would leave the local Governments much more complete control of their own affairs. We do not see why, if the Agents-General are treated as Envoys, as they ought to be, they should be called on always to take counsel together, or advise in common about countries widely different; while, as to the grant of more local power, all is granted that can be. The only reservation is for Imperial interests, which include the kindly management of native populations and the control of foreign affairs, the only subjects on which, now-a-days, the Home Government and the free Colonies ever dispute. "John Indigo" answers the question whether we are despoiling India fairly enough, showing, as he does, that the taxation is not high (2s. an acre on land producing 30s.), or the per-centage of revenue spent on European civil officers excessive, but he rather avoids the question of the tribute-money. It may be true that Anrungebe raised as much revenue as we do, though we doubt the story of the £77,000,000, but the whole of that money was spent in India itself. Peoples were plundered that officials might be rich, but the officials disgorged again. The serious allegation requiring discussion is that the Europeans take away from India annually too heavy a sum, for the prosperity of the country. They repay it with order, but could not the order be secured at less cost? We do not say it could, but the allegation is not met by "John Indigo." Mr. W. H. Mallock continues his argument that the Radical leaders are moved mainly by social jealousy; but to us, the most interesting paper by far is Mr. Austin's, "On the Relation of Literature to Politics." It is a fine attempt to show, with endless illustration, that the great men of literature have benefited by their acquaintance with practical affairs—that is certainly true, for example, of Homer, Vergil, Shakespeare, and Goethe—followed by the expression of a fear that Democracy, like any other tyranny, may yet compel thinkers and writers to forswear politics. There is room for the fear, but the hope as yet is that Demos, till he degenerates, will be a "many-counselled King," and that among the counsellors will stand all who are eminent in literature, as also those who are eminent in everything else. As yet, he shows no disposition in America to reject the services of those who think, though he employs them principally abroad.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Expositor. The first article in this number is a notable essay by S. Almon Petoni on "Miracles,—the Problem Solved." (It should be explained that this is a sequel to a previously-published paper, "Miracles,—the Problem Stated.") We cannot, of course, adequately state the argument in the space at our command. Briefly put, it runs thus:—You cannot argue against miracles from a consideration of nature without man, who is the completest development of nature.

Take in man, and you see that what are called laws of nature are under a constant course of modification from his agency. Is it not, then, reasonable to suppose that a higher power than man may modify these laws far more effectively? The language of the Centurion to Christ, "I also [i.e., as well as yourself] am a man under authority," is adapted skilfully to the thesis. The Centurion, as the representative of a higher power, had those who executed his commands. Christ, as the representative of the Highest, had also agencies at his bidding who would do his will. Hence he had no need to go himself to do an errand of healing. "Speak the word, and my servant shall be healed." Dr. A. B. Davidson continues his study of the later chapters of Isaiah, and the series of papers on "Scripture Studies of the Heavenly State" and "The Church of Christ in the Apocalypse" are continued by Dr. Mattheson and Dr. Milligan. Mr. A. G. Weld has an interesting paper on "The Route of the Exodus," in which he argues that the passage of the Israelites was at the north-east end of Lake Menzaleh.—The Atlantic Monthly has, as usual, some excellent reading. Perhaps the best of the papers is the instalment of Mr. H. James's impressions of travel, under the title of "En Province." Here we have some very vivid pictures of Bourges, Le Mans, Angers, Nantes, and La Rochelle. There are some telling sketches in "Glints in Auld Reekie." But can it be true that the Cowgate in Edinburgh is the worst of all the streets in the world, save what may be found in the Jewish Ghetto at Rome? Miss Harriet C. W. Stanton criticises very sharply a writer who had the presumption to "bring against British poets the charge that they are almost entirely destitute of that universal kindliness towards the speechless world, that 'sympathy co-extensive with nature,' which he finds common to all the poets of America." Miss Stanton shows pretty clearly that this gentleman has yet much to learn both about birds and about British poets, indeed about poets in general, as he seems to think that "Homer and Lucan" are the oldest representatives of poetry. There is a good description of Lake Erie in "Along an Inland Beach," and a paper very significant of altered times is "Our Nominating Machines," wherein Mr. G. W. Green expresses the growing discontent with the action of the party wire-pullers. We must not omit to mention a fine poem by Mr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, "King's Chapel."

Libraries and Readers. By William E. Foster. (F. Leypoldt, New York.) Libraries and Schools. Papers selected by Samuel S. Green. (Same publishers.)—These two little volumes will have an interest for English as well as for American readers. Unhappily, indeed, there is a difference in circumstances which is not at all in our favour. Public libraries are, we take it, much more common there than they are here; and the existence of a public library is taken for granted by the gentlemen who have contributed to these volumes. Mr. Foster, author of the first, is Librarian at Providence. His hints and suggestions to readers are admirable. But we cannot help thinking that circumstances probably make them unavailable to too many English readers. He has, for instance, some very good remarks upon the various topics of interest suggested by the title of Miss Power Cobbe's book, "The Peak in Darien." What chance, we wonder, would a reader in an English town of corresponding importance to Providence have of seeing such a book? Among the subjects of Mr. Foster's chapters is "Correction of Aimless Reading." We notice a practical suggestion of value which has been already tried with success. Books may be made attractive by the way they are represented in catalogues. At Boston, for instance, the publication of "The History, Biography, and Travel" catalogue increased the use of the books which it included fourfold, and reduced the average of fiction. But fiction itself admits of being read in various ways. Here, again, something has been done by good cataloguing. Among other chapters are "What May be Done at Home" (containing some excellent advice to parents), "How to Use a Library," and "Books and Articles on Reading." The papers collected by Mr. Green touch on a very important subject indeed. A vast amount of pains is taken to teach children to read, and then the power so laboriously acquired is practically wasted. If education is ever to have any real effect in humanising and elevating, it must be by giving a taste for intellectual occupations. The gentlemen who write these papers deal with the question how the libraries may be utilised for the schools, may be made to supplement their teaching. It is a common complaint that there is a great deal of teaching in schools and very little reading. Boys and girls acquire a certain mechanical facility in performing arithmetical exercises, and can turn with some correctness Latin and French into English, and, with a good deal less correctness, English into Latin and French; but what culture do they get, what manner of acquaintance do they make with literature? To this volume Mr. Green contributes two papers, "The Relation of the Public Library to the Public Schools," and "Libraries as Educational Institutions." Mr. Robert C. Metcalf, of Boston, deals directly with the topics on which we have touched, and gives some practical hints and suggestions of considerable value. Mr. W.

E. Foster supplements his volume by papers on "The Relation of Libraries to the School System," and "A Plan of Systematic Training in Reading at School."

Letter and Spirit. By Christina G. Rossetti. (S. P. C. K.)—Miss Rossetti takes for her text the Ten Commandments, and makes applications of them to the moral and spiritual life that show no little power of intuition, and that are always pointedly and vigorously expressed. Here is a specimen of her manner:—"Conscientious, and more especially scrupulous, persons seem characteristically open to this sin of disinclination, even while they toil persistently along the narrow path. Disinclination makes them (so to say) graze the hedge one side or the other at every step; thorns catch them, stones half trip them up, a perpetual dust attends their footsteps, grace and comeliness of aspect vanish. Though they dare not shut themselves comfortably indoors with the slothful man, they are haunted by the 'lion without,' and dwell on the probability of his catching them at every corner. They observe the wind even while they sow, and study the clouds while they reap, thus combining into one unseemly whole the comforts of obedience and disobedience." And here is another:—"But what we may lawfully clip, pare, stint, is our own provision, the unique person whom we have a right to grind is oneself. A munificent giver must not be a fraudulent acquirer, or here niggardly, and there lavish; or open-handed in response to calls upon generosity, while lax or evasive when justice puts in a claim. Even unselfish persons, if they permit themselves to be generous at the cost of justice, substitute the kind of luxury they relish for another kind which they care not for. Generosity is their luxury; yet if incompatible with justice, it must be foregone. Charities in debt exhibit a dubious side, as well as an edifying one; and if charities, how much more the common run of debtors?" And the book is full of this terse, homely wisdom.

Christian Ministry to the Young. By Samuel G. Green, D.D. (Religious Tract Society.)—Dr. Green describes his book as intended for "parents, pastors, and teachers." The substance of it has, he tells us, been delivered to students preparing for the ministry. How children should be trained in religion at home, how service intended for them should be ordered, what kind of sermons should be preached to them, how they are to be taught in Sunday schools, are the topics discussed, and discussed, we may say, with abundance of good-sense, and from the stand-point of personal experience.

My Home Farm. By Mrs. J. W. Burton. (Longmans.)—Every one who wants to try farming in a small way should read Mrs. Burton's little book. She goes, we may say, to the root of the matter. She has tried everything herself. She records her failures, as well as her successes. If she would give her balance-sheet a little more fully, nothing would be left to desire. It is interesting to observe that she has come to the conclusion that payment on the co-operative principle does not answer. The employer cannot come on the labourer for his share of losses. She began, for instance, to pay a servant who was, on the whole, most useful, by a certain proportion of profits. But when by his carelessness two calves were lost, how was he to make good the loss? Another conclusion at which she has arrived is that the land-laws want improving. We are not quite sure that she does not go as far as wishing for, if not advocating, compulsory purchase. Of course, life-tenancies cause a number of difficulties; but there are landlords holding their property absolutely at their own disposal, who are just as unwilling to do anything for their tenants, and to allow any compensation for what is done by them. How this is to be met, except by very radical measures for which society is scarcely prepared, we know not.

POETRY.—The Hill of Stones, and other Poems. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D. (Houghton, Mifflin, and Co., Boston, U.S.)—The principal poem in this volume is a mediæval legend. The Queen of a fairy palace turns to stone all that are bold enough to approach, but have not an honest purpose in their hearts. At last, the true knight, the Sir Galahad of the story, comes, and she meets with the doom which she had inflicted upon others. This is well told by Dr. Mitchell, whose blank verse is finely modulated, and who has a considerable power of expression. He shows to still more advantage when he describes nature. Elsewhere, he is strongly under the influence of Tennyson; here he asserts himself. Here is one of three "Camp-fire Lyrics":—

"A CAMP IN THREE LIGHTS.

"Against the darkness sharply lined
Our still white tents gleamed overhead,
And dancing cones of shadow cast
When sudden flashed the camp-fire red,
Where fragrant hummed the mist swamp-spruce,
And tongues unknown the cedar spoke,
While half a century's silent growth
Went up in cheery flame and smoke.
Pile on the logs! A flickering spire
Of ruby flame the birch-bark gives,
And as we track its leaping sparks,
Behold in heaven the North-light lives!
An arch of deep, supremest blue,
A band above of silver shade,
Where, like the frost-work's crystal spear,
A thousand lances grow and fade,

Or shiver, touched with palest tints
Of pink and blue, and changing die,
Or toss in one triumphant blaze
Their golden banners up the sky,
With faint, swift, silken murmurings,
A noise as of an angel's flight,
Heard like the whispers of a dream
Across the cool, clear northern light.
Our pipes are out, the camp-fire fades,
The wild auroral ghost-lights die,
And stealing up the distant wood
The moon's white spectre floats on high,
And, lingering, sets in awful light
A blackened pine-tree's ghastly cross,
Then swiftly pays in silver white
The faded fire, the aurora's loss."

—A Story of Three Years, and other Poems. By J. Williams. (C. Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—We shall probably displease Mr. Williams, when we say that his vers de société seems better to us than his more serious efforts. The sonnets are decidedly feeble. Here are the first four lines of xxxi. :—

"Our life is but a dark and rugged cloud,
Pregnant with evil rain, and drifting fast
To that fall end of time where all is Fast,
And where the future is no more allowed."

Here the image is abandoned almost as soon as it is employed. Clouds cannot be said to drift to the end of time. "The future is no more allowed" is a quite inadmissible expression. The writer is manifestly conquered by the difficulty of the four rhymes, a fact which becomes more evident when we add the next four lines :—

"Or 'tis a beaten galley, sharply prowed
To cleave an unknown sea before the blast
That rends the gear and bows the straining mast,
What time unwonted things are prayed and vowed."

Here, again, the last line is very weak. The lines about Chloris, on the other hand, are sometimes very smart and lively :—

"CHLORIS: HER VERSES.
"Poor Chloris once upon a time
Brought me some wild attempts at rhyme.
'See, see,' she cried, 'what I can do!
For I have brains as well as you.'
Said I, 'Beware lest you abuse
The proper duty of a Muse;
'Tis mine to write what you inspire,
So put the verses in the fire.'"

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name,

DELHI MEDICAL MISSION (S.P.G.)—Established 1867.

—The First Female Medical Mission begun in India. The Delhi and South Punjab Mission of the S.P.G. carries on its work among over 3,000,000 of people, and besides Delhi and its suburbs, occupies fifty towns and villages. Its work is carried on,—(1) By training native agents. (2) By philanthropic agencies, of which the most important is medical work among women and children. (3) By day and night schools for boys and young men, with 1,335 pupils. (4) By zambana missions, with 792 pupils. (5) By dividing the city and country into districts, giving each a systematic parochial organisation, for both Christians and non-Christians. The Medical Mission attended 12,933 cases, with an average of 121 sick attended daily. Owing to the growth of the work, the Missionaries are responsible for raising £1,500 a year, over and above annual grants from the Society and Government.

Subscriptions for the general work, or for the Medical Mission in particular, will be gladly received and acknowledged by the Rev. Canon CROFTON, Minister Yard, Lincoln; by the Rev. R. B. WINTER (Delhi); or by Rev. W. C. BROMHEAD, Kensington Palace, W.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE French papers are still full of Tonquin, and the negotiations do not advance, though the Figaro declared them completed. The stumbling-block appears to be this, that the French Government want to avenge their defeat in Tonquin, and also to possess control over the Songkoi, the great river which runs up to Yunnan, and the Chinese are determined not to have them there at all. There is, therefore, no true meeting-point, for the French, if they persist, must at once send reinforcements to Hanoi; and the Chinese Ambassador says that if they do, the war party at Peking will at once send troops into the adjacent provinces, and "there will be fatal consequences." There are rumours of mediation both by England and America, and though both are untrue, it is believed that, although Great Britain will not "mediate" unless asked by both Powers, Lord Granville will press upon the French Foreign Office the danger which arises from the existing tension, and the necessity of agreement, especially upon the burning question of reinforcements.

Every day confirms our impression that, if the Chamber is consulted, the French Government will be ordered to make peace with China. The electors absolutely dread the notion of such a war, to which also, it is said, the Army is opposed. The soldiers fear the hospitals, and already letters are coming home showing that sickness has broken out among the troops in Hanoi. It must not, however, be forgotten that the explosives are accumulating, and that accident may fire the train. The Cantonese mob, for instance, the most dangerous in the empire, on September 10th attacked the foreign settlement and burned a number of houses, cutting the telegraph-wires to prevent the facts getting abroad. Their provocation was the accidental death of a tout, who was roughly pushed off the quay by a European, and was drowned, and their animosity was not specially directed against France. Still, Chinamen usually do not care who dies, and the Chinese Government was evidently alarmed, for, contrary to its usual policy, it at once despatched troops against the rioters, with orders which at once restored quiet. Moreover, the European residents, who, though liable to panic, know the people, at once fled on board the steamers in the harbour. An émeute in Shanghai might at any moment draw down fire from the commanders of French vessels, who would not be sorry to see their Government committed to action. The local feeling among the French in Anam is that they ought to have been reinforced long since, and that the Republic is discrediting the French name. The true hope of peace is in the Chamber.

Almost all reports about the health of Prince Bismarck have proved false, but this one, forwarded by the Berlin correspondent of the Telegraph on the 13th inst., looks true; and if true, is so important that we give it textually:—"Reports are current this evening of a serious change in the health of Prince Bismarck, for which there must be some foundation, as Dr. Strüchhas been suddenly summoned to Gastein, to take part in a consultation upon the condition of the illustrious patient."

Mr. Gladstone is steaming about the Scotch islands in Sir Donald Currie's steam yacht, the 'Pembroke Castle,' and on Thursday made a speech at Kirkwall, the capital of the Orkneys. He spoke of the great progress made in the half-century during which he had been in public life, and in which the British Empire had been enlarged, the people made more contented and more loyal, the children brought under education, and slavery abolished. He claimed in all those works a share, as a humble but a sincere and earnest labourer. After some compliments to the public spirit of the Orcadians, who maintain a body of 600 Volunteers, Mr. Gladstone proceeded to speak of Mr. Tennyson, who accompanies him, whose work, he said, had been "on a higher plane of human action than his own," and would be more durable. The inquirer of the future, seeing Mr. Gladstone's name in the roll of Kirkwall burgesses, might ask who he was; but if, after a lapse of ages, he saw the name of Tennyson, he "would have no difficulty in saying who he was, and what he had done to raise the intellects and hearts of his fellow-creatures." The compliment is a fine one, but is it quite true that the poet outlives the statesman? The world remembers Solon as well as Euripides, Augustus as well as Virgil, Moses the lawgiver as well as David the sweet singer of Israel, Munoo perhaps better than Valmiki. And is durability the test? The world knows of the first great soldier, but it has forgotten who discovered fire, who invented the potter's wheel, who first taught man to live a year in advance by putting seed into the ground. The late Mr. Bagehot used to say that the Bourses should put up statues to that last unknown genius, for "he was the most daring and most original of all speculators."

The ultimatum submitted by Admiral Pierre to the new Queen of Madagascar, Ranavalona III., has been shown to the correspondent of the Daily News, now at Antananarivo. It is of the most peremptory character. The French Republic demands that the Queen shall recognise its sovereignty over all districts ceded to it by the Sakalavas, which cover a sixth of the island and have a coast-line of 240 miles; that the laws prohibiting French purchases in Madagascar shall be repealed; and that the Queen shall, within fifteen days, send a Plenipotentiary to such place as the Commissary of the Republic shall appoint, with powers "to make any alterations in the Treaty of 1868 that the Commissary may propose to him." Moreover, the Malagasy Government shall, within thirty days, pay an indemnity to the Republic of £40,000. The Prime Minister, who is just now Mayor of the Palace, and marries each successive Queen, has replied that Madagascar will not negotiate at all, unless the sovereignty of the Queen is recognised over the whole island. The French, therefore, occupy Tamatave, and the Hovas besiege them, and that will last until the Ministry at War can spare troops for an advance upon the capital.

A correspondence has been published between Captain Johnstone, commanding her Majesty's corvette 'Dryad,' off Tamatave, and the French Admiral Pierre, after the bombardment of that port. The English officer only protests against bombardment without notice; but Admiral Pierre in his replies is boiling over with fury, and on June 20th twice informs his correspondent that he has no right to intervene, and that he shall receive no further letters from him. On June 23rd he writes again to accuse Captain Johnstone of meddling, and of having asserted that the French proceedings were without justification. The letters are in the style which, in France, is used just before a challenge, and wholly unbecoming; but this may be explained without supposing a deliberate wish to insult. Admiral Pierre was at the time sickening under an attack of albuminuria, a disease which constantly disorders the mind of the patient, who is either morbidly irritable, or inclined to see a misfortune in every occurrence. No man's judgment, while he is so afflicted, can be securely trusted, and the Admiral's death, by proving the reality of his illness, removes all cause of complaint.

In the same correspondence (Times, 11th inst.), Admiral Pierre, in a letter to Sir J. P. Hennessy, Governor of the Mauritius, states his reasons for arresting the Missionary, Mr. Shaw. He writes courteously, though he states that he has "imposed silence on the arrogant pretensions of Captain Johnstone to interfere;" but his reasons are grotesque. They are briefly that, when soldiers were billeted in Mr. Shaw's house, bottles of wine were found in the garden, that the wine was drunk, and that the soldiers fell into a state of "lethargic intoxication." Mr. Shaw is, in fact, accused of drugging the wine, and on this charge he was detained in prison two months, being kept practically in solitary confinement. He was then discharged as guiltless. It is evident that Mr. Shaw was suspected as a Missionary influential with the Hovas, and arrested as a precautionary measure, the charge being invented in order to prevent any reclamations from the British Government. It is, of course, quite possible that the picket, ashamed of getting drunk, declared that they had been hounded, and quite possible also that they mistook a stock of Cape port kept for medicine for claret, and were puzzled by its effects. In neither case would the French have credited so absurd a charge had they not wished to arrest a Protestant Missionary, who is regarded everywhere by Frenchmen as Englishmen regard a Jesuit priest.

Reuter telegraphed from Simla on Friday week a statement that the opinions of all officials about the Ilbert Bill had been published, and that "of a total of 140, there are 114 in favour of and 26 opposed to the measure." On Monday, however, the Times' correspondent telegraphed that 188 officials were for the withdrawal of the Bill, 36 for compromise, and 62 for proceeding with the measure. The discrepancy was, of course, remarkable, and the Times, in a rage, accused the Indian Government of cooking Reuter's telegrams. The charge is denied in a telegram from Simla to the Pall Mall Gazette, and is on the face of it absurd, for not only is Lord Ripon—a transparently sincere man—incapable of such an act, but, as Parliament is not sitting, it could be of no use. A lie from India, to be exposed in three days, might affect a debate, but could not affect general opinion. The Secretary to Reuter's, annoyed at the comments on his Company's message, telegraphed to Simla for an explanation, and received for answer that an error had occurred in transmitting the message, "26" having been substituted for "205," as the numbers supporting the Bill. This is not the whole truth, for as the two numbers were added together in the original message, and 114 and 26 make up the total given, the blunder must have occurred in drafting, and not in transmitting the bulletin. The fact evidently is that Reuter's agent at Simla, who received the huge packet of reports on Friday, was in too great a hurry, and made a mess of his figures. We do not understand the importance attached to the numbers by either side. You do not weigh brains when you count heads. Lord W. Bentinck repeatedly stood alone against all India, and was always right. We think Lord Ripon wrong, but he is not a bit more wrong because a majority of civilians and lawyers think him so.

So universal has been the recognition by the French Legitimists of the Comte de Paris, that Don Carlos, his only possible competitor, has given way, and has published a letter to his Spanish followers, declaring that he is all Spaniard, and belongs to Spain alone. The Comtesse de Chambord also has caused an intimation to be circulated denying that her recent action was intended to assail the "indubitable rights" of the Comte de Paris, and the Union, the personal organ of the Comte de Chambord, while announcing its own decease, is careful to make its recognition complete. The Comte de Paris has retired to Eu, and makes no sign, but it is well understood that there is no schism in the Royalist ranks. They are powerless, but united. Those among them who cannot tolerate the Orleans family still recognise them, and will content themselves by exclusive devotion to clerical politics. The facts are important, because as soon as the Chamber meets there will be furious debates, in which all Europe will take part, as to the expediency of allowing "Philippe VII." to remain in France.

The Alps being exhausted, and Cotopaxi subdued, the Alpine climbers are at last turning their attention to the highest mountains in the world, the English Himalayas. The ascent of these peaks was supposed to be nearly impossible, partly from the want of food, water, and population, and partly from their enormous height, which reached to aerial strata where it was supposed life could not be maintained. Mr. Graham, M.A.C., however, has started to attempt Kinchinjunga with two Swiss guides, and has found very lofty ascents not impossible. He has not yet ascended Kinchinjunga, but he stopped only a few feet short of the top of Dunagiri, at an altitude of 22,500 ft., which he found quite endurable. He also crossed a peak, which he calls Mount Monal, 22,326 ft., and another, Kang La, 20,300 ft. The coolies give great trouble, as they dread the high summits, and will not put themselves on rations, but custom and the establishment of a station or two will soon overcome these difficulties. Competent natives will soon take to the work, if it pays, and if they are treated with a consideration which Mr. Graham in his letter does not quite show. We do not despair of recording before the close of next year that an Englishman has scaled Mount Everest, the highest point on the earth's surface, and British property. He ought to be presented with the summit for an estate.

The outbreaks of peasant feeling in Hungary are becoming very serious. General Ramberg, as we note elsewhere, has partially quieted Croatia, by prohibiting the levy of taxes by force; but in Hungary itself, the Slav peasants attack the proprietors and the Jews; and on the military frontier, large bands have gathered together, which attack the landlords, and even resist the troops. Near the Unna, a band has been encountered numbering 2,000 men; and at Jacobovacz and two other places the military have been compelled to fire, killing numbers of the rioters, who, however, fight the soldiers with determination. It is evident that Slav feeling and agrarian feeling both excite the people, and the respectable classes are afraid of a true jacquerie. No such movement could succeed unless joined by the Slav soldiery, and of this there is at present no symptom. The risings are set down in Vienna to Russian intrigues, but they are evidently the offspring of irritated "nationalist" feeling, combined with distress, caused chiefly, we believe, by the gradual heaping-up of the peasants' mortgages. Similar insurrections from the same cause are constantly occurring in India, and can be prevented only by laws limiting the amount a usurer can recover.

It appears to be nearly certain that both in Bulgaria and Servia the Princes are acting with Austria, and that Russia in consequence is agitating for popular control. She can rely, she thinks, on the masses. This, at least, is the statement of the well-informed Englishman who corresponds from Ragusa with the Manchester Guardian. The Russian calculation is that the Slav populace, in its hatred of Austria, will seek its protection and obey its orders. The intrigue, however, which is going on on both sides, may fail on both sides; and the body of the people, weary of pressure, may force their Governments into an alliance of the Balkan States. Neither Austria nor Russia will like to attack that, as the rival in either case would instantly pose as Protector of the Federation. It is unfortunate that the Balkan States have not as yet produced a politician who is trusted in them all, or a Prince who will act without reference either to Czar or Kaiser. The South Slavs want, as the Greeks have always affirmed, Greeks to guide them.

The correspondent of the Times declares that the condition of Egypt never was so bad. The old native system is suspended, and the system which is to supersede it is not organised. The prisons are never cleared, for the new tribunals are not ready, and the unhappy prisoners are detained for periods longer than they would be after sentence. The police will not act, because the new police officers have not learned their work. The Press is incessantly punished, because it is to be free under rules which are not drawn out. Bribers escape scot-free, because the lash, the only penalty hitherto known, has been abolished, and no substitute has yet been provided. Cholera breaks out, and the Government is afraid to let it alone, as it would have done, and does not know how to apply European methods, and so establishes cordons which turn whole cities into pest-houses without food. We believe this statement is true, and that in addition the taxes are more violently levied than ever, and are only paid by borrowing from the usurers. Under these circumstances it is difficult to believe in the enthusiasm for the Khedive, reported daily as he advances on his progress, except on the theory that the peasants for whose misery we are responsible hope that the nominal ruler can give them some redress.

The same writer visited the prisons in Mansourah, which it appears the Khedive, though present in the town, must not inspect, "for reasons of etiquette." He found them crowded by 174 prisoners, better-looking than an average crowd in Alexandria, and not ill-treated, but without, apparently, hope of trial. They told piteous stories of reasons for their arrest, and the officials admitted that they never knew why the prisoners were sent or when they would be released. Anybody in authority sends any one to the prison, he is admitted, and there it ends. It is quite possible that many of the poor wretches are simply forgotten, like the aide-de-camp of the Emperor Paul, who was arrested for forty-eight hours and left unnoticed for thirty years. It is most discreditable to us to allow such a system to exist, but what is to be done? English opinion will not allow us to govern Egypt, and if the Egyptian Ministry is ordered to clear the prisons, it will obey meekly, and hint to its subordinates that dangerous persons had better be kept au secret in the interior. We are trying to carve with butter-knives on rotten wood. Suppose Lord Northbrook were Khedive. How many hours would the great abuses last which have lasted intact throughout our occupation?

The continued vitality of international jealousies is in nothing better illustrated than in the difficulty of appointing Stipendiaries in Eastern cities whom all Europeans will trust. The white settlers will not submit, often with good reason, to native Judges, but they will not support the supersession of the conflicting Consular jurisdiction by trustworthy Magistrates, who could make justice regular and uniform. Either they declare for mixed Tribunals, which are exceedingly cumbrous, or for the Consuls, each of whom has a different idea of justice. Even at Shanghai, where the Europeans are coerced into unity by a common danger, and do elect a cosmopolitan municipality, the police are obliged to take the villains they catch—and there are no villains like bad foreigners in China—before a dozen different and conflicting authorities. With the slightest willingness to agree, the Powers could appoint Stipendiaries who could be trusted to do indifferent justice, and reduce the legal chaos into the simplest order. Either the Indian Code or the Code Napoléon would do for law, and the Stipendiary might always be a Dutchman or a Dane. The nationalities, however, as yet will not trust one another.

The death of Mr. Birley, the Conservative Member for Manchester, vacates the minority seat for that city, and should lead to a most interesting contest. The Liberals, however, are not ready. Not only have they not decided on a candidate, but they are divided as to the expediency of a contest, many maintaining that it is useless to seat a good candidate for a few months, when, at the general election, he must either retire or oust one of his colleagues. It is said, moreover, that the action of a Dr. Pankhurst will imperil the Liberal chances. Dr. Pankhurst declares himself an Independent, and puts out an ultra-Radical programme, with universal suffrage for both sexes, the nationalisation of the land, the abolition of the House of Lords, Home-rule for Ireland, and all the rest of it. The Liberals cannot support him, and he will draw away the entire Home-rule vote. No decision will be arrived at until next week, and, as we have argued elsewhere, we trust it will be in favour of a contest. Victory secures two additional votes in the House of Commons, and as the Liberals outnumber their opponents by at least 4,000, it can be secured in spite of Dr. Pankhurst. The Liberals must learn to organise defeat for eccentric candidates of that kind, or when the Corrupt Practices Bill comes into operation they will be nowhere. Their discipline is not as perfect as that of their opponents, and the moment contests are made cheap, they will be harassed by "independent" candidates fighting for some crotchet like "anti-vaccination" or some cause like teetotalism, and for their own hands. They must learn how to crush these men, or their political representatives will lose half their seats.

The Lancet endorses an opinion recently delivered by Mr. Spence Bate, F.R.S., and long since maintained by the few thoughtful dentists, that human teeth among the cultivated classes are in process of degeneracy. The "dentine" is becoming deteriorated, interglobular spaces not found in the savage races making their appearance, while the enamel is becoming opaque. Moreover, which is more serious, the development of the cranium which follows cultivation is attended with a shrinking-in and weakening of the jaws, till there is not room for the teeth. The facts being granted, the question arises whether these symptoms will end in a decay of the race, or in an extinction of each cultivated class as it springs up, the learned perishing, while the barbarians below them flourish. The latter is the more probable, for Nature seems opposed to the steady transmission of high brain-power. Genius does not breed, and families over-cultivated for their physique have long been known to tend either to sterility, to insanity, or to decrepitude. It may be found yet that the hopes of Comte are exactly opposed to the conclusions of science, and that a race, after developing its force, as, for instance, the Chinese did, can only be saved by becoming strictly non-progressive. Humanity may continue only on condition of its healthy barbarians always rising to the top. The Professor may rule the costermonger, but the costermonger's progeny will always survive the Professor's.

We are interested in observing the quietness, rigidity, and success with which the delegates assembled in the Trades Union Congress apply the principle of the Closure. They allow and wish for free debate, but their time is limited, and when the speakers have no more information to contribute, or the discussion wanders, the Congress votes that "the discussion has been sufficient," and proceeds at once to a final division. This is the absolute Closure, the only one which is really effective, and it is amusing to see how easily it is applied by men who in political meetings would be adjured by Tory speakers not to allow their representatives to be "gagged." On Thursday, the delegates wished to resolve that the hours of voting should be extended everywhere from eight a.m. to eight p.m., and member after member rose to speak. They had, however, nothing to say, and after a time their tediousness was snapped short by the Closure, followed by a unanimous vote in favour of the resolution.

Burglars are taking so kindly to the knife and the revolver that even the Police are startled. Within the past fortnight, four or five cases have occurred in which interrupted burglars have endeavoured, like their American confères, to avoid arrest by killing the police. It is proposed, therefore, to arm the police, and the twenty Superintendents of the Metropolis have met in council to consider the subject. They have decided that, on the whole, the proposal is inexpedient, and that the club is a much better weapon. They advise that in dangerous districts the patrols should be doubled, and they adopted a proposal to abandon rattles, and substitute a very piercing and peculiar whistle, to be fastened to the handle of the bâton. Opinion is not, we believe, as yet matured enough to allow of the arming of the police, though they are armed both in France and America; but we do not quite see why a few picked men should not be trusted with arms, and why the addition of a gendarmerie to the police should be considered so monstrous. We greatly doubt, whenever London is organised, and the suburbs are represented, whether they will long endure their chronic insecurity. It is much better that policemen should carry revolvers than that irresponsible householders should.

The Melbourne correspondent of the Times points out that the most imperative motive of the Australians in desiring to annex New Guinea and some other islands has escaped attention at home. The statesmen of France, finding their habitual criminals a source of constant danger, have proposed laws enabling the Judges to transport them to penal settlements at the Antipodes. There they are to remain as labourers, in perfect freedom, "sans aucune restriction," and, it is hoped, make their living. As New Caledonia will not hold them, they will escape—as, indeed, they do already—and once escaped, the Governor of the settlement refuses to take them back. They make their way to the continent of Australia, and there live by crime. The Australians, who know what convicts are like, and who suffered from the convicts who used to escape from Tasmania, cannot endure this addition to their own criminals; and maintain that, if France obtained a footing in the New Hebrides or New Guinea, the Colonies would become almost uninhabitable. The danger is a little exaggerated, as England might for the same reasons be alarmed at the neighbourhood of Toulon; but the feeling is very strong, and it is pretty clear that the French Colonial authorities approve escapes.

SHALL THERE BE A REFORM BILL IN 1884?

THE discussion which is raging among the country papers as to the expediency of devoting the next Session to the reform of the County Franchise is, we think, a little premature. The Government certainly has not made up its mind. The nature of the Reform Bill may be settled, and from Mr. Chamberlain's letter we think it is, because upon that point the conditions are unalterable; but responsible statesmen dislike prophetic decisions, and neither the Ministry nor the constituency can say what the position of affairs in February may be. Not to mention the usual risks of change, change arising from deaths, accidents, or sudden bursts of popular emotion, Asia may be ringing with a great war, amidst which it would be most inexpedient for Parliament to disperse, or the situation in Egypt may have again become serious, or Ireland may once more have slipped out of hand. Sensible men postpone such resolutions as long as they may, and, unless coerced by irresistible arguments, keep even their inner minds free to decide when the necessity for decision has arrived, according to circumstances and opportunities. Where are these irresistible arguments? So far as we see, there is no principle involved in the debate, and the reasons of expediency are about as strong on one side as the other. We will endeavour to state them as fairly as may be, first premising that we look upon the introduction of the Bill as the signal of a coming dissolution. We do not believe, when it comes to the point, that the Conservatives will accept the proposal of household suffrage in the Counties. They will not dare to run the risk of so alienating the farmers. They may not, it is true, resist directly, for many of them are pledged to the principle of the measure; but they will resist indirectly, either on the ground of opportuneness, or under cover of a demand for Redistribution, but with the secret hope that the farmers will replace the counties in their hands. They can morally compel the Peers to throw out the Bill and so force a dissolution, and we are by no means sure that their hope is altogether ill-founded. The farmers do not like the admission of the labourers to the suffrage, and the clergy are well aware that the new franchise will greatly increase the apparent, if not the real power, of the village Dissenters, a class little understood in towns. It is known that these ideas greatly affected the recent election for Rutland, and there are close observers who believe that had not Mr. Lowther made resistance to the labourers' suffrage his cheval de bataille, the abstainers would have been fewer by many hundreds, and the result of the election far less disheartening to the defeated side.

The reasons for bringing in the Franchise Bill next year are on the surface. One, and an exceedingly strong one, is that, supposing no accident to intervene, we can bring it in. It is never wise to delay a good and necessary work which it is not imperative to delay, and which if delayed may by possibility be delayed for a long period. No one knows what may happen before 1885 to bring in the Conservatives, and if they came in they would undoubtedly wait six years, and might wait twelve, before they would allow that the opportunity for a change they all dislike had certainly arrived. Meanwhile, the rural population would be every year growing more impatient with their exclusion, and every year, as the exclusion attracted more and more attention, the prestige of the House of Commons as a truly representative body would perforce decline. No one wishes that to be diminished further. So long as the non-electors are unnoticed or deliberately excluded, their absence matters little; but the moment the duty of admitting any great body of the people is recognised, their absence paralyses the moral influence of the representatives. Other men, with other ideas and other instructions, ought to be sitting where the County Members sit. The unfairness of settling questions in which labourers are interested without taking the labourers' vote, now scarcely noticed, will then be painfully felt, with the resulting irritation that always springs up under a Government which is visibly that of a class. This is a strong argument, as is also one more frequently pressed, that Parliament visibly needs reinvigoration, which can only come from a wider and more universal suffrage. We should be sorry to believe this quite true, for there must be an end to reductions of the franchise one day; and if every constituency wears out, the House of Commons must in the long-last wear out too. There is nothing below earth for Antæus to renew his force from. Still, the argument is true, as far as it goes, and with the majority in the country, weary as they are of the powerlessness of Parliament, and doubtful as they are if new procedure will remove it, this belief tells, perhaps, more than any other. And finally, there is the argument that this particular Parliament lacks "go,"—that it has, from some cause not clearly defined, but special to itself, grown old before its time; and that not only a change of suffrage, but even a dissolution would be an advantage in itself. The country would be rid of a weak House, which can hardly get through work, and except when shocked into energy by an occurrence like the Phoenix Park murders cannot, or will not, act either with sense, or speed, or decision. The Members have grown flaccid, and require to be re-toned by contact with the Constituencies, and by fresh information as to what they must do and avoid. This argument is very wide-spread, and we believe, much more effective than it appears. A good deal of the supposed decay of interest in Parliament arises from decay of interest in this Parliament, which, though unusually full of intelligence, has, no doubt, bored mankind, and allowed mankind to be worried by bores, to an extent beyond all precedent. It has been the Tiresome Parliament, par excellence. There never was a House of Commons in which inferior men were so painfully visible, or in which, though some debates have been fine, the general current of debate was so innutritious to the national mind. We have descended from Mr. Darby Griffiths to Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett.

These arguments are strong, but those on the other side are strong also. In the first place, little is lost by delay, and no particular injustice will be done. The disposition to grant the reduced suffrage to the counties will not die away, but rather increase with time; and no question of the last importance to villagers, like the Disestablishment of the Church, for instance, is likely to be brought to the front. The argument from the possibility of the chapter of accidents being unfavourable, though it weighs with the public, will hardly weigh with statesmen, who know that the incalculable is the incalculable because it cannot be calculated, and that if they once began speculating on the unforeseen, they would never act. The reinvigoration of Parliament may be effected before the suffrage is changed by commands from the existing constituency, and as to the defects of this particular House, the next one may be no better. It may possibly be worse, if Ireland has had no time to cool down, to realise to itself that the tenantry who make up so large a proportion of its people have obtained perpetuity of tenure, subject to the payment of comparatively moderate rent, and to comprehend that obstruction can no more produce prosperity than ruts can help on a coach. The lassitude of the House will hardly increase, for much of it springs from the fact that Members desire changes less than their constituents do, and the effluxion of time brings home to the former the necessity of conciliating their masters. They will not want to be treated as fainéants on the hustings, but will rather be disposed to work; and there is so much work to be done. This Parliament, before it disperses, ought to keep more of its promises. It has not done anything at all to make land as saleable as Consols, to restrict settlement, to create rural municipalities, or to give London a government, and very little to reform its own procedure. The country has in part acquiesced in its failure, but in part it has not, as Members will find when they come to ask for re-election. In one more Session of work, with Members aware of a fresh responsibility, much of the unfulfilled might get itself fulfilled, no doubt with too much labour and needless friction, and harassing wear-and-tear, but still to the decided benefit of the country. The House is one of relaxed fibre, but still it is one which might be induced to vitalise London, and pass a solid Land Enfranchisement Act, and carry further the experiment, in some respects so successful, of "devolution;" and it is a pity that more of such useful work should not be done before the constituencies are asked to send up a Parliament which, as it must be speedily dissolved again to try the new suffrage, may possibly do very little. Another weary and tedious but working Session might give time to the public mind to ripen, both in England and Ireland, and perhaps deepen the inclination to send up more vigorous men.

Upon the whole, we should be disposed to say that the dispute is one upon which the judgment of the Ministers, who will know exactly what presses and does not press, will be the safest guide, and which may be wisely left in their hands, without much guidance from a half-instructed, outside opinion.

THE HAPSBURGS AND THE CROATS.

WE wish the Emperor of Austria could be interviewed, and made to explain, after the fashion of an American candidate for the Presidency, his own view of his own present position. It would, we suspect, surprise some English politicians. In their view, he is one of the most fortunate and safest Sovereigns in Europe, has reconciled German Austria and Hungary, has recouped his Italian losses in the Balkan, and has by his treaty with Germany—that “good tidings of great joy,” as Lord Salisbury called it—rendered himself safe against all external attack. He would, we imagine, declare that there was another and much darker side to his situation. The “reconciliation” of German and Magyar has only been accomplished at a dangerous price. The acquisition of Bosnia and the Herzegovina has brought with the new territories new perils, much deeper than those involved in ascendancy in Italy, because, unlike the latter, they are insoluble by mere retreat. The German alliance, though so valuable to the Empire, brings to the dynasty at its head new and serious perplexities. For political purposes, and especially in their own judgment, the Hapsburgs are the Austrian Empire, and their future as a dynasty depends upon their ability to check disaffection in two dominant races—the German and the Magyar—without exciting it in the subordinate race which, in numbers and in courage, if not in developed capacity, is equal to the other two,—the South Slav. Hitherto, the dynasty, partly by good-fortune, partly by unscrupulous adherence to the single idea that its business is to reign, and partly by a sort of cynical impartiality shown in its readiness to use any race against any other, has succeeded in this difficult feat. It has conciliated German and Magyar at the expense of Slav, without destroying the loyalty of the latter, who, after saving the House in 1848, parted with most of their gains without serious discontent. For thirty years the three races have acquiesced in the sway of the House, and have maintained an unbroken, though threatened, peace among themselves. Of late, however, this harmony has once more disappeared, and it is quite possible that the Hapsburgs are on the eve of another stormy period. The South Slavs are everywhere waking up. The relations between their scattered tribes in Bohemia, in Hungary, in Croatia, and in the Balkan generally have been drawn closer, chiefly by improved communications, and the defeat of Turkey—a grand Slav victory, as the Magyars, with their strong instinct for politics, at once perceived—has fired the imagination of the whole race. They thirst for more independence and more unity, and more distinction in the world, a thirst deepened both by distaste for the German alliance, which they quite understand is anti-Slav, as well as anti-French, and by grievous economic trouble. Their markets have not improved, their taxes have grown heavier, their debts are heaping up, and their desire for a more comfortable life, or, to be strictly true, for a less savagely simple life, has rapidly increased. The situation, then, throughout the kingdoms and States in which South Slavs form the population, but are not independent, approximates to that of Ireland. The Slavs are irritated at once by growing “nationalist” feeling and by economic distress, and detest the races above them about equally as tax-gatherers, as rent-receivers, and as dominant aliens. They are everywhere in ferment, here against landlords, there against Jews, again, as in Croatia, against the tax-gatherers, and once more, as in Serbia and Bulgaria, against the felt, though undefined, “Austrian influence,” which, good or bad as against Russia, will, they feel, be fatal to their hopes as Slavs. Sometimes the method of resistance is individual murder, sometimes an attack by armed peasants on a town or a château; often a sudden raid upon the Jews, who are hated as money-lending extortioners; and occasionally, as in Agram in August, a direct popular riot against the Government, its officials, or its emblems. In that case, citizen rioters pulled down the Hungarian arms.

It is absolutely indispensable to the Hapsburgs to soothe this ferment, lest in the end it should rise, as in Italy, to the insurrectionary height, and be directed against the dynasty. That has not been the case hitherto. The Slav peasants are aware that the Hapsburgs have no race prejudices, and might under given circumstances declare themselves Slav—as practically happened in 1848—and only condemn their counsellors; but if the conflict lasts too long and grows too embittered, loyalty may wear thin. The dynasty desires to soothe, but what is it to do? With a German alliance for its mainstay, it cannot irritate the German population, whose leaders have for their text every day the assertion that “the Slav flood is still rising,” and who honestly believe themselves the pioneers of civilisation. It cannot in Hungary, without grave danger, irritate the Magyars, who have the capacity as well as the morbid pride of a dominant caste, who would risk all rather than lose their ascendancy, and who control the powerful and numerous militia of the kingdom. Half the army is Slav and two-thirds of the officers, and the “Military party,” always so strong at the Hofburg, leans always on that side. The Hapsburgs are compelled to seem to agree with “the civilised sections of their people,” and yet are determined not to irritate the Slavs beyond a certain point. The position is nearly impossible, but its favourable points have been seized, with the adroitness, not to say williness, taught to the House by centuries of contention with the same difficulty. The local authorities in Croatia are replaced by a trained and competent agent, a Royal Commissary (General Ramberg), invested with all powers, and free from all race prejudices or scruples. To gratify the Germans, whose idea is, first of all, order, he increases the rural garrison, and by summary punishment represses the agrarian émeutes. To gratify the Magyars, he restores the Hungarian arms and the inscriptions in German and Magyar, which had been pulled down by the populace,—an act, it is said, no Slav officer would have performed. And then, to soothe Slav feeling, he instructs the Judges not to be too severe, but to remember that the people are ignorant and have grievances, and orders the tax-collectors of the State to remit arrears, and not press for the present even for their dues,—an order which, it is said, at once sent the majority of the armed peasants to their homes. The Germans and Magyars are, therefore, conciliated, while the Slav is not driven to extremities, and finding the tax-gatherer suddenly grown lenient, has half a suspicion in his inner mind that the Emperor is Slav at heart. It is very adroit, but the Government which is compelled to display such adroitness is not a Government at ease, and the Emperor must often doubt, as the Slav flood rises, and as he hears from all the Balkan States how deep is the suspicion and dislike of the Hapsburgs, whether the German alliance, necessary though it be, is an unmixed blessing.

It is this unique position, this necessity for sitting on three stools, which causes much of the evil character of Austrian policy in the Balkan peninsula. The Hapsburgs wish, no doubt, to extend their dominions, and especially to acquire a broad road southward to the Ægean, but they are also driven forward by fear. They think they cannot do justice in Bosnia, because if they did, the Magyars would see, in contented and self-governed Bosnians, allies of their own Slavs. They think they must torment the Servians, because if Serbia were really independent, she might act as a nucleus to attract all discontented Slav States, and play Piedmont in the Balkan. They think they must resist Russia by intrigue, lest Russian preponderance should attract their own Slavs, and above all, they think the Federation of the Balkan would be fatal to their own empire. Such a Federation, if it succeeded, and were decently happy, and allowed considerable latitude to its component States, would attract Bohemians, Dalmatians, Bosnians, Croatians, and the whole subordinate population of Hungary, and might on the occurrence of any crisis draw them into its own organisation, so creating a mighty State in which the Hapsburgs would have no place. That fear is intolerable, and drives the Emperor in precisely the same direction as his ambition to reign over yet wider territories. Hence the incessant intrigue which in Belgrade, in Sofia, in Philippopolis, and Montenegro makes all politics confused and progress nearly impossible; hence the perpetual oppression of the Servians, who cannot stir independently without seeing their only market suddenly shut against them; and hence, above all, the oppressive government in Bosnia. The Hapsburgs intend to keep Bosnia, and but for their chronic fear they would be content to govern as leniently as they do in Vienna, to allow the province a large measure of self-control, and even, if the people wished, to make it such a Grand Duchy as Tuscany once was. Nothing, however, can be done in that direction till the Slavs are content and loyal; and if they are content and loyal, Magyar and German will both be nearly in rebellion. The situation of the Emperor, so far from being the pleasant one that some observers imagine, is only tolerable because long habitude has made the perplexities sit lightly, and has given the Austrian statesmen confidence that if they are very cautious, and very crafty, and very slow, and just a little timid, they will get through somehow. Perhaps they will, but if they will not do a little more justice they will find, when the great struggle comes with Russia, that the South Slavs would rather "sink in the Russian morass" than bear so leaden a government at the hands of alien peoples. Galicia is Slav, and Galicia is content with the Hapsburgs; but then in Galicia Poles rule, not the Germans or the Magyar caste.

THE MANCHESTER ELECTION.

THE Liberals of Manchester will, we think, mistake their duty, if they fail to fight for the Tory seat vacated by the death of that excellent Conservative Mr. Birley. Mr. Gladstone's Government will, before this Parliament ends, bring forward a Reform Bill, and, in face of the pressure which the farmers will exercise upon Liberal County Members, the Cabinet will require every jot of national support it can obtain. The support of Manchester is of the greatest importance. It is the third city in the kingdom, and one of the wealthiest; it has a traditional position as the centre of the cotton industry, and it is so nearly divided in opinion that its decision has far more weight than that of any persistently Radical borough or steadily Tory county. Nobody cares to ask for an opinion which is quite certain beforehand. An unbroken vote of Manchester for Mr. Gladstone would not only increase his majority by two, but weigh as heavily on public opinion in the North as the Liberal victory in Liverpool. No Premier can keep up heart if his followers with such an opportunity before them desert him, and deliberately offer him one supporter in the House instead of three. It is argued, no doubt, that with two Liberals returned already the third seat was intended for the minority, and should be filled by them; and had this been the practice adopted by the two great parties, as no doubt logically it ought to have been, this objection would be irresistible. But it has never been adopted, or even seriously proposed. Where it has been possible, all three seats have been secured by one party; and where that has been impossible, a vacancy for the corner-seat has been clutched as eagerly as any other. Tories on such occasions have shown no hesitation, and Liberals no remorse. Nor, indeed, could it be otherwise. If one party is strong enough under the system of minority voting to carry all three seats, it ought, even in the judgment of those who approve the triangular scheme, to seat three Members; and if there is only one vacancy there must be a poll, or a distrusted Member may be imposed on the minority, without its consent, by its own Managing Committee. The Liberals, unless bound by secret pledges of which we do not hear, are perfectly entitled to fight the seat; and they ought to do it, if only to show publicly that, in spite of all the talk of reaction and of the unquestionable lull in political strife, Mr. Gladstone remains, as in 1880, the representative of wise government in the eyes of Manchester. The Conservatives are never tired of saying that Mr. Gladstone no longer rules by plébiscite, that the tide of opinion has turned, and that a dissolution will either unseat or paralyse this most unhappy Government. Manchester can, as regards the boroughs, bring that assertion to the test. Its electors are more numerous than the population of many large towns; they include men of every interest, class, and opinion; and they are at least as much divided in political sentiment as the people of Great Britain. The city has, therefore, the power of giving an answer to the allegation which most weighs with politicians, and it ought to do it.

But we shall be told the attempt is dangerous. If the Liberals succeed, one of their three Members will be defeated at the next election, and it may be the wrong one. It would be a small gain to send up three Liberals for one or two Sessions, and then for a whole Parliament lose the services of Mr. Slagg or Mr. Jacob Bright. Granting that to be true, and as regards Mr. Slagg we should grant it in the fullest degree, the danger is either very trifling, or one which is entirely within the control of the electors. If they want the sitting Members very much and the third Member very little, they can return the men of their preference at the top of the poll. They have only to will it, and Messrs. Slagg and Bright are as safe as if they were sitting for Tavistock or Shoreham. It is foolish to argue that two Members ought to sit, even if the electors do not care for them, and that is all this argument of the caucus-room really amounts to. Liberals must learn to leave such matters more to the constituencies, to put "calculations" on one side, and to acquire a more robust confidence that strong men who are also popular will never be left out in the cold. In the last twenty years, we have seen but one Liberal at once valuable and known thrown away, and that was Mr. Ayrton, who to powers of nearly the first order added a Stuart-like faculty of making personal foes. And, finally, the same advocates for retreat whisper that the Liberals may be beaten, and that a defeat for such a city would be a great shock to the Liberal party. Conservatism, they mutter, is very strong in Manchester; Mr. Houldsworth is a very good candidate; and there is a dreadful Dr. Pankhurst, who will be a marplot, who favours Home-rule, and who will carry the Irish vote, and may carry a great many of the more extreme Radicals. Those sound formidable objections, but if they are to be effective, we may as well beseech Lord Salisbury to take the helm at once. A defeat does not always operate to depress. It is very often a tonic, especially when the party defeated is in power, and needs to be warned that unless it exerts itself to the full its power may slip from its hands. As to Dr. Pankhurst, that difficulty will have to be faced at the next election in half the great boroughs in England. The single evil result of the Corrupt Practices Bill will be a great increase in the number of candidates, a majority of the "interlopers" will be Extremists of one sort or another, and perhaps half of them will like to begin with the solid block of Irish votes, to be secured by accepting Home-rule. The Irish will remain till the election in appearance at least implacable, and may not be sorry, by voting for Home-rule candidates, to show the electors for once how many they are, and how great their influence must be on elections. The Liberals must face this risk, and they can face it as they face every other, by energy, organisation, and careful persuasion. Dr. Pankhurst, or any man like him, can have no strength unless it be derived from the people; and if the Liberals as a body dislike or distrust him, they have only to divide the wards into small blocks, and see that every elector is carefully informed why he should not, as a Liberal, vote for Dr. Pankhurst, and should vote for the choice of the party. It is by persuasion, and by rousing enthusiasm for Liberal ideas, not by small arrangements, that elections in great constituencies are carried, and the Irish vote is less a danger to Liberals when given to an eccentric than when given to Tories. If, in spite of this, the ranks are broken, and the substantial vote divided, the Tory will come in, and the Liberals will have time to ponder by next election on the necessity as well as the advantages of unity, a lesson which some of them want very much. It is folly to shrink before a difficulty which is identical with the main difficulty of the United Kingdom, and to say that because the Irish are ungrateful, therefore the Tories are to rule. That is to leave to Mr. Parnell not only the balance of power, which he thinks he can obtain, but the whole of it.

THE BENEFITS OF TRADES UNIONS.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON began his excellent address to the Trades Unions Congress by recalling the rule which lays down "That papers in defence of Trades Unions shall be considered unnecessary." But what is unnecessary among Trades Unionists may not be equally so outside; and we shall therefore use Mr. Harrison's statistics for a slightly different purpose from that for which they were designed. He employed them to show how Unionism is spreading; we shall quote them to show that it is a good thing that it should spread.

To begin with, they would dispose—if anything could dispose of a well established error—of the notion that Trades Unions are merely associations for supporting workmen in waging suicidal quarrels with their employers. If there were a shadow of foundation for this theory, these disputes would every year be getting more common, because the Societies which are assumed to exist for the sole purpose of carrying them on are every year getting stronger. Mr. Harrison gave some striking figures on this point. Five Societies, whose members in 1867 did not come up to 60,000, have more than doubled in numbers; and one Society, the Amalgamated Carpenters, has increased from 8,000 members to 20,000. The incomes of these Societies have increased at the same rate. Where they received £1,000 sixteen years ago, they receive £2,000 now. If all this organisation and all this wealth have been devoted to one end, it is incredible that this end should not be better answered in 1883 than it was in 1867. Whether it is so or not, our readers can judge for themselves. How often, and for how long a time, are the newspapers filled with accounts of strikes? Oftener, and for longer, than was the case before Trade Unionism made this great advance? Certainly not. As the Unions become richer and stronger, strikes become fewer and less embittered. It is perfectly natural that this should be the case. Putting aside the advance the working-class have made in knowledge and judgment, the mere spread of Unionism has a tendency to lessen the number of strikes. It indisposes masters hastily to provoke them, and men hastily to resort to them. Where the men are known to be disorganised, and consequently weak, employers have little or no inducement to look carefully into their accounts, before refusing a rise or insisting on a reduction of wages. To pay less to the workmen is always an easy method of increasing or sustaining profits, and if the workmen are badly equipped with the means of resistance, even good masters may be inadvertently led to adopt this method. There is an immediate gain to be made or an immediate loss to be avoided, and if they have not looked round the whole question very carefully, they are under a natural inducement to take the first road to their object that offers itself. The existence of a powerful Union supplies the necessary motive for instituting this minute examination. When a body of employers know that unless they can show good reason for what they do, a fall in wages, or a persistence in the present rate, will certainly provoke a strike, they will be very much more solicitous as to the quality of their reasons. They will no longer be manufactured merely for home consumption; they must be of a kind that will stand the wear-and-tear of travel and of scrutiny by hostile eyes. The men are under equally strong inducements to caution of a not dissimilar kind. They have more to risk, and by consequence they are less inclined to risk it. It is not the man who has saved a very little money that is most careful to keep what he has saved. The process has gone on for so short a time, that it costs him nothing to forego it. When he has next to nothing laid by, he argues, with a certain show of plausibility, that if he spends it and begins saving again, he will not be materially the worse. It is a very different story when the sum saved is already a large one. The feelings of a working-man who is £5 to the good, and of one who is £100 to the good, are different in kind, as well as in degree; and something of the same feeling exists in the Executives of Trade Societies. It is a serious matter to trifle with a large reserved fund. That fund represents the labour and the self-denial of many years and many men. It may be scattered in a few weeks by an unsuccessful strike, and then all that labour and self-denial will have gone for nothing.

Mr. Harrison brought out very clearly another aspect of the same obstinate fallacy. If Trades Unions exist to multiply Strikes, a large per-centage of their income ought to be spent in strikes. So far is this from being the case, that of the whole income of Trade Societies, only one per cent. has gone upon trade disputes; while even seven Societies which have been actually involved in such disputes, have spent only two per cent. of their income in this way. The Unions are primarily provident societies on a great scale. They support their members when they are ill, when they are out of work, and when they are old; and it may fairly be said that one main reason why the recent trade depression, in comparison with similar trade depressions years ago, was borne not only with so much fortitude, but with so little acute suffering, was the prosperity to which the Unions had attained at the beginning of it. Thrift, as exercised in Unionism, is not open to the objections or subject to the drawbacks which attend thrift exercised in other ways. It is a common complaint, among those who are labouring to develop saving among the poor, that those who could save to most purpose have the least inclination to save. The middle-aged are willing enough to begin, but then they have to begin at a time when the chances that their savings will be exhausted by early and frequent drains upon them is infinitely greater than it was twenty years earlier. It is the young who can save to advantage, and it is very hard to persuade the young that they will ever want their savings. To-day's dinner or to-day's enjoyment is so much more real to them than the dinner or the enjoyment of half a life-time hence. It is fortunate, on the whole, that it is so, because, if young shoulders could really be made to carry old heads, they would not do half the work that is now got out of them. But this elasticity of temper has its drawbacks, and one of them is the indisposition to make any preparation for the future that naturally accompanies it. Thrift, again, is at best rather a selfish virtue. The interesting babe mentioned somewhere the other day who wished his father and mother dead, because then he would have all their money to put into his money-box, is but a precocious and exaggerated example of a common tendency. Now, Unionism meets both these difficulties. As regards the young, it invests saving with an air of something like heroism. The Unions are more than great provident societies,—they are also great fighting societies; and many a young man has joined a Union in the latter character who would never have dreamed of joining it in the former. From this point of view, it is a great advantage that the recommendation of a Royal Commission was not adopted, and the "trade" and "benefit" purposes of the Unions kept separate. Had this been done, it would have been impossible to resist the pressure that would have been put upon the Unions to make the contribution to the benefit fund optional, and then only the older members would have cared to make it. The young members would have paid for the support of workmen on strike freely enough, but not for the support of workmen in age or sickness. Now there is only a single payment, and the attraction with which one of its objects is invested extends to the other. The tendency to individual selfishness is equally checked by Unionism. Trades Unions are often accused of sacrificing the community to a class, and the individual to a class; but they are never charged with promoting the selfish interest of the individual. If one member suffers, the others suffer with him; and if the scale on which this principle is applied is still too limited, it is no small step to have passed beyond the stage at which the only recognised maxim is, "Every man for himself." That the working-class has in so many instances made this step, is due to the spread of Trades Unions.

A SPUR TO INVENTORS.

AMONGST other New Year's gifts, the results of what some people falsely call a wasted Session, her Majesty's Ministers have in hand for the public the Patents Act, which comes into force with the first moment of 1884. This measure would have made the fortune of many a Conservative Government, and if it does not add much to the achievements of the present Government, that is only because Mr. Gladstone has accustomed the people to expect so much from Liberal Ministries, and because Mr. Chamberlain, who had the Bill in hand, took the shine out of his own measure by passing the Bankruptcy Act as well. But it may be questioned whether the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act of 1883, to give it its full title, is not of as great, and perhaps more lasting, importance than many a more pretentious measure. It may not save so much money as the Bankruptcy Act, but it is likely to help the making of a good deal more. It does not, like the Agricultural Holdings Act, give security for the past, but it opens up the vistas of hope for the future to many to whom they were before closed by a gate only unlocking to a golden key.

The main end and object of the Patents Act is to enable a man to obtain the product of his own brains. Just as the Agricultural Holdings Act aims at securing to the farmer the work of his own hands, the product of the expenditure of his own capital and farming skill, so this Act aims at securing to the mechanic or artisan the work of his own brains, the outcome of his own energy and inventive genius. As the landlord has hitherto been directly empowered by law to "annex" the farmer's profits, so the capitalist has hitherto been too often enabled to swallow up the working inventor's profits. The great requisites for the reform of Patent law, as of most other branches of law, have been cheapness and easiness. These requisites have already been attained by our American cousins, and to that, in part, may be attributed the immense number of inventions which we owe to them, from sewing-machines to egg-whisks. The obstacles in the way of inventors in this country were many. The steps they have had to take to protect their inventions from theft were very numerous; they were very hard to find, very difficult to guard, and very expensive. Before the present Act, there were no less than nine Acts of Parliament relating to patents, and six to copyright of designs. To obtain a patent, the would-be patentee had to apply at the Patent Office at least seven times, to use four different documents, and to make four separate payments. These four payments amounted in all to £75 for three years' protection, and £175 for the full term of fourteen years. It was necessary to pay down £25 before getting even provisional protection. The result was that not only did the inventor, if a working-man, have to borrow money to pay his fees, but he also had to resort to the expensive professional guidance of solicitors or patent agents to enable him to pay his fees in the right way, and to comply with all the other mysterious requirements of the Patent Office, which, after all, did nothing for him.

Now, all these complicated enactments are thrown into one single Act, which forms a complete code of the subject. There is no necessity for the inventor to go personally or send an agent to the Patent Office at all. He can send his application by post, on a form which he can get at any place where bill stamps are sold; and he has only to pay £1 in the first instance, and £3 within nine months afterwards, to secure protection for four years. He can, if he likes, do the whole thing in one job, by sending a complete specification of his invention in the first instance, and paying £4 down. Moreover, the inventor is not to be left helpless, and to be driven into employing a patent agent. When an application is made for a patent, the application is sent to an Examiner, paid by the Government, whose duty it is to see that the invention has been fairly described, that the specification and drawings have been properly prepared, and that the title of it shows what the subject-matter is. The Examiners are not, however, given power, as in America, to reject an invention for want of novelty. It was thought that to enable them to do this would be to throw on the State work which the individual ought to do for himself. The budget of the Patent Office would be vastly increased either at the expense of the general public, or at the expense of the general body of Inventors. In the latter case, the bond fide inventor, as to the novelty of whose patent there could be no doubt, would be mulcted to save the unoriginal inventor the costs and trouble of finding out whether the work which he put forward was his own, or was of any value or not. That mode would be handicapping the clever and careful for the sake of the stupid and lazy. But if the public in general were made to pay, they might very naturally object to have an additional tax imposed on them not merely in the immediate interest of a few, but that the few might have the power of imposing still further taxation, in the shape of the price of patented articles or licences for their manufacture. It is, no doubt, eminently desirable to avoid patent litigation; but it may be possible to pay too high a price even for peace, especially when it is not possible litigators, but other people, who have to pay the price. But the Patent Office, though it will not undertake to decide on the novelty of inventions, will not leave the inventor wholly in the lurch. It proposes to give him every assistance towards enabling him to find out for himself whether he is an inventor or not. The Patent Museum is to be placed under the Department of Science and Art, so that it may be made more generally useful and accessible. A public Register of Patents is to be kept. The Comptroller of Patents—a new officer of the Board of Trade—is to publish an illustrated Patent Journal, with accounts and drawings of patented inventions, reports of patent cases, and everything else likely to be useful to inventors. He is also to keep on hand copies of the specifications of all patents for the time being in force, to publish abridgements of the most important ones, and indexes, catalogues, and all other aids to research which may help the inventor to the knowledge of what others have done before him. But the Patent Office does not, and cannot, undertake to prevent all litigation. Litigation which turns on purely formal matters will be, to a great extent, prevented by the preliminary examination. Pitfalls which now beset the feet of the unwary in proceedings in “Scire facias,” of which a legal journal has stated that “it is hardly going too far to say that there is no one who can state with certainty what steps must be taken, and in what order, to repeal a patent in this way,” are to be stopped up by the abolition of these proceedings. But the substantial question of novelty, or of the title to an invention, will still remain, and must be fought out at law, either in an action to restrain an infringement of a patent, or in a petition for revocation. But in either case, the issue will be decided with the ordinary weapons, in the ordinary Courts. The confidence of inventors in those Courts is to be strengthened by the right given to either side to insist on a specialist being called in as Assessor to the Court, and stringent rules are laid down as to the particulars to be given in any such action as to the real points in dispute. In fact, every effort is made so far to ensure cheapness and speediness in dealing with patentees in the Courts.

But there are one or two points in the Act which, though minor ones, are very decided blemishes in it. The Law Officers of the Crown who have by an historical accident, depending chiefly on the payment of fees, become connected with the grant of patents are still to be so connected. They are not jointly, but singly, to be a Court of Appeal from the Comptroller of Patents, in such matters as whether an application for, or specification of a patent is to be awarded, whether a patent is to be granted when it is opposed on the important ground of want of novelty, or whether a patentee is to be allowed to correct or explain his specification after the patent is granted. There are many objections to this jurisdiction. It is an appeal from one single officer to another; it is an appeal from a quasi-judicial officer to an advocate; and it will in nearly every case be an appeal from one who knows more to one who knows less about the particular matter in hand. However fitting it may be that the Attorney-General's head should repose on the pillow of a Chief-Justiceship when he retires from office, while he remains in office he is essentially and par éminence an advocate, and not a Judge. He is, moreover, not necessarily particularly well acquainted with patent law, and very unlikely to be well acquainted with science, and he does not, as a rule, remain in office long enough to master the subject, even if he could. As the Law Officers of the Crown may be petitioners to the High Court of Justice for the revocation of a patent, they may possibly be judges and advocates in the same cause. Altogether, they have been placed in a false position, to which the symmetry of the whole system has been sacrificed, for the sake of preserving a merely historical tradition. A similar anomaly has been preserved, for the same reason, in retaining for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the jurisdiction in cases in which a prolongation of the patent beyond fourteen years is asked for. The Privy Council is a very august, but it is a very slow-moving and expensive body, and, like the Law Officers, is wholly without any special knowledge or aptitude for dealing with patents. As the Board of Trade is very properly set up as the Patents authority, it seems a pity that what is really an administrative question or one of policy should not also be placed in its hands.

Another point which is open to criticism is the retention of the large amount of fees payable in respect of patents after the first years. Under the old system, besides £25 at the first, £50 had to be paid at the end of the third year, and £100 at the end of the seventh. The new originating fee is, as we have said, only £4 at first, but £50 is still to be required afterwards, though at the end of the fourth instead of the third year, and the further fee of £100 at the end of the eighth, so that the total amount still stands at £154 for a fourteen years' patent. This is still too high. The ideal thing would be to bring patents within the reach of a man in receipt of weekly wages, without imposing on him any extraordinary strain. The initial fee should be reduced to half-a-crown on application, and 17s. 6d. to complete the pound on completion of the specification. At the end of the fourth year £5 more might be demanded, and protection secured for seven years. That would give ample time for any one to ascertain whether his patent was of value, and to have got his share of that value, and a fee remunerative to the Office of £50, or even £100, might then be exacted. Happily, however, the scale of fees is not fixed once and for all by the Act, but power is reserved for the Board of Trade to reduce them, with the consent of the Treasury. Experience will prove whether there is or is not room for reduction in the direction indicated. At any rate, there can be little doubt that a great stimulus to invention will be given even by the present scale, and that the field of inventors will be largely increased. We cannot, indeed, hope all at once to rival the inventive productiveness of the United States. As the American manufacturer put it to his English brother, “If a boot-boy were to come to me, saying he had got an invention, I should go into it, and try to help him to work it up; whereas, if yours ever summoned up courage to speak to you about it, you would probably tell him not to be a conceited young jackanapes, and to mind his own business.” We in England have not got the same feeling, if not of equality, yet of the possibility of equality, which the people have in the States, nor does every one live in that atmosphere of progress which is native on the other side of the Atlantic. But the Watts, and the Arkwrights, and the Stephensons were born in the old country, and we may fairly hope to see their number largely increased under the stimulus of this Act.

OUR BOYS.

THE most marked feature of our day, the pleasanter lives of the young, has certainly been attended with one disadvantage. It is much more difficult to find careers for the Boys, as they grow up. It is not more difficult, strange to say, to find them for the girls. Not only is their great profession, Marriage, as attractive as ever, and rather more full of prizes, not only are new careers constantly thrown open to young women, but, whether from a change in education, or in discipline, or in their aspirations, they are becoming much more energetic and efficient. The good "girl of the period" of the middle-class has not only ceased to be silly, and become, as her elders think, only too well educated, but she has acquired courage and industry, knows her trade, be it designing, or lecturing, or teaching, or shopkeeping, or hotel management, quite thoroughly, and goes out into life, whether to earn her living or to occupy herself, with a sangfroid and independence which her grandmother would have half admired and half condemned as "forward." She has acquired, too—Heaven knows how, for education does not give it to the boys—the habit of patience, and will work on steadily year after year at her apprenticeship with a perseverance which would be beyond praise, but that she does not see that it deserves any, and rather chuckles over it than moans. Whether the new education of girls will produce the best results on their health, or their morals, or their capacity to manage families of their own, may still be questioned, though we do not question it, but their superior efficiency, competence for the business of life, is past discussion. That is not the case with the boys in the same class. They are distinctly less eager to get out into the world than they were fifty years ago,—are, in fact, hardly eager at all. They do not fret to be their own masters, as why should they? Home is pleasanter, parents are gentler, their own tastes are more consulted, and they are, as we believe—though this will be disputed—much more timid of facing unsupported the realities of life. They have seen more, talked more, heard more than their forefathers; and, as one result, show none of those strong "biases" which mothers still expect from tradition in their sons, and which sprang quite as much from concentration or poverty of ideas as from any other source. They do not, we think, shrink more from hardship, or from work; but they have grown at once more self-distrustful and more far-sighted, and therefore less disposed to act without hesitation or inquiry. They doubt about every career open to them, criticise all proposals, and stand idle for months, sometimes years, not so much from want of industry as want of decision. This indecision is, of course, greatly increased by the new reluctance of parents to give simple orders. Sixty years ago, the educated father with no fortune found an "opening" for his son, or had one offered him, told him to take it, fitted him out for his work, and considered the matter ended. The lad, unless moved by an irresistible disgust, which was rare, and was, when it occurred, attended to, accepted the "opening" as a matter of course, part of the order of Nature, like the down on his lip, toiled in what was virtually an apprenticeship for five years, and then started for himself, and either succeeded or failed. The failures, we believe, were exceedingly numerous, more so in proportion than they are now. Every family had its records of members who had "gone to the bad," or "disappeared," or died drunk, or got rid of themselves in some way; but the records were very carefully concealed, and the failures very rapidly forgotten. Parents were very stern, new chances were very rarely given, and the "throwing-off" of a son in a distinct and definite way for habitual bad-conduct was an ordinary occurrence, so ordinary as to be, in the light literature of the time, the rule, and not the exception. The majority of lads, being forced at once to work and to self-dependence, succeeded more or less, sometimes descending the ladder a good many steps in order to succeed, and renewed acquaintance with their parents twenty years afterwards as independent men. Now-a-days, parents are too anxious and too reflective for this rough-and-ready treatment, and consider all chances so carefully, not to say so timidly, that they end by fancying the world overstocked, nurse their own fears as grievances, and jump eagerly at such a chance of complaining aloud as the Telegraph has just given them.

For ten days past, that journal, which likes to start a "topic" during the non-political season, has devoted two columns a day to a mass of letters, most, if not all, of them quite genuine—though we suspect the first, which is too well written, and contains too distinct an invitation to correspondents—upon this subject. They are of all kinds, especially foolish kinds—one man thinks the Government ought to legislate more, and half-a-dozen others suggest enlistment in a regiment of gentlemen, raised, we suppose, under the short-service rules—but they are, almost without exception, penetrated by three ideas, all true, and all more or less exaggerated. One is that the market for boys is overstocked. Another is that modern education is utterly useless, if not a positive drawback, in the way of getting a living. And the third is that the best available refuge is the Colonies, and that anybody can get on there. As to overstocking, there is no doubt, with the improvement in education, an overstocking of what are called the educated professions, and of the clerkships which could once be obtained by anybody competent to fill them. The higher branch of the legal profession is over-full, though the lower is not; the Church is as full as it can hold; there are too many engineers for the work to be done in England; and the country doctors complain of competition. As to clerkships, they are filled either by Germans, who will work all day for six pounds a month; or by boys from below, to whom places in an office seem a rise in life, who can do all that is required, and who are consequently not only competent, but willing, which the "gentlemen" are not. But of modes of making a living there must be as good a proportion as there ever was. The national wealth increases even faster than the national numbers, and with the national wealth the occupations of the nation. There are twenty things to be done where there were ten, if only the fathers worrying about their sons knew what they were. They do not know, as a rule, and are fretting, not because ways of acquiring livelihood are fewer, but because three or four ways have attracted too many competitors. The number of positions on the Railway system, for example, which educated men could hold without repulsion must be greater than that of all the positions open fifty years ago to the Bar. The idea of overstocking is, we suspect, much more a product of anxious ignorance than of the actual condition of things. As to education being a drawback, that has been said for a hundred years, and is no more true than it was at first. No education will qualify the incompetent, and the competent are disciplined by the old method as well as by any other. The contempt for scholarship expressed by so many writers in the Telegraph, is only a result of disappointment at finding that scholarship will no more supersede apprenticeship than ignorance would in the old days. Of course, if, as many of the correspondents suggest, the educated lads are to take to handicrafts, the time spent on Greek is wasted time; but in spite of the surface popularity of their view, we doubt if it will be accepted. An artisan's life, they may rely on it, is not the happiest; nor is it, as some of them say, leisurely and well paid. To succeed as an artisan means to work hard for ten hours a day for six days a week, and live for years on from £60 to £75 a year, in constant competition with men who keep down wages by desiring little civilisation. It is a fact which educated fathers may ponder with advantage, that the most successful of all European strivers, and the men who, in a coarse way, make most of a study of life, the Jews, though they do not avoid shopkeeping, do avoid handicrafts, with a decision which affects their whole position in the world.

And lastly, there is the craze about the Colonies. There is no doubt that a man who knows any trade or profession well, and can bear rough life, may find in the Colonies openings denied to him here; but the idea conveyed in these letters, that any lad with a five-pound note who reaches a colony can get on, is an illusion. He will be forced to work or starve, he will be compelled to "put his dignity in his pocket," and he will become shifty, and will therefore enjoy those extra advantages; but if he would consent to enjoy them in England, he might get on as well. The single real advantage of emigration to the lad without a trade is that he is cut loose from home, as his grandfather was by a different set of circumstances, and forced, by an irresistible whip, to do what he can without picking and choosing. If the same whip could be applied in England, he would probably get on as well. So far from all lads succeeding in the Colonies, a great number sink utterly in life, and become either overworked drudges, inmates of the almshouses, or whiskey-drinkers, doomed to die early and be forgotten. The father who signs "An M.A. of Oxford," and who writes exultantly of his success in getting his sons "done," has been exceptionally fortunate. The usual result of his rough experiment would have been that one son would have drunk himself to death, one would have returned ruined, and one would have earned good mechanics' wages; and even as it is, success has only been achieved by the lads losing most of the advantages of their education. He writes:—

"I have five sons. The eldest, at seventeen, disliking the desk, and preferring the sea, I apprenticed to the sea. He learnt his profession thoroughly; not caring, however, to follow it, and knowing how a ship should be stowed, he has settled down in Sydney, and is a

'stevedore.' He is settled! The second I got on a sheep-walk in New Zealand,—a delicate lad, but plucky. Learned wool matters, &c.; worked like a man, beginning at 15s. the week and all found, and is earning his livelihood. How did I do this? Got letters of introduction to Tom, Dick, and Harry out there, paid his passage, and gave him £15. He is settled! Third son went to sea, and I served him the same as the second. He is in Queensland, breaking-in horses and all sorts of things. He is settled! Shove your name, &c., in your pocket, and 'push.' That's the secret of success. Fourth son, educated at college; did not like the profession intended for him. Off he went last June to New York; paid passage, letters of introduction, a £5 note. Is now in a store at $5 a week, and more presently. He is done. The fifth is a junior clerk at 10s. a week. I see signs of emigration in his face. Off he goes presently. Every decent man, among his friends or acquaintances, can get letters of introduction abroad for his lads, if he likes. 'Somebody here in England knows somebody abroad,' and a letter is very simple to be had. If it only brings an invite to dinner—well, the boy is willing and pleasing, is interviewed, and something 'turns up.' I am a poor gentleman, and no money to spare, so I write and ask for letters, &c., and away go the lads.—Your sincere servant, AN M.A. OF OXFORD."

All those lads gain by going to the Colonies is release from the social prejudices which prevented their working in England at the only openings they could find. Had they so worked at home, they would have done as well as abroad, though no doubt they would have felt here more injurious effects from the loss of caste.

We wonder whether the kind of despair expressed in these letters to the Telegraph is as strongly felt in the smaller cities, especially the northern cities, as it is in London. We suspect it is not, and that the immigration from the whole world into London, and a certain segregation of classes which has arisen from its vastness, produce here a special sense of overcrowding, which, again, is better justified than in any other place. Educated lads in London, too, feel the pushing exceptionally, and though bright and helpful, grow more self-distrustful and afraid of life than other lads. They want more, too, and altogether have much more difficulty in making a start. That, however, is a peculiarity rather of a place than of all England, and exaggerates far too greatly the general opinion as to the increasing difficulty of providing for "our Boys." The difficulty is there, but it is at least as much in the fathers' minds as in the facts.

FRANCE, ITALY, AND SAVOY.

NO Sovereign ever succeeded to a grander tradition than Victor Emanuel; the history of the House of Savoy is the history of grand military achievements and noble illustrations; every mountain-side and glen of this picturesque principality has been associated with the gallant deeds and glories of their race; and all this, for the sake of vaulting ambition, was to be forgotten,—all the population, whose love and admiration of the princely House had grown with their growth, was to be transferred to a foreign Power."

Thus writes Lord Lamington, in the August number of the Nineteenth Century, and as the views he expresses touching the relations of Savoy to its present and ancient rulers are shared by many others, it may serve a useful purpose to bring them to the test of history, and show how little foundation they have in fact. The Dukes of Savoy, it is true, were always a strong race; they have played a noble part in the redemption of Italy, produced many successful warriors and astute politicians, and their history has been illustrated by gallant deeds and great military achievements. It has also been illustrated by disaster and disgrace, bigotry and oppression. Out of Russia, it would be difficult to find a royal House to which, up to the first half of this century, liberty and civilisation owed less than to the descendants of Humbert the White-Handed. Until Charles Albert began the era of reform, and raised the standard of revolt against the ascendancy of Austria, the Dukes of Savoy and the Kings of Sardinia were relentless persecutors of Protestantism, enemies of progress and misrulers of their people. It was a Duke of Savoy who, on April 29th, 1539, ordered John Lambert, a citizen of Geneva, to be burnt at the stake for selling heretical tracts. It was a Duke of Savoy (Emanuel Philibert) who, in 1555, caused to be burnt alive, at Chambéry, Jean Vernon, Antoine Laborie, Jean Trigallet, Bertrand Bataille, and Jean Girod, for having in their possession "wicked little Bibles in French," and a letter from Calvin, which Vernon had hidden in his stockings. Two years later, the priest Sanguyprivert, convicted of scandal and heresy, was condemned to be suspended over a fire for two hours, care being taken that he was not burnt to death, and to be delivered thereafter to the Inquisition. And these are not a hundredth part of the cruelties which were either ordered, or sanctioned, by a Prince for whom Lord Lamington expresses unbounded admiration. His hideous persecutions were the occasion of Milton's magnificent sonnet, "On the Late Massacre in Piedmont," and provoked Cromwell's famous threat that "unless favour were shown to the poor people of God, the English guns should be heard at the Castle of St. Angelo." Even so recently as forty years ago, the laws of Savoy and Sardinia, if less atrociously cruel, were no less intolerant than in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In 1840, M. Pache, a Swiss pastor from Morges, in Canton Vaud, while lying on a sick bed at Aix-les-Bains, gave a Protestant tract to his Savoyard nurse, and for this offence he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment and a heavy fine! An appeal to the King (Charles Albert), to whom M. Pache was personally known, produced the cold response that the law must take its course. But M. Pache's treatment was merciful compared with that of an unfortunate peasant who, about the same time, was condemned to two years at the galleys for speaking disrespectfully of the Virgin Mary.

Up to the French Revolution of 1789, and for some time after the restoration, the Kings of Sardinia ruled despotically. But forms of governments are of secondary importance; the true measure of their quality is the welfare of the governed. Judged by this test, few rules have been worse than that of the Kings of Sardinia in their Cisalpine States. They wasted the substance of their people in foreign wars, and whether their masters gained victories or sustained defeats, the lot of the commonalty was equally unfortunate. When the King won, they had to support his armies; when he lost, they had to keep his enemies; and the tax-gatherer was always with them. In the eighteenth century the peasants of Savoy were almost in as evil plight as the peasants of France. They were crushed with tithes, corvées, gabelles, and feudal burdens of every sort. Personal servitude was only abolished in 1751. Even after the reforms introduced by Victor Amadeus II., the condition of the country was wretched almost beyond belief. "In 1781," says Victor de St. Genis, in his "History of Savoy," "the year in which the King abolished custom-houses on bridges and highways, and imposed on meat a tax of two deniers a pound for their maintenance, he introduced into Savoy that Italian pest, the lottery, and so, by offering inducements to dissipation, counteracted the favours he had granted to industry. Most of the King's other reforms, being based on monopoly, despotism, and privilege, made ten people discontented for every person they satisfied." In addition to their legal burdens, the peasants had to support the exactions of swarms of vagabonds and brigands. The evil grew to such a pitch that, in January, 1781, the Governor of Savoy organised a general battue in the whole of the seven provinces of the Duchy, "for the pursuit and extirpation of the malefactors who infest the country and trouble the public peace." All the valid men in every parish were armed, placed under the command of old soldiers, and told to seize every vagabond, beggar, and pedlar they could find, as well as every other person "whose appearance they might deem suspicious." Five years later the operation had to be repeated, from which it may be inferred that general battues are not the most efficient means of preserving public order. The sanitary, social, and religious condition of the country at this time may be judged from the facts that, in 1790, the Duchy, with a population of hardly 400,000, had 8,800 crétins, 3,000 nobles possessing feudal rights, and 1,300 monks and priests, who were supported by tithes and taxes, and exercised, in religious matters, almost despotic power. No wonder that the first mutterings of the French Revolution were received in Savoy with a thrill of joy. The news of the resistance of the Parliament of Paris to the despotic measures of Brienne spread from valley to valley like a train of gunpowder. Bonfires were lit, joy bells rung, and the peasantry were only restrained by fear of the consequences from breaking into open revolt. In June, 1791, there was a conflict between the people and a number of Emigrant French nobles in the streets of Chambéry; and at Thonon, Dr. Desaix (father of General Desaix), and several others, forced the prison and freed all the political prisoners whom it contained, a proceeding for which they were afterwards hanged in effigy. In September of the following year, when a slender force of French troops entered the Duchy, the Piedmontese retired before them, almost without firing a shot, while the invaders were everywhere received with transports of enthusiasm. "We are not a conquered people," said the Syndic of Chambéry to General Montesquieu, "but a people delivered;" and when the Assembly of the Allobroges, formed of the Deputies of the six hundred and fifty-eight communes of the principality, met at the capital they demanded, by an almost unanimous vote, annexation to France, a request which, it is hardly necessary to say, was promptly granted.

The yoke of Napoleon was not light; the abolition of feudal and ecclesiastical privileges, and the institution of a rational civil code had to be bought by a blood-tax which may well have made the Savoyards regret at times the rule of their ancient Princes. But any lingering sense of loyalty was speedily extinguished by the proceedings of the restored Victor Emanuel I., who had learnt less even than his friends the Bourbons. He suppressed the Code Napoléon by a stroke of the pen, re-established entails and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, restored all the institutions of the ancien régime, and filled every office of importance with Piedmontese employés. Some of the punishments sanctioned by the King were of barbaric severity. In June, 1824, a parricide of the name of Dumontet had his hand amputated, was then led through the streets of Verney, the stump still bleeding, after which he was hanged and his body burnt. The fiscal regulations were even more absurd than the criminal penalties. The King's simple order was sufficient to cancel any debt or abrogate any contract, and orders to this effect were not difficult to obtain. A labourer who worked for a Genevan employer even for a single day was punished by imprisonment. The export and import of farm produce was subject to a variety of vexatious regulations. In 1816, when Savoy was suffering from a terrible dearth, the King laid an embargo on the importation of corn from Piedmont into the principality, and the inhabitants of the Chablais were saved from absolute starvation only by the efforts and benevolence of the citizens of Geneva. The Savoyards were made to feel at every turn that their interests were sacrificed to the interests of their Italian fellow-subjects. The only subjects allowed to be taught in the public schools were reading, writing, and arithmetic, the Catholic religion and the Italian language. This was, perhaps, the unkindest cut of all, for Savoy had conquered Piedmont, not Piedmont Savoy. It was as if one of our Norman Kings had tried to make his Norman subjects learn the English tongue. In the next reign, most of these abuses were swept away, and Charles Albert, under the influence of Cavour, granted his people a liberal constitution. Nevertheless, the King, by placing himself at the head of the Italian Revolution, forfeited for his successor, if not for himself, the Dukedom of Savoy. The Savoyards were Italians neither by race, language, nor sympathy; they detested the Piedmontese, and disliked being governed from Turin. Italian unity was nothing to them, and they strenuously objected to sacrificing blood and treasure in order that Italy might be free, and their Prince reign at Rome. The principle of nationalities, evoked in justification of the war against Austria, began to be openly pleaded in support of the annexation of Savoy to France. In 1859, a numerously-signed petition, the first paragraph of which ran as follows, was presented to King Victor Emanuel:—"Sire, the great events which have shed so much lustre on your Majesty's reign are significant of the new destinies in store for the Italian people. The acts of your Government, the terms of peace which have just been signed, proclaim the foundation of an Italian nationality, limited by the Alps and defined by the language and manners of the races by whom it will be constituted. These definitions, Sire, exclude Savoy. Savoy is not Italian, and never can be. What, then, is the future, reserved for her?"

As an argument, this was unanswerable. The Savoyards claimed for themselves no more than the King was claiming for Unredeemed Italy,—the right to choose their own rulers. An attempt was made to suppress the agitation of which the petition in question was an ominous sign, and if the demand for annexation had not been warmly supported by the Government of France, it would probably have been refused by the Government of Sardinia; but the double pressure was irresistible, and the King and Cavour agreed that Savoy should be left free to choose her own destiny. As to what that choice was likely to be there could be little doubt. Savoy, as we have shown, owed scant gratitude to the royal race by whom she had so long been ruled; and though we may question the taste which preferred a hardly-veiled despotism to a constitutional monarchy, the material interests of the principality pointed imperatively to union with France. France is the natural and nearest market for Savoyard produce. The Emperor, moreover, promised, if the annexation should take place, to convert High Savoy into a zone franche, a boon which would render the trade of the Department with Switzerland absolutely free. In these circumstances, it is not surprising that the people, by a large majority, decided to become French. The vote was almost unanimous. Of 135,000 electors, 130,000 voted for annexation, 235 against, and the abstentions were something less than 5,000. In England, this vote was looked upon as either a juggle or a fraud, and Lord Lamington calls it "a mock plébiscite." The imputation is one which cannot be sustained. The Savoyards managed the plébiscite themselves; when it took place, there were in the principality neither Italian syndics nor French prefects. The voting was by ballot and by commune, and the scrutiny was conducted by the Court of Appeal, the highest tribunal in the realm. Whatever influence Sardinia possessed was exercised against annexation. At Turin, the result of the voting caused a painful surprise. It could be no pleasure to Victor Emanuel to know that among a people who had been ruled by his ancestors for eight centuries, his dynasty had so few friends. Even among the higher classes there were only two—General Menabrea and the Marquis Leon Costa—who "opted" for Sardinia. It is much to be regretted that a part, at least, of High Savoy was not annexed to Switzerland, instead of to France, and a suggestion in this sense was actually made by Louis Napoleon to England; but the proposal was summarily rejected by Lord Palmerston and the Prince Consort, as implying approval of a proceeding to which they strongly objected.

There is every reason to believe that Savoy is well satisfied with the French connection, and that another plébiscite would give a result identical with that of 1860. The material progress of the ancient principality since the annexation has been immense. Marshes have been reclaimed, bridges built, roads and railways made, and numerous schools and public buildings constructed. In Chambéry and several other towns, property has trebled in value; and though the Savoyards had to pay for their new privileges by submission to ten years of imperial rule, the Government under which they now live is probably much more to their liking than that which prevails on the other side of the Alps.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

INSTINCT v. CIVILISATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the current number of the Cornhill (September), there is a short tale which propounds a curious psychological theory which I should like to see discussed in your pages, by those who have sufficient knowledge of the subject, in the interests of our common Christianity and civilisation.

The hero of the story is the Rev. John Creedy, B.A., of Magdalen College, Oxford. By birth he is an African, and at a very early age he was captured and sent to England, where he received the best of school and University educations, resulting in the cultured man and the Christian. In due course he married an English girl, and returned to Africa as a Missionary to his own people. An uncle James objects to the match, on the ground of "instinct;" and as the mail steamer, with the couple on board, moved out of the Southampton Water on her way to the Gold Coast, the author represents the old uncle, who is a sea captain with accumulated experiences of those parts, as saying, "And when he gets among his own people, his instincts will surely get the better of him, as safe as my name is James Berry."

The story then turns to justify this prophetic utterance, and the tom-tom and the war-song prove too much for John Creedy, for "instinct had gained the day over civilisation; the savage in John Creedy had broken out; he had torn up his English clothes, and, in West African parlance, had gone Fantee." There is a pathetic passage on the illness and the death of the little English wife. When death had claimed her, through the agency of yellow fever, the widower "puts on his white surplice, and for the first and only time in his life he read, without a quiver in his voice, the Church of England Burial Service over the open grave; and when he had finished he went back to his desolate hut, and cried with a loud voice of utter despair, 'The one thing which bound me to civilisation is gone. Henceforth, I shall never speak another word of English; I go to my own people.' So saying, he solemnly tore up his European clothes once more, bound a cotton loin-cloth about his waist, covered his head with dirt, and sat fasting and wailing piteously, like a broken-hearted child, in his cabin."

It is possible that the writer of this story only intended to tell an interesting and touching romance, but, consciously or unconsciously, he has struck a deeper chord. He not merely strikes a blow at foreign Mission work, but at the central and most vital power of Christianity, which ought not to be left unchallenged; and in the hope that you and others may take notice of his illustrated theory, I write this note. He localises Christianity, and deprives it of its universal power claimed by itself and by its adherents.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ASTLEY COOPER.

[It is quite certain that, in Australia, natives trained from childhood like English gentlemen have suddenly stripped themselves, and gone back to savagery. So, we believe, have Red Indians. So have reclaimed English gipsies. The explanation is, we believe, that the continuous self-restraint demanded by civilisation becomes to some men, full of hereditary savage will, so intolerable, that if any shock weakens the will, they throw off the burden.—Ed. Spectator.]

PREBENDARY ROW ON THE BLASPHEMY PROSECUTIONS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to offer a few remarks on your correspondent Mr. Batho's letter? He says, "I am bound to assure your readers that a greater misrepresentation of the case could scarcely have been conceived" than my statement of it. Your readers shall judge whether it is your correspondent or myself who has been guilty of misrepresentation. Before, however, I address myself to the charge in question, I wish to draw attention to the fact that a little more than half of his letter is occupied in affirming what I myself have affirmed in a few sentences, viz., that Mr. Foote is a man quite capable of distinguishing between good and bad taste, of great intellectual power, and who, when I was in the habit of meeting him, always in discussion conducted himself as became a gentleman. I should have thought that your correspondent might not inaptly have introduced this portion of his letter by saying that he was happy to be able to corroborate my testimony, for the whole of it is neither more nor less than a corroboration of my assertions. He has, however, taken the opportunity to imply that the defenders of Christianity are conspicuous for their bitterness, and that Mr. Foote has been impelled by that bitterness to use the weapons which he employs. I by no means wish to deny—on the contrary, I deeply lament the fact—that many persons who are totally ignorant of the entire controversy put themselves forward as its defenders, and between ignorance and violence of temper greatly damage the cause which they undertake to defend. I think, however, that there is a danger that your readers may confound the "Christian Association" spoken of by your correspondent, who sent the score of intemperate gentlemen in question, with the Committee of the Christian Evidence Society, on which I habitually sit. They were certainly not sent by us. It is true that at our instance a considerable number of eminent clergymen and Nonconformist ministers in London, and others, have given lectures and taken part in discussions in the Hall of Science. While my health permitted, I was habitually present, and I can affirm in the most positive manner that not one of these conducted himself in a manner other than became a gentleman and a Christian. Allow me also, Sir, to notice an additional fact, on which I look back with extreme satisfaction. Whenever I have lectured or discussed in that hall, I have been treated with all the courtesy I could reasonably expect. I think that the statement above is due to the Committee of the Christian Evidence Society, because, as they are well known to send persons whom they believe competent to discuss with unbelievers, there is a danger that your readers may infer that the "score of gentlemen" in question were sent by that Committee.

I now address myself to the personal charge of misrepresentation. Your correspondent says:—"In the first place, the publication [in question] was not a parody of our Blessed Lord. . . . The sheet, if a parody at all, was merely a parody of those incidents in the life of Christ which, while they neither add to nor detract from the beautiful character of Christ per se, are looked upon by the light of modern reasoning as incredible." Now, what are the facts? I have the sheet which was the subject of prosecution lying open before me. It consists of no less than sixteen pictured delineations of our Lord, each of which is simply hideous, with hideous accompaniments. I labour under a disadvantage on this occasion, because I dare not pollute your pages by such a description of them as would give your readers a lively idea of their contents; and I am persuaded that if I were to attempt to do so, you would decline to publish it. I can, therefore, only observe that they stand far beneath the level of the most outrageous caricatures that have ever appeared in Punch. I feel, therefore, that your readers will be of opinion that I am guilty of no misrepresentation in describing these as indecent parodies, which contain neither reasoning nor argument; and, if they are at all persuasive, they can only be so by appealing to what is low and base in human nature. To affirm, therefore, that such caricatures "neither add to nor detract from the beautiful character of Christ per se," is simply preposterous, when these sixteen pictures delineate him with a physiognomy unspeakably grotesque, or, to speak the truth, with one which denotes moral degradation. "One example," says your correspondent, "will suffice;" and he selects one which may be said to be the least disgusting of the sixteen, viz., the turning of the water into wine. I say, on the contrary, that one example will not suffice, for my representation is based on the combined effect of the whole sixteen. But even here there is a suppressio veri, for your correspondent mentions only the surroundings and accessories of the delineation, but suppresses all mention of the grotesque figure which is intended to portray our Lord, which, after all, as I have said, is the least disgusting of the set. This grotesque figure is represented as pouring water out of a garden waterpot into five vessels bearing labels of as many kinds of wine, showing that they had been previously used to hold wine. Let your readers, therefore, judge of the meaning which this caricature is calculated to suggest. I submit, therefore, that these sixteen caricatures are "vile and indecent parodies;" that they are not "legitimate satire, showing how events which sentiment pictures in ethical light may be capable of explanation in the simplest and commonest form;" or that if a similar caricature were "applied to any creed antagonistic to Christianity," say, for example, if a similarly outrageous caricature of Mahomed had been displayed in a city in India, the greater part of whose inhabitants were Mahomedans, that any person, except one of a low order of mind, "would have looked upon it as amusing and forcible, and not devoid of reasoning and argument." I think that I have now said sufficient to settle matters between your correspondent and myself. I have, therefore, now only to submit to the judgment of the Court—of yourself as judge, and of your readers as the jury—which of us it is "who has been guilty of a greater misrepresentation of the case than could scarcely have been conceived." It has often been urged in Mr. Foote's favour that this is the first time that he has been guilty of this offence. It is true that it is the first time that he has been made the subject of a prosecution; but the Freethinker had long been made the vehicle for the publication of similar parodies. One of these I can very briefly describe; I think it was in the number in which my tract on the "Historical Evidence of Resurrection," published by the Religious Tract Society, was reviewed. The frontispiece consisted of a picture representing God Almighty addressing Cain, while the latter is smoking a pipe, and sitting upon a partly-closed box, from which the legs of Abel protrude. When, therefore, the City authorities took steps for suppressing a public nuisance, it was necessary to make a selection from these parodies, to enable them to constitute a prosecution. It was not the only one that had appeared. I have already said that I am no admirer of the so-called Blasphemy Laws in their present form, and I trust that the Government will introduce a Bill into Parliament during the next Session substituting for them the English law as it exists in India, or, at any rate, such a law as will meet the requirements of the present day. I also concur with you in thinking that the sentence was somewhat severe, but this is a matter for the consideration of the Home Secretary. I would only add, that no one can be an adequate judge of the greatness of the provocation who has not seen the weekly series of the parodies in question.—I am, Sir, &c.,

C. A. Row, Prebendary of St. Paul's.

[We published Mr. Batho's letter from a sense of fairness to the weaker side. We cannot, however, continue the controversy, and the correspondence must close here. For ourselves, we retain the opinion that coarse caricature is in theological controversy an evil weapon; that it was right to check Mr. Foote, but that the sentence was cruelly severe.—ED. Spectator.]

RUTLAND AND THE COUNTY ELECTIONS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Fully agreeing with your admirable article as to how the Tory counties are to be won, permit me to give the political history of East Cornwall during the past forty years. In 1841, its condition was almost as bad as Rutland; the two Tories were returned, and Mr. (now Sir John) Trelawny only polled between 1,600 and 1,700, whilst the Tories polled between 3,000 and 4,000. In 1852, another contest took place; Mr. (afterwards Lord) Robartes fought two Tories. I remember the great open-air meeting at Wadebridge, which was addressed by both sides from the same platform. I had procured and given to Mr. Robartes the returns from the Board of Trade of the quantity of corn imported from the repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846 up to 1852, and the amount was 50,000,000 quarters. This fact Mr. Robartes made use of in his speech, whereat the Tories were delighted, and told the farmers that "was the cause of the low price of corn," and asked the Liberals how they could expect the farmers' votes. Mr. Robartes replied, pointing to the group of squires on the other side, "You, gentlemen, have never eaten a loaf the more in consequence of this enormous importation, but who has eaten it? Why, those who had not sufficient, before the odious Corn Laws were abolished." Then he quoted the verse, "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need," &c. The vast audience uncovered during the quotation, and at its conclusion an enthusiastic cheer arose. The contest was never doubtful from that hour, and Mr. Robartes headed the poll by 621.

Having won one seat, the Liberals believed they could win both, but could not find a candidate until 1868, when Mr. Brydges Willyams consented to come forward, in conjunction with Sir John Trelawny, and announced himself to the constituency thus:—"My political opinions, early formed, and strengthened by experience, are strongly in favour of civil, religious, and commercial freedom, and I will give an unfaltering support to Mr. Gladstone, so long as he continues to lead the Liberal party in the cause of peace, retrenchment, and reform." The result was that the Tory candidate retired before the day of election, and the Liberals had a walk-over, and won both seats. Come down, again, to 1880, when Mr. Borlase, a stranger, was induced to come forward, in conjunction with the Hon. Charles Robartes. Their addresses and speeches appealed to "Liberalism as the better creed," and their tone was elevated. The Tories talked about "local burdens," but the electors considered that two Tory Members would be the greatest "local burden" they could have, and elected the two Liberals by a majority of 900. "The tenantry are as capable of comprehending the Liberal creed, if only it were brought home to them, as any other class in the community." Let it be the duty of Liberals, then, by the formation of local clubs, affiliating them with the National Liberal Federation, the National Reform Union, and the National Liberal Club, thus securing their political literature and lecturers, to win the Tory counties.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"THAT BUGBEAR, THE NEXT ELECTION."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The words are those of Lord Colin Campbell, the Member for Argyllshire, who writes on Saturday to the Scotsman:—

"Of all the politico-ecclesiastical evils which afflict the ecclesiastically-divided Scotland, surely this tendency to appeal to the passions of an electorate is the worst. It is no exaggeration to say that it is impossible for any man engaged in public life in Scotland to move hand or foot without being made to feel this insatiable blood-thirsty ogre of the next election glowering at him with fearful truculence of expression. To escape it, he must be the meekest and mealiest-mouthed of men."

The Campbells are not meek and mealy-mouthed, but it may be questioned whether their recent spurt of letter-writing is not imprudent, as well as gratuitous. To-day, Lord Colin writes to the Daily Review, emphasising a recent condemnation of the Permissive Bill, and maintaining "Whiggery," in opposition to more advanced Liberalism. A month ago, the Duke of Argyll wrote two letters; in one of them promising an application to the West Highlands of his agricultural views in some form apparently more trenchant than could be presented to the Royal Commission, and in another adding to the unprovoked attack which he recently made on a learned Judge for an election address issued several years ago, by patronising advice how to do his duty on the Bench. In all these dashing communications there is visible the same undertone of tremour as to the next election. What is the cause of this? A few months ago, Lord Colin Campbell was profuse in his protestations of the right of the Argyllshire constituency to turn him out, if he did not represent their views on the question of Scotch Disestablishment, and he was even complimentary as to the tone and manner in which his constituents who did not agree with him had intimated their resolution. What has made the change? Has it anything to do with Scotch farmers, Scotch crofters, and Scotch "puir people that labour the ground"? Unless I am mistaken, this latter question is likely to have an immense effect in Argyllshire, and on the whole western sea-board of Scotland, the next time we go to the poll, and the hostility shown by the Duke of Argyll to Mr. Gladstone's legislation will have no tendency to strengthen the hands of his House in the hour of trial. No one wishes Lord Colin Campbell to desert his colours on this any more than on the other question. But he must be aware of three things:—1. The Commission granted by Mr. Gladstone's Government has tabled the question of justice in the matter of land as clearly, if not quite as formally, as the question of justice in the matter of the Kirk had been so often tabled by him before. 2. The classes in Argyllshire who claim to be unjustly dealt with in this latter case are the same whose admitted grievances in the former have been so long unredressed. 3. No man in Scotland need look forward to an election as "truculent," "insatiable," "blood-thirsty," and a "bugbear," unless he has made up his mind deliberately to abide by the perpetuation of injustice, and is too honest to conceal it.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS COMMISSION.

SIR,—Canon Trevor and the Rev. G. R. Portal contend that the proper method of governing the Church [meaning the Clergy] is by Bishops and Synods, and not by Lay Courts. The result of allowing the Clergy to manage themselves is apparent in the Church of Rome. Is it expedient to follow that precedent?—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AND THE BATTERSEA RADICAL ASSOCIATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Allow me to suggest that Mr. Chamberlain did not refer to the question of a Redistribution Bill in his letter to the Battersea Association noticed in the last Spectator. The Association sent Mr. Chamberlain a resolution in favour of universal or manhood suffrage, and he replied that the first step must be the assimilation of the county and borough suffrage. He said:—"Public opinion must ripen considerably, before it would be possible for any Government to go further [than that assimilation], and the final settlement of the franchise question [not of redistribution] must of necessity be postponed until there is evidence of a sufficient general agreement on the subject." It may be better policy to keep the Redistribution Bill for a later Session, or even another Parliament; but it can hardly be said that the one question is less ripe than the other, nor is there any indication that Mr. Chamberlain was thinking of redistribution at all.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE LONDON PAROCHIAL CHARITIES BILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The passing of Mr. Bryce's London Parochial Charities Bill has reminded me of a circumstance that came under my notice a few months ago, that is of so special a character as to induce me to submit it to you for publication. I strolled into a City church one week-day, and on satisfying my curiosity by a general inspection of the interior, I was about to retire, but observing some needy and elderly people dropping in by ones and twos, I remained, to see the meaning of these strange arrivals. In a short time about thirty men and women had assembled, when presently an official emerged from the vestry, whom I accosted, and politely asked of him the reason of the presence of these poor people there at mid-day. The reply I looked for was that they had come to receive doles of bread from a parochial charity. To my surprise, however, the response was of a very different character, one which caused me great astonishment. The official replied, "These people have come for their half-yearly allowance, which, according to the terms of a parochial benefaction, they have merited, because of their having come to Holy Communion the prescribed number of times." In a few supplementary words, he had the commendable sense to condemn so vicious and odious a charity.

This and other forms of Church benefactions in the City no doubt explain the existence of so many colonies of the very poor, who herd in dens and alleys for the purpose of qualifying for a share of these pauperising and mischievous doles.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Not fearing wrath, nor meaning to be blest,
Simply for love, howbeit wrought in vain,
Of one poor soul, his brother, being old,
Or sick, or lost through satisfied desire,
Stands in God's vestibule, and hears his Choir
Make merry music on their harps of gold.

What is it but the deed of Very Love,
To teach sad eyes to smile, mute lips to move?
And he that for a score of centuries
Hath lived, and calls a continent his own,
Giving world-weary souls Heaven's best surprise,

REVELATION AND MODERN THEOLOGY.*

THE former works of Mr. Row have been mainly apologetic, and had a direct reference to the culture, the criticism, and the science of our time. They are remarkable for careful and accurate workmanship, for clear and vigorous thought, and for the singular freshness of the points of view from which Mr. Row regarded the conflict between the Christian and the non-Christian forces. He was led in those volumes to lay stress only on the fundamental and indispensable elements of the Christian faith. In the present work, Mr. Row presents to us this fundamental conception of the Christian faith, not in relation to the anti-Christian systems of thought, but in relation to the systems and creeds built upon this foundation, by many centuries of inference and argument. He regards this great and cumbrous system as a serious danger to the existence of Christianity, and a great hindrance to its progress. He discards the accretions of "modern theology," and insists on claiming the authority of revelation for those facts and doctrines alone which are contained in the deeds, words, and person of our Lord, as these are contained in the Gospels, and illustrated and explained in the Epistles. To Mr. Row, the Old Testament is valuable only in its historical relation to the coming of Christ, and as a record of the gradual process of revelation. The true revelation of God is contained in the person, life, and teaching of Jesus Christ. He is the true revelation of the moral attributes of God. In a series of instructive chapters, Mr. Row sets forth his conception of the revelation made to us by Jesus Christ. The announcement of the erection of the kingdom of God, the explanation of the nature of that kingdom, and of the claims of Christ to be its king, the perfection of Christ, his example, and the message of redemption, are the themes discussed in successive chapters of this book.

We are in entire sympathy with the position assumed by Mr. Row, so long as we look at the conflict which is going on between Christianity and non-Christianity. It is right and reasonable to take to the battle-field only those things which are indispensable; everything which can be dispensed with is an encumbrance and a disadvantage. To lay it down as a principle of conduct that people ought to live in their homes, as they are constrained to live during an active campaign, is not reasonable. This is, in effect, what Mr. Row has done. He has been able to move lightly, and to make skilful attacks, and to take up suitable points of defence, by having regard only to those elements of Christianity which are essential and fundamental; and the advantages have been so great, that he is inclined to discard all that he has found unnecessary in the field of battle. But in our homes we have a right to set forth the heir-looms of our faith, to draw out and unfold the wealth of our cherished possessions, and to display the greatness of our hopes and the altitude of our aspirations. The position which is best for the defence of the faith is far from being the most convenient, or most fit for unfolding the thought and life of Christianity. Methods of war are good for a time of war, but not good for times of peace. In like manner, the method of apologetic is good for apologetic. It has its own presuppositions, its own way of procedure, and its own goal to attain. It seems to us that Mr. Row has not kept this elementary distinction sufficiently in view. For he has applied his apologetic method to the science of dogmatic, and has failed in consequence. We are at one with him, while he is setting forth the simplicity of the Apostolic Gospel, and expounding the New Testament conception of the Kingdom of God. We regard many chapters in the book as of a very high order indeed. We agree also with those chapters in which he combats the argument of the late Dean Mansel. In short, we are not inclined to differ from the positive and expository parts of his volume.

On the other hand, it is obvious that whoso accepts the facts of the New Testament regarding the life, work, and teaching of Jesus Christ, has in them a doctrine, a worship, and a life. To draw these out in detailed and scientific order, to bring to clear consciousness the presuppositions, the doctrines, and the implications of these facts, is at once the duty and the privilege of all who accept them. Science is the record of man's understanding of the world, or of himself, his reading of the facts and laws of the universe, gathered from the facts themselves. Theology, Christian theology at least, is man's interpretation of the facts of supernatural revelation, as these are in the Scriptures. In both cases, we get the facts in their concrete order and actual relations, and in both cases we have to make our own interpretation of them. In neither case is the interpretation final at any stage of the process to which science has yet arrived. Our highest science is as yet only an approximation to the facts, our best theology is also only approximative as yet. But in both cases the most stringent criticism which can be applied to science and to philosophy is supplied by the facts with which each is concerned. There is no finality in either case, and our interpretation of the facts, their order and relations, must be subject to change and revision, as our experience widens, and our knowledge grows more definite.

While Mr. Row has approached in some measure to this view, which we regard as the right view to take in this relation, it appears to us that even he has not been able to free himself from the view which regards revelation as a means of communicating abstract truth which otherwise would be unknown to man. His distinction between revelation and theology is based on some such conception, and the whole discussion regarding the fallible nature of theology proceeds on that presupposition. To make our meaning clear, we quote the paragraph which sets forth Mr. Row's conception of revelation:—

"The word 'Revelation' is usually restricted to denote that knowledge of God which we obtain from some other source than the use of our ordinary faculties. But this limitation of its meaning is obviously inaccurate, for as we possess no faculties which enable us to penetrate into the secrets of the Infinite, we can possess no knowledge of God but from such revelations of himself as he is pleased to impart. Consequently, all our knowledge of God must be derived from revelation. The idea, therefore, which in popular language is intended to be conveyed by the term 'Revelation' would be more accurately expressed by 'Supernatural Revelation,' by which I mean a disclosure of such truths as our natural faculties are unable to discover, or can only do so imperfectly. This being so, it is important to determine in what way such knowledge of God can be communicated. There are only two possible ways in which it can be imparted, viz., first, by an objective, and secondly, by a subjective revelation. An objective revelation consists of facts which are manifestations of the divine energies; as such, they must constitute revelations of the divine character and purpose, in the same manner as the actions of a man are revelations of his character and purpose."

A subjective revelation consists of truth directly communicated to the mind of an individual." (pp. 18-19.)

In subsequent paragraphs, Mr. Row gives what he regards as instances of both kinds of revelation. The created universe is a natural objective revelation of God, and the authoritative declarations of conscience afford an instance of a natural subjective revelation. The life, work, and teaching of our Lord constitute the objective revelation of Christianity, and are mainly contained in the Gospels. "The remaining books of the New Testament contain the results of a number of subjective revelations, made to different individuals, and intended to be supplementary to its great objective revelation, and to be explanatory of its meaning." This paragraph is the main thesis of Mr. Row's book. The distinction drawn between objective and subjective revelation is really the principle which determines the relation of the Old Testament to the New, of the other books of the New Testament to the Gospels, and of theology to revelation, as these relations are conceived by Mr. Row and set forth in this volume.

Is this a real and valid distinction? Can there be "a disclosure of such truths as our natural faculties are unable to discover, or can only do so imperfectly"? We question the possibility of what Mr. Row calls subjective revelation, and we regard it as a survival of the old way of looking at revelation as a series of dogmatic statements, to be received on external authority,—dogmas which have no relation to the ordinary faculties of man. Our real knowledge has been won through the exercise of our ordinary faculties, on the facts presented to us in the external world and in our inner experience. The facts are given in their concrete order and relation, and science and philosophy consist in our interpretation of the facts. It is no otherwise in revelation. In this sphere also we have to do with facts, and the relations of these facts. God does not reveal ready-made dogmas; he reveals himself, in deeds of mercy or of judgment, in words which reflect his character and modes of action; and out of these revealing deeds of redemption, done in actual human history, we have to fashion our dogmas and construct our theology. The facts of revelation have the same relation to theology which the facts of nature have to science. If this be so, then the distinction which Mr. Row has drawn between objective and subjective revelation falls to the ground, as also does the greater part of the polemic which he has directed against modern theology. Modern theology, like modern science, is true and trustworthy, in so far as it truly represents and interprets the facts of revelation, and the only valid way of criticism with regard to one or the other is simply to bring them to the test of the facts, and to show that the reading of the facts is inadequate.

This is the task which Mr. Row ought to have set to himself. He has really done something very different. He has conducted a polemic against the use of the abstract deductive method in theology, a method which is passing into disuse day by day. In fact, the title "Modern Theology" is a misnomer. It ought to be "Ancient" or "Mediæval Theology," traces of which survive even in the pages of Mr. Row's latest book. Theology was once abstract and deductive, based on a priori conceptions. But all other sciences were so too, at a former period, as is well known to every student of the history of science and of philosophy. To a large extent science has overcome the fatal tendency; and we make bold to say that theology has overcome it too. The distinctive glory of modern theology lies here,—that it has got face to face with the facts. In theology, as well as in science, men have learned to work according to scientific method, and in many departments theology can show an advance as great as any of the natural or physical sciences is able to do. Exegesis has made a vast stride; Introduction is rapidly assuming an exact form; and Biblical Theology has won for itself a high position among objective sciences, while the learning which helps theology, as for example, knowledge of Oriental languages and history, has made more progress for the last half-century than during all previous time. It is only fair to say that Mr. Row, almost in express terms, admits all this. His controversy is not with these more recent sciences of theology, but with the ancient method, and with the conclusions reached by that method. We submit, however, that in a matter so important Mr. Row ought to have been more clear and definite in his statement of the issue. We would ask him to consider anew his conception of revelation, and fairly to face the question whether there is any historical instance of what he has called "subjective revelation;" and whether there has been a revelation of God to man in any other way than by a direct personal manifestation of himself to man?

[SECOND NOTICE.—THE KING OF BOURGES.]

UP to the date of his accession to the throne of France, under, perhaps, the most extraordinary circumstances recorded in any history, Charles VII. deserves, according to M. de Beaucourt, to hold a different place in the estimation of mankind from that which has been generally assigned to him. The present historian disproves by documentary evidence, one by one, the accusations which have been too readily accepted against the prince whom Alain Chartier describes as "alienated by rage and sedition from the royal house, combated by his enemies, assailed with sword and speech by his own subjects, doubtfully obeyed by the most of his people, forsaken by the chief of those in whom he had to trust, destitute of a treasury, and surrounded by rebel fortresses." He shows us Charles refusing to accept his cause as a lost one, in the face of desertion and discouragement, and steadfastly resisting his enemies on every side:—

"Four years of struggle, combat, and perpetual effort had revived the zeal of his partisans, and inspired confidence even in those who condemned him 'as a sick man judged to be dying, and abandoned without remedy.' He succeeded in making his power over a good part of the kingdom sure, and he won more than one adversary over to his cause. He did not love war for its own sake, but he never shrank from it when the right had to be fought for. We have before us ample evidence of his activity, good-sense, and intelligence in affairs. The people were prepossessed in his favour by his personal advantages, for he was 'moult bel prince, bian parleur à toutes personnes, et piteux envers povres gens.' At this period, neither his piety nor his generosity can be disputed. He loved science and letters, pleasure and horses, and was deeply interested in everything relating to artillery."

This description gives us Charles at his best. He had begun to slacken in his activity, and to be too easily accessible to influence and given to favouritism, during the year before his accession.

The family and personal relations of Royal houses and individuals present many strange pictures to the imagination, even in our own time, one in which Royalty is invested with but little romance; and as we retrace the course of history, those relations offer very striking points of consideration, whether we think of England or of France. A glance at the position of the young King of France in 1422 shows us a son repudiated and denounced by his father and mother (the former merely a puppet), the object of unnatural hatred, his rights set aside in favour of the English conqueror, Henry V., who had married Charles's sister, Katherine of France; while the Duke of Burgundy, who was in alliance with his mother and the English usurper, was also his brother-in-law. Such was the personal position of Charles, when he had to fight for his crown against the power of England and Burgundy. The actual state of the kingdom when the death of Henry V. seemed to be the only thing in the Dauphin's favour, is the subject of a very interesting chapter, which opens the second volume, and brings the reader in contact with all the great historical personages of the time, relates the history of the English alliance with Burgundy, tells the grand and shameful story of Joan of Arc, and ends with the Congress of Arras. The whole of the second volume is but an amplification of this first chapter, and the author treats every portion of his subject with the fullest detail. His description of the territorial divisions, the desperate strife of the factions, the firm hold of England on France, the apparently hopeless condition of the young King's affairs, the success of the foreign arms and the encouragement given by the English to the civil war that was rending the country in pieces, the diversion caused by the strife between the Duke of Gloucester contending for the rights of his wife, Jacqueline of Holland, with Philip of Burgundy in Hainault, and the adhesion of the Comte de Foix to the King's cause, the campaign of the Duke of Bedford in Anjou, the arrival of the Earl of Salisbury with a fresh army, and his march on Orleans, brings the reader to the central point of interest in the history of Charles,—the appearance on the scene of the heroic "Maid." M. de Beaucourt asserts that the intervention of Joan of Arc saved France, and although it is true that the King's arms met with heavy reverses after she was gone, and the general proposition may therefore be denied, we think the historian proves his case; for the moral effect of the wonderful episode of the Maid of Orleans was nothing short of salvation and a new life. It may be thought that M. de Beaumont treats this unsurpassably interesting portion of his subject rather tamely, that he might have given it more picturesque effect, although his description of the recognition of Charles by the Maid at Chinon is very fine; but we can perfectly understand that the pain which must attend the treatment of the subject—pain vivid after all the ages that have intervened between the unpardonable crime of the French and English alike—has compelled him to maintain an equable and unimpassioned tone. A French writer treats of Joan of Arc under the shadow of a double shame,—the remembrance of Charles who betrayed, and Voltaire who slandered her. An English writer may touch the subject with less restraint; he has only to admit the crime that Englishmen committed against a noble enemy, and to plead the reverence for her that has been felt and expressed ever since. M. de Beaumont applies himself with great earnestness and conviction to the endeavour to excuse Charles for his abandonment of Joan of Arc, when she fell into the hands of the English in 1430, during the siege of Compiègne; he brings a mass of testimony to bear upon his argument that the King was powerless to save his saviour. He entirely fails to convince us, and the very words which he quotes from M. L'Averdy (a magistrate in the eighteenth century who wrote a history of the condemnation and rehabilitation of the Maid of Orleans) seem to us to be a giving-up of the case. Having arrived at the conclusion "that it was absolutely out of the power of Charles VII. to ransom Jeanne, and that everything combined to oppose an insurmountable barrier to the desire which the King had to do so, and could not fail to have," he adds,—“The silence of historians upon the steps, at least of form, which Charles VII. might have taken to rescue Jeanne, leaves us free to presume that he may have hazarded some unsuccessful efforts to that effect.” A more damatory sentence has never been written, and M. de Beaumont ought to have felt that it is so. He makes Charles VII. a very different person in many respects from our idea of him; but nothing can ever wash that deadly stain from his memory; he must remain to all time a monument of Royal ingratitude, a leading exemplar of the wisdom of that great prince and cynic who counselled mankind against putting faith in princes. The attempt to extenuate his guilt in this respect does but weaken the effect of other rectifications, and is as vain as the efforts of some writers to excuse Charles I. of England for his abandonment of Stratford, which was, after all, only a venial sin, in comparison. M. de Beaumont succeeds somewhat better in his attempt to prove that the charge of indifference and delay about the rehabilitation of the Maid of Orleans, also brought against Charles VII., was unfounded, although she was executed in 1431, and the procès did not begin until 1450. It is true that three conditions were indispensable to the success of the undertaking,—the possession of Paris, the seat of the University which had furnished the assessors of the case; the possession of Rouen, the scene of the trial and the execution; finally, the assent of the Holy See. How all three conditions were attained the historian tells us in his chapters of detail. We do not care to deny, and it is not much to admit, that “without the Royal initiative, without the persevering energy displayed by Charles VII. during many years, the end would not have been obtained.”

M. de Beaumont gives us some curious glimpses of the private life of the young King, who was not, according to him, the heedless, pleasure-loving profligate he has been represented, even when he was out of sight and off the field of history; when, to quote the author's own words, “he shut himself up within retreats impenetrable alike to his subjects and to history.” That he indulged in reckless personal expenditure while his wife and his son were in circumstances as near to penury as royalty ever approaches—an experience which probably developed the avarice for which Louis XI. was afterwards conspicuous—we learn from accumulated facts and figures in these volumes, and that he allowed the most worthless of his favourites to plunder the people, who flocked to his cause with enthusiasm and devotion that are incomprehensible to the reader of his history after the lapse of ages, are still unassailed facts. An exceedingly interesting chapter deals with the period during which La Tremoille was in the ascendant, and reveals to us more strikingly than any other in the book what was the value and energy of that national vitality which survived every trial, and saved France in an epoch of continuous and various dangers. Bad government by bad men could not kill it; foreign invaders and intrigues could not kill it; its unfailing aliment was patriotism and sound sense, and amid all the convulsions of the time, the heart of the nation was sound and steadfast. What was it that ailed the King? This is the question the reader constantly asks, as the historian puts before him one contradictory trait after another, asking his assent to views of Charles's conduct that have no coherence. Was he never quite sane? Affable, generous, impulsive, mean, suspicious, timid, ungrateful, daring, energetic, pious, indolent, apathetic, sensual, false to his wife, a breaker of the Commandments, obstinate, weak, pitiful, but capable of consenting to crime and cruelty, able, and far-sighted, but the puppet of his favourites, a mass of contradictions, at once mean and romantic, Charles VII., as revealed by his latest and most sympathetic historian, does not convey to us the notion of a sane mind. M. de Beaumont admits the obscurity of the intervals during which the King is lost sight of, and which were particularly remarkable while La Tremoille “reigned,” but he claims for him the conduct of a skilful and difficult diplomacy throughout the long and troubled period which led up to and ended in the famous Congress of Arras, whereat the reconciliation between France and Burgundy was effected. Of the Congress, M. de Beaumont gives a very remarkable and noble description; in this chapter of his work, we are taken back to the old times which we strive to reconstruct when the buildings and the portraits of that far past are before our eyes, and the pomp and splendour of the middle-ages, with their solemn and gorgeous religious aspects, are suffered to illumine the usually sober and strictly ordered pages of the historian. The passage in which the great act of reconciliation is described is, perhaps, the finest piece of writing in the two volumes, and it is impossible to read it without a stir of emotion, without a vision of the great basilica of St. Vaast re-echoing to the shouts of the multitude who hailed the termination of the blood-feud and its meaning to the Kingdom of France with cries of “Noel! Noel!” of such vehemence that, says an eye-witness, “on n'eust pas ouï Dieu.” Amid the splendid throng who surrounded Philip the Good on that day, so auspicious for France, on which the axe was laid to the root of the English power, and amende honorable, for the murder of the Bridge of Montreuil, was made with unrivalled solemnity, there was a little child, hardly observed, perhaps, by the spectators, but who was also destined to play a great part in history. This was the baby Count of Charolais, then less than two years old, afterwards Charles the Bold. M. de Beaumont concludes this memorable chapter with the following remarks:—

“Such was the termination of the prolonged quarrel which had endangered the very existence of France, and had produced sanguinary results during a period of fifteen years. The Duke of Burgundy had a right to be content; he had obtained full satisfaction. As for Charles VII., he resigned himself, for the love of his people, to every sacrifice. It was no fault of his that the pacification which his subjects so greatly desired had not long since been effected. To establish this fact, we need only recall the various phases through which the interminable negotiations had passed (and which the author explains in full detail), and to refer to the offers that from the moment of his accession to the crown the King had caused to be made to the Duke of Burgundy, and which had been renewed by his Ambassadors at every conference. We do not hesitate to say that the chief credit remained on the side of the King, and that if Philip derived the profit, the honours of this great result must be assigned to Charles VII.”

M. de Beaumont has done well to bring his second volume to a close at so striking an epoch in the history of which he treats, and with so vivid, picturesque, and imposing an episode. The prince who was called in derision “the King of Bourges” is left before the mind's eye of the reader in a position of dignity, success, and honour. The fortunes of his kingdom are on the turn; the historian has succeeded in investing his subject with vital interest; the reader awaits with expectation the further narrative of the ensuing years of the King of France, Charles the Victorious.

Of all contemporary Italian authors, Signor de Amicis is beyond question the most popular. By his graphic sketches from military life, his literary portraits, his picturesque narratives of travel, he has acquired a reputation among his countrymen that causes every new work issuing from his pen to be regarded as a literary event. When, therefore, it was known that he was about to put forth a book on the subject of "Friendship," it was eagerly looked for, and the fact that the book ran into six editions in less than as many weeks speaks for itself as to the author's popularity. Nevertheless, a certain disappointment with regard to the work was expressed by the public and the Press. For one thing, its great length rather repelled readers; six hundred and fifty pages of nothing but observations and reflections upon the same theme appeared to them wearisome. To judge of the book in this manner, as one to be read straight through in a few sittings, is to do it some injustice. A book of characteristics, a sententious moral writing of this nature, must be read and judged as we should read and judge Montaigne, La Bruyère, or Sénancour. Now, while we cannot allow that De Amicis reaches to the height of the first-named, he may at times be worthily placed beside the latter, though he has moments when he falls into a vein that places him little above the level of an "A. K. H. B." Yet withal the book is of extreme interest in itself, and as an expression of the author's nationality. For we have not read many pages before we become aware that friendship as here regarded is looked at from a purely meridional point of view. We should call many of these friendships merely acquaintanceships, as lightly formed as dissolved, due to the more social, out-door life of the South. The author writes from the point of view of a bachelor, a man of the world, a man about town; here are no home friendships, made and fostered by the fireside.

"Friend is a solemn word,
But, like most solemn words, of easy use."

And Signor de Amicis uses it most easily; he includes in it not only all acquaintances, but even such people as we dislike, whom we desire to keep at arm's-length, vulgarians, &c. This is, indeed, to expand the term. In speaking of Signor de Amicis' book, we must, therefore, use "the most interesting and most singularly-misunderstood word in all languages" in the manner in which he has used it.

De Amicis' purpose in his work was to make a physiological and psychological study on Friendship. A cynic might define it as a book on friendship written by one who does not believe in it, for De Amicis takes care to inform us at the outset that he regards the Orestes and Pylades as so rare that they need not even be treated of, relegating them to the domain of poetry, which is equivalent to banishing them to the realm of fable.

The book begins with a study of the composition and nature of the group of friends among whom we live. It is a series of character-sketches of typical figures, penned by a master's hand. Without a touch of satire or bitterness, as a calm and impartial observer, who does not on that account abdicate his human personality so as to become indifferent, De Amicis holds up to view the most intimate and intricate labyrinths, all the confusions that reign and co-exist in human breasts. Among these pictures we find the humble friend, the diplomatic, the explosive, the Mephistophelian, the bore, &c. A very long chapter is devoted to "Pride," which, according to our author, is the strongest passion in the human breast, a rock on which all friendships are liable to shipwreck, and, when not to shipwreck, to suffer little collisions. The varieties of pride, he tells us, are infinite, and he describes some of these in detail. It is quite clear they are drawn from the life. He holds that even the most intimate friendships repose on the tacit compact that the pride of the one has made with the pride of the other; that it is understood, unspoken, that each must sacrifice to the pride of his friend a part of his sincerity, his liberty of judgment, his amour-propre, and that the sacrifices are to be equal. Whether this be true, we are not prepared to pronounce; it is at least new, and, if true, it is certain that De Amicis has dared to lift the veil from some human sentiments that no other writer has hitherto ventured to touch. De Amicis has certainly placed the deadly sin of pride under his anatomical knife, and has dissected it with patience and minuteness. One of the most masterly chapters is that called "Alti e Bassi." Written in the form of a diary, it purports to depict the vacillations of the pendulum of our opinion of a friend. A friend, he avers, even the most intimate, is never for thirty days successively the same for us. A thousand little causes, all of which are rooted in our pride, transmute him every moment in our eyes; cause him to recede from or to approach our hearts, lift him above the earth, place him below it, cause him to be now an adored brother, now a dubious acquaintance, even at times a hated enemy. This chapter can scarcely be called cynical, cynical though its theme sounds. There is an objective remorselessness of treatment about it that makes the reader shudder, the more because he suspects that for and with some persons all that is here told is so true, and yet he feels it is one of those truths of which we should not permit ourselves to raise the kindly covering to look it in the face. There are things about which we must advisedly keep up illusions, or too much that makes life endurable will crumble into dust at our feet. There are certain things, too, which, by being thus formulated, take a shape they never had before, and would never have assumed. No wonder, if De Amicis submits his feelings to such hyper-analysis, that he sadly exclaims, "We have but half-friends, and truly the fraction is yet smaller!" Indeed, a note of sadness, of disillusion, pervades the entire book. We feel that the author has passed his first youth, that it is written in the mezzo cammin della vita, when the writer is no longer young, nor yet grown old, when the hopes of youth are shattered, the calmer, gentler views of age not yet attained,—a point of life, in short, when we first learn to look back, as well as forwards. This feeling has given occasion for one of the most charming and kindly chapters in the whole work, called "Giovani e Vecchi," in which the author deals with the two new species of friends who come to us at that crisis of life; the grey heads to whom we go to find a little of that indulgence our contemporaries do not accord us; the young, who give us worship, and for whose sake we try to be that they deem us. Another chapter is devoted to the "Pleasures of Friendship," yet even on this theme the sad note predominates. We are made to feel that something has vanished, never to return,—the bright confidence of the early morning hours, the fragrance of the first rose, the poetry of youth. It is succeeded by a bitter section, called the "Reverse of the Medal," in which the imaginary writer of a letter on this theme says that he does not hate men, because he knows that he is not worth more than they; but he hates their stupid notion of considering as a passion, and expounding in poetry, the instinct that pushes them to associate together to fight against their common enemy ennui, and to tickle their self-love. "Men who call themselves friends have the effect upon me of those angry journalists who call themselves brothers." "Friendship," says the same writer, may be summed up in this acrostic:—

A. Astio.
M. Maldicenza.
I. Invidia.
C. Cabala.
I. Ipocrisia.

The chapter on "Scandal" is another master-piece of remorseless analysis. Here, again, the author's nationality reveals itself. It is evident that his reflections are the outcome of a society where there is much talk of personalities, and little on general subjects. It never seems to occur to the writer that at clubs, parties, or other places where men aggregate, the conversation should turn on aught else but people. Inimitable is one such imaginary talking over of mutual friends, in which every attribute is stripped from the friend discussed, leaving him only the merit of being good. "Goodness is not denied," says De Amicis, "because it is not envied." Would it not have been more true if he had said that when we deny to our friends all qualities but goodness, we do so in the sense in which the Germans speak of ein guter Mensch, when they can say nothing else in favour of a person,—in the sense in which the Spanish proverb speaks of a man as "so good as to be a good-for-nothing?" Signor de Amicis warns us against letting ourselves be involved in discussions, which are extremely dangerous reefs for friendship; and he ends this section with various practical maxims, of which the following is one,— "Do not discuss concerning the immortality of the soul after dinner." And he adds, in every discussion, bear in mind these three p's,— "pondera, pazienza, e perdona."

In friendships between the sexes, De Amicis does not believe. He admits they are sweet, and paints them in the most graceful and seductive colours, but he sees himself obliged to add that they end well so rarely as to come into the category of never. Here, again, we have before us the Southerner, of hot, susceptible blood. The only safe woman-friendship for a man is, according to him, the old and white-haired, or the ugly woman, or perchance one of a merry and satiric turn, for satire is ever a foe to soft sentiment. "True friendships between men and women are as rare as true love. The greater part are a little comedy badly acted." A chapter is devoted to letters, and contains a humorous sketch of that bizarre personage the hater of pen and ink, who will suffer anything rather than put himself to the inconvenience of writing; yet another figure rather of the more indolent South, than of the business-like and energetic North. Very penetrative is the remark that we do not well know our friends till we have had letters from them. Letters are like a defile, passing through which some seem to lose certain moral qualities; others seem to acquire new ones, to become more refined; and others, again, are so transmuted as to be unrecognisable. There are persons to whom it seems easier to confide their feelings when they have nought but paper before them, than in the visible presence of the friend; others become arid, conventional; and others, again, display qualities that remained hidden in the practice of daily life.

Space will not permit us to discuss in detail all the various phases of friendship treated in this book, which is full of vivid, clear-cut sketches of diverse individualities. An able figure is the foreign friend, who speaks our language with effort, and whom we love not only for himself, but for the sake of his country, which may be one that is highly sympathetic to us. Nor has that terrible figure been forgotten, the borrower of books who does not return them. "Is it possible to have a library and believe in friendship?" asks De Amicis. A fault in the work is, beyond a doubt, that all the friendships described and analysed belong to the same social class,—the middle. The book would have acquired more variety and importance had the author studied his theme also in the poorer classes, to whom he has consecrated only quite a few pages. In this class, feelings are truer and nearer to nature; artificial conditions do not enter in to the same extent as with the higher classes. Indeed, there is still much bearing on this vast theme that De Amicis has left untouched; while, at the same time, he has often been a little diffuse on those parts of his subject that have best taken his fancy. As a eulogium of friendship, his work can scarcely be regarded, and therefore cannot be placed side by side with his elder countryman Cicero's far briefer but more enthusiastic volume on the same theme. Instead of the pen of the poet-painter, we encounter in its pages the anatomical knife of a surgeon-novelist. Signor de Amicis is for ever analysing his own feelings and those of his friends, and does not perceive that by so doing he is with his own hand killing friendship. And yet he has written his own condemnation when he says,— "We scrutinise, we torment ourselves too much; and that is not friendship, any more than reasoning is poetry. We make our hearts go up into our craniums, and send down our brains into the place of our hearts. We murder friendship, in order to see how it is put together."

As to the excellence of Signor de Amicis' style, there is but one opinion; he writes the most limpid, the purest Italian. He possesses, however, a facility that is almost dangerous, which in this latest work often leads him astray, causing him to meander on somewhat diffusely. While reading, we are held in the spell of his exquisite language; but when we come to reduce his words to facts, we find they could have been expressed in a much briefer compass. And in this especial book, De Amicis' very perfection of style is a fault. It is too equal, so that it falls into a monotonous cadence, and adds to the general feeling of sameness induced by its subject. The work closes with a salutation to his friends whose memory, passions, advice have aided him in composing it:—"I thank you, therefore, and leave you. I send you an adieu from the depths of my heart, friends old and new, grey-haired and young, companions of infancy and youth, friends of the virile age, future friends of senility, distant friends, offended friends, friends who are dead. Addio."

How Signor de Amicis' personal friends may have enjoyed the vivisection to which he has submitted them in the cause of metaphysics we shall never know, neither does it concern the world, which has to thank its author for a book that contains much that is delightful, much that is suggestive, together with much that is saddening, and much that we trust, for the sake of poor humanity, is, if not untrue, at least highly coloured.

ALTIORA PETO.*

A WRITER in the last number of the Quarterly Review expresses tart dissatisfaction with the present state of criticism in England. It has fallen, he asserts, for the most part, into the hands of novices and pen-weary hacks, and they manage things much better in France. They manage things very differently in France, for literary criticism is practised there under conditions which differ toto coelo from those which obtain in England. Nine-tenths of the books which are reviewed in England are marked by mediocrity which would ensure exemption from criticism of any kind in France. Now, of all books, the hardest to review at all well, are the books which bring the critic's work, willy-nilly, to the level of the works of the Angel of the Church of Laodicea. It is small blame to him, therefore, if he sometimes, in the bitterness of his heart, treats mediocrity too severely, or, as is far more frequently the case, if he treats it in a spirit of indolent charity. On the whole, however, with the exception of an occasional example of flagrant partiality, which for the rest is generally rectified by counter-criticisms, English critics do their work well, and any author who can produce books at all above the level of respectable mediocrity may safely reckon on an appreciative reception from the class who are popularly supposed to be the natural foes of all authors. They are not so, of course, nor are they by any means such fools as they are supposed to be by those who never read their criticisms. Lord Beaconsfield's famous plagiarism is often in the mouths of men who would be surprised to learn that if nothing were taken from Lord Beaconsfield's novels except what would fall strictly under the definition of criticism, the residue would be "duller than a great thaw," and "a joy of wild asses" for ever. But enough of this. Altiora Peto rises far above the level of mediocrity, and may be characterised as a novel of a thousand, if only for the fact that it may be read through consecutively twice, or even thrice, with augmented pleasure to the reader from every fresh perusal. Not all of it, indeed, for there is a rift, so to speak, in Mr. Oliphant's lute, and that rift is by no means a little one. We shall have a word to say about it by-and-by, but not before we have marked to the best of our ability some of the strokes in this most entertaining book which deserve to be applauded to the echo. An outline of the story is necessary, for the reader to understand the extracts which it will be his pleasure to read, as it will be ours to make them, but that outline may well be of the briefest. Mr. Oliphant is probably as indifferent to what is called a plot as Tourgénéiev was, and it is not as a story that Altiora Peto challenges warm admiration, but as a brilliant picture of life and manners. Two clever and high-spirited American girls from the slopes of the Pacific—in other words, from California—descend upon Paris in search of husbands, for it comes to that. One of these girls, Stella Walton, is heiress to millions of dollars; her friend, Mattie Terrill, has an income of £150 per annum. They have changed names, and the reader has to remember throughout the book that Stella Walton is Mattie Terrill, and vice versa.

With excellent judgment, Mr. Oliphant fits the real heiress at once and sans façon with an eligible partner, one Bob Alderny. Impediments, which the reader may discover for himself, for a time delay the marriage of the non-heiress with the man of her choice, Lord Sark. These high-spirited and thoroughly loveable girls, and their elderly companion, Miss Hannah Coffin, are the salt of the book. The last-named is an "original," and in her knack of saying at any given time the precise thing that is most likely to disconcert an adversary she resembles Sam Weller, resembles him also in promptness of action. But Hannah has gifts and graces that Mr. Pickwick's famous body-servant was far, indeed, from having. She has an intuitive perception of what is going on in the hearts and heads of every one with whom she comes in contact, and, to judge from some of her references to her own and other folk's "innards," it might seem that she reads character as somnambulists are thought by some to see, through the organ which Menenius endows with speech in Coriolanus. She also, as it happens, "knows all the ropes," as she would say, and baffles with ease the machinations of all the naughty people who cross her path. In fact her knowledge and energy are so great that she seems to move about amongst these naughty ones like Teiresias in Hades,—

"Οἷη πέπνυται, τοὶ δὲ σκιά ἀίσσουσι."

A highly improbable character, then? Well, in some respects, yes. But what exceptionally amusing and useful character in any novel that was ever written is not open to the same charge? One thing is certain, whenever "old Hannah" acts or speaks, it is to do or say something which will delight the reader; and he will not fail to agree with a remark passed upon her by a certain Sir George Dashington, who is electrified by her smart talk,— "that old woman is perfectly delicious!" The professional beauty, and the financiers, the aesthete, and the ladies of quality, and the rest of Mr. Oliphant's dramatis personæ we must leave unintroduced to the reader. They are all drawn with light, firm touches, which mark the hand of a master; but what of Altiora Peto herself? What of the heroine who gives her name to this capital tale? Alas! there yawns the rift we mentioned. Altiora Peto is a bore, and would be a bore of the first magnitude, were it not that the portentous prig who marries her is a bigger bore still. We shall reserve what we have to say of these meet companions to the end of this notice, and quote as a specimen of Mr. Oliphant's genius, for so it deserves to be called, the beginning of a dialogue, which if we are not mistaken beats Lord Beaconsfield at his smartest. It takes place at a dinner-party at the above-mentioned Sir George Dashington's:—

"'I didn't rightly catch your name,' said Hannah, 'but I suppose you're the minister.'—'My name is Chalfont—Sidney Chalfont; and as you rightly observe, I am in holy orders.'—'Holy orders is mighty difficult to obey; don't you find 'em?' she remarked, rising and taking his arm.—'The present state of the law in this country renders it impossible, very often,' replied Mr. Chalfont, who had long made up his mind on the first convenient opportunity to become an ecclesiastical martyr.—'Do tell!' exclaimed Hannah.—'I beg your pardon, Miss Coffin.—'Oh, I ain't noways offended, but it does beat all!'—'What beats all?'—'Well, I don't know as I understood you, but you seemed to say that you couldn't keep the laws of God because of the laws of man—and you a minister, too; and I say that beats all—and what's more, I stick to it!'—'Dear me,' thought the Reverend Sidney Chalfont, 'this American is a very plain-spoken woman.' 'My dear madam, I don't wonder that you are astonished. I am well aware that the Anglican priesthood of America are not subject to the same tyranny that we are in this country.'—'Then, why do you stand it?'—'We don't stand it; we go to prison for it.'—'Seems to me, if they put you in prison for it, as it is them as won't stand it. Did you know before you became a minister, that you would either have to obey the laws of man, or else go to prison for not obeying 'em?'—'That consideration was not sufficient to deter me from following a vocation to which I felt internally called, and from being a witness for the truth, and a martyr for conscience' sake.'—'And you feel sure that them laws you won't obey was made to uphold truth, and you was made to uphold the truth?'—'I can only act according to my conscience, and what I believe to be truth.'—'And them as puts you into prison acts the same, maybe?'—'I give them credit for being sincere.'—'Well, now,' pursued the old lady, 'I've been in search of the highest truth since I was a gell; that's a matter of half a century; always on the search. How old might you ha' bin when you determined to obey the holy orders?'—'About two-and-twenty,' said Chalfont.—'And you was so sure that you'd got the truth, that you decided to go where you could break the laws of a country as calls itself Christian, to testify to it?'—'Well, I don't think that's altogether a fair way of putting it,' said Chalfont, laughing; 'but the subject is a large one, and involves the whole question of the government of the Church by the Church, instead of by the State. May I ask what was the result of your fifty years' search after truth?'—'Well, I guess I'm on the track at last.'—'What! only on it now?'—'It's difficult saying when I first got on; a body can't jest always give dates in them things. I dessey I was on all the time, but if I didn't know it, there was no peace. It's only with the knowledge as peace comes. It's not by readin', nor by study, nor by spekilatin that you find Divine truth; it's by lovin' what is good, and a doin' of it.'—'I should have said that Divine revelation and the teaching of the Church were the guides to truth,' said Chalfont.—'If one set of people as is guided by 'em puts another set of people as is guided by 'em into prison, because they can't agree which way they pint, seems to me they're mighty onsertin guides.'—'It has been so from all time,' replied Chalfont, mournfully. 'The history of Christendom is a history of religious strife; till man is regenerate, it cannot be otherwise.'"

We wish that we had space to quote the rest of this conversation, and more of Mr. Oliphant's good things, and especially the scene in the Louvre, where Hannah drives the professional beauty from pillar to post, till the latter, feeling herself to be too heavily handicapped, affects not to hear the American lady's pitiless questions, "but to be absorbed in admiration of a recumbent Venus of Titian, at which Hannah, following the direction of her eyes, could only gasp 'My sakes!' and then, turning abruptly round, walked off, for once fairly beaten, from the field." All that we can do, however, is to say that three-fourths of Mr. Oliphant's book is as good reading as the most exigent novel-reader needs to ask for. The remaining fourth is filled with the diary and sayings of Altiora Peto, and with the pompous inanities of her lover, Mr. Keith Hetherington. She bores, but he crushes us. "A greater than I said that," he remarks, on one occasion; and as that "greater than I" is He who was "greater than Jonas" and "greater than Solomon," and as Mr. Keith Hetherington is at the most a tenth-rate philosophaster, his remark, for the sublime conceit which it ventilates, may be said to "beat the record." And "beat the record" his plan for renovating society unquestionably does. But dull, priggish, and perplexing as this gentleman's utterances are, we would not have called them pompous inanities, if we could not cite Mr. Hetherington himself as witness to their being so. Brought to book by Mattie Terrill as to the nature and results of the "experiences" of the "hundreds" who are consciously preparing for the "new evolutionary process" which is to save the world, or save the hundreds, for Mr. Hetherington is as ambiguous as Virgil's Sibyl or Dickens's Captain Bunsby, he calmly answers, "I hope you will not think me rude, but I could no more describe to you the experiments or the results, than I could discourse to a New Zealander on the laws of electricity, or attempt to make him understand the nature of their action." Well, be it so; but we marvel much that so wise and witty a man of the world as Mr. Oliphant should expect his readers to shut their eyes and open their mouths, and gulp down such an answer. It is not fury, but it is sound signifying nothing. Altiora Peto, however, is charmed beyond measure with this puzzle-headed philanthropist's tinkling cymbals, and the novel closes with a love-scene between the pair which certainly has the merit of novelty. In some such way, perhaps, old Godwin wooed and won Mary Woolstonecraft; and, indeed, "Keithy," as Hannah always calls him, is good, or rather, Godwinish, enough to tell his dear Altiora that it would not be necessary, except for what the world might say, that they should marry, since their love was of a kind that the world knows nothing of, and depended on something more internal, and, therefore, more solid than that which unites ordinary mortals. Shelley said that he could never look on Retsch's picture of the summer-house scene in Faust without a feeling akin to vertigo. We warrant that he would have gazed oculo irretorto on the kiss which ended the love conference between this strange pair of lovers. "That was beyond the power of Church or priest," said "Keithy," with stately solemnity; and they arise and go to Sark and Stella, to tell them that they will add their ceremony to theirs. The curtain falls, but we lift it for a moment, to express a strong belief that, in the words of Tennyson, "a brace of twins will weed her of her folly;" and a faint hope that when those twins are old enough to climb their father's knees, that even he, impracticable blockhead though he be, may learn from nature to concentrate his affections, and not dissipate over all the world the love which was meant for home. Coleridge was right, no doubt, when he said that,—

"He prayeth well who loveth well, Both man, and bird, and beast;"

but we must draw the line somewhere; we draw it at vultures, bugs, and —; but the reader may select for himself what particular variety of knave, or fool, or coward it is which, if he says he loves, he knows that he is speaking in a Pickwickian sense, or, not to use too strong a phrase, is romancing in his throat.

THIS is a nourishing book. Most men are conscious of a certain interest in the early Caliphs, the most distinct and notable series of men whom Asia has produced; and also of a certain vagueness about them, an uncertainty as to what they did and were, which made them, in a shadowy way, so memorable. They have all heard of Abu Bekr and Omar, and Kaled "the Sword of God," and Ali the Prophet's cousin, who should have been his successor; and the Abbassides, of whom Haroun was the flower; of their conquests, their magnificence, and their fall; but the number of those to whom the early Caliphs are persons, who could recount even their names in sequence, or account for their victories, is very small. It will hereafter include all who have read Sir William Muir's book. Without the slightest parade of learning, indeed keeping his great learning a little too much in the background, Sir William Muir relates from the original authorities the long, but not wearisome narrative, sometimes like a historian, occasionally, though seldom, like an essayist, but most frequently like an annalist who has no desire except to be simply true, and who, therefore, is often as convincing and interesting as an eye-witness. He scarcely ever pretends to eloquence, rarely departs from an even rather low-pitched tone of narrative, yet he is often as effective as the most skilful rhetorician. There is a sort of simpleness in his style, caught, no doubt, from the Arab annalists whom he has studied so closely, which, though sometimes a little bald, and once or twice even tedious, as they also are, is often indescribably charming. His personages are Biblical in their ways, in their directness, in the simplicity with which they reveal their purposes, and their methods. They are, moreover, not too much explained, but move in that clear obscure which is the permanent atmosphere of Eastern history, in which men do such gigantic things, the observer scarcely knows why, under impulses he can only half comprehend. What can be more charming, for instance, than this account of one of the greatest scenes in Mahommedan history,—the choice of the first Caliph, the man who, ascending a shaking throne, reduced all Arabia once more to subjection? Mahommed, perhaps from a design to leave the throne elective, probably from hope of a son by one of his many wives, possibly from dread of the influence which an acknowledged heir not sprung from his own loins might exercise, died without choosing, or even clearly indicating, a successor. The Koreish, the men of the sacred tribe to which Mahommed belonged, thought he should be assuredly one of themselves; but the citizens of Medina, always jealous of the supreme clan, had decided that the choice should fall on one of their own number. The physical power rested with them, for Mahommed had died in Medina, and his companions lay at their mercy; and rushing, therefore, to one of their large halls, they clamorously named Sád-ibn-Obeida, chief of their strongest clan, Successor of the Prophet. Sád was lying under a blanket, sick with a fever, in a corner of the hall, when the selection was announced and accepted; but Abu Bekr, father of Ayesha, Mahommed's favourite wife, declared that the nomination could not stand. Arabia as a whole would obey only a man of the Koreish, a statement so true then, as it is now, a thousand years afterwards, that the Medinese yielded, and proposed a compromise. There should be a dual Caliphate, one from the Koreish, one from Medina:—

"'Away with you!' exclaimed Omar; 'two cannot stand together;' and even Sád from beneath his covering muttered that to divide the power would weaken it. High words ensued. Hobáb, on the side of Sád, cried out, 'Hear him not! Attend to me, for I am the well-rubbed Palm-stem. If they refuse, expel them from the city. I am the Roaring Lion of the desert, and will devour them up.' 'The Lord destroy thee!' cried Omar; and Hobáb returned the words. The altercation gaining in heat and bitterness, Abu Bekr saw that it must be stopped at any risk; so stepping forward he said: 'Ye see these two'—and he pointed to Omar and Abu Obeida—'Choose ye now whichever of them ye will, and salute him as your Chief.' 'Nay,' cried both at once, 'thou hast already, at the Prophet's bidding, led the prayers; thou art our Chief. Stretch forth thine hand.' He did so, and they struck their hand on his in token of allegiance. Others began to follow their example. 'Wilt thou cut thine own kinsman's throat?' cried Hobáb to a Khazrajite about to take the pledge. 'Not so,' he answered; 'I only yield the right to whom the right is due.' Whilst they yet hesitated, the Beni Aus, jealous of the rival tribe and of Sád its nominee, spake among themselves: 'If this man be chosen, the rule will be for ever with the Beni Khazraj. Let us salute Abu Bekr as our Chief.' The example once set, group after group advanced to place their hand on that of Abu Bekr, till none was left but Sád, who still lay covered in the corner. Acknowledged thus by the men of Medina, there could be no doubt of Abu Bekr's acceptance by the Koreish and all the Refugees. He was one of themselves, and the Prophet, by appointing him to take his place, when laid aside, at the daily prayers, had in a manner indicated him as his vicegerent. And so homage was done on all sides to Abu Bekr. He was saluted as the 'CALIPH,' or 'Successor of the Prophet.'"

The election by acclaim proved wise. With the death of the Prophet the momentary cohesion of Arabia ended, the tribes separated, and Prophet after Prophet appeared, demanding their allegiance. Abu Bekr, a gentle fanatic, met all with one immutable resolve that there should be no division; that he would perish, or they should obey the Vicegerent of the Lord. He sent out from Medina army after army, he chose by some instinct the greatest General Arabia ever produced, Kaled, the Sword of God, an utterly intrepid and remorseless leader, to command his forces, and in a year Arabia was at his feet. The clans, moved in part by their new faith, yielded so completely that Abu Bekr was not only able to declare war at once against Persia and Rome, but to supersede the high-born Arab chiefs in favour of his own nominees, thus establishing for ever the idea which has since been the reserve strength of Islam,—that within the Faith all are equal, and all careers are open. He sent 40,000 men to Persia, and as many to Syria; and before he died, the best soldiers of Persia and Rome had fled before the Arabs, the latter in a battle—Yakusa—at which the slaughter was so prodigious as to terrify the whole Roman world. Abu Bekr's reign was short, but his simple and direct character, his ardent faith, and his successes, had solidified Islam, and when he died he named as his successor the sternest and most terrible of the Companions, Omar, who had been his counsellor.

Omar was of the men who found empires. Fearless and stern, simple to a proverb in his personal habits, and never fatigued in mind, he had, with the royal gift for choosing agents, the royal dislike of his own instruments. He broke Kaled, the Sword of God, and systematically kept down his Generals. He had, moreover, in a high degree the faculty of military organisation, and changed his army from a camp of volunteers to a strictly disciplined force, highly paid, and recruited by a relentless conscription from the whole population. Military service was restricted to Arabs, who were forbidden to cultivate, to settle, or to trade in the conquered lands; but every Arab was compelled to be a soldier, and every soldier was paid. As Arabia contained 14,000,000 of people, Omar had thus 140,000 new recruits every year, and as the service ended only with life, would have had at times the command of two millions of men, but that the consumption of life in incessant war, war without hospitals, war waged without cannon, was most frightful. This organisation endured nearly two centuries, and secured to the Faith almost unbroken victory, till the descendants of Mahommed's uncle, Abbas, jealous of the Arabs, admitted all tribes as soldiers, especially the Toorks, and so degraded the Moslem soldiery from a nation into an army. Omar conquered Syria and Egypt, Persia and Asia Minor, and on his assassination was succeeded by Othman, who was elected in face of Ali's claim, the source of much woe and ultimately of schism in the Mussulman world. Mahommedanism knows nothing of heredity, but so deep is the passion for it in mankind, that the Moslem could hardly bear the succession to depart from the Prophet's family and the clan Koreish, and to this hour millions attach a mysterious sanctity to Ali and his sons. The victories went on, but Othman, essentially a weakly, violent man, could not hold in his agents, whose tyranny and greed provoked the soldiers, a struggle between the aristocratic and democratic principles had come up, and Othman was murdered in a riot by the citizens of Medina. They called Ali to the throne, but Ali, though a man of high intelligence, was essentially wayward and ease-loving, he was the very head of the Koreish, and the discontented soldiery found a leader in the soldier whom Sir W. Muir calls "Muavia," and the rest of the world "Moawiyah." At first victory adhered to Ali, but his power was sapped among his own followers by latent dislike to the aristocrats, and at last his own army and that of Muavia agreed to abide by the "Koran,"—that is, by the judgment of umpires. The umpires, of whose trickeries Sir W. Muir gives a most picturesque account, differed, and the struggle went on till a knot of desperate men agreed to assassinate both the candidates,—one at Kufa, the other at Damascus. Ali was slain; but Muavia, though severely wounded, survived, and after a brief contest with Ali's son, Hassan, became Caliph, reunited the Mussulman world, and by an astute device, originally intended to prevent future quarrels, obtained the right of nominating the Heir-Apparent. This in practice made the Caliphate hereditary, and four of the family succeeded, the last but one, Walid, being one of the greatest of the Caliphs. His son was, however, attacked and defeated by the friends of the Abbas family, descendants of an uncle of the Prophet, and the Abbassides, the dynasty of whom Haroun-al-Raschid was the greatest, mounted the throne in 749, losing, however, Spain, where the Faithful acknowledged the descendant of Muavia, whose heir still reigns in Morocco. This was the end of the true Caliphate, which, though it survived 500 years in Bagdad, never again swayed an undivided Mussulman world, and soon after lost, with the spread of the Ali fanaticism in Persia, any chance of doing so. The modern Caliphs are but great Mussulman Sovereigns who have claimed the ancient title and prerogatives, but have never been completely acknowledged by all Doctors, even of their own sect.

A NEW THEORY OF FORCE.*

THE pith of this volume will be found in the introduction and in the concluding chapter. The author's reading in physics, chemistry, physiology, and electricity has led him to the belief that there are but two forces in Nature,—an attractive, or, as he prefers to term it, a "compulsive" force, and a dispersing or "repulsive" force. The former, maintaining the cohesion of matter and sustaining growth, is the fundamental element of life,—is, in a word, the Ormuzd of the Kosmos, as the latter is the Ahriman, disintegrating, destructive, and obstructive. The effect of the compulsive force upon the retina is light; that of the repulsive force upon the sensory nerves scattered over the body is heat. The ether with which the advanced school of physicists suppose space to be solidly filled, so as to leave no interstices, he rejects as unnecessary, and reconciles without difficulty the undulatory and emissive theories by positing light as produced by an emission, not of particles, but of "force-impulses," moving in an undulatory manner, because of the opposition met with from the counteracting force-impulses of heat. According to this explanation, however, light would not be the dominant force, but merely an effect of the dominant force, modified in its action by the "repulsive" element. Having got rid of the ether, the author immediately replaces it by an "active force-medium," but whether the force is distinct from the medium, or whether the medium has an activity, innate or adventitious, of its own, or how in any case the force acts in or through the medium, we are not told. Indeed nothing whatever is predicated of this force-medium, or tertium quid, save its existence, and it is just as hard to imagine the transference of any force through it to bodies in it, but not substantially continuous with it, as to imagine the direct action of force upon matter without the presence of any intervening medium at all,—a difficulty which seems to destroy the legitimacy of the hypothesis which postulates an unnecessary and useless antecedent. Major Sedgwick next proceeds to explain the various conditions of matter, solid, fluid, and gaseous, by attributing to their ultimate particles different amounts of "holding-on" and "holding-off" force, the degree of cohesion or its lack being due to the respective amounts of these opposing forces resident in each particle. The doctrine of a "force-medium" seems here to be lost sight of, and reduced to plain words, the theory is simply that solid and fluid bodies consist of particles that do cohere, and gaseous bodies of particles that do not cohere. Throughout the book, in fact, the writer shows himself the victim of the common fallacy that a statement of ordinary phenomena in language somewhat different from what they are usually stated in, involves an explanation of them, although in point of reality the new statement is nothing but a more or less expanded repetition of the old one, with no new matter infused into it.

In the last chapter, the compulsive force is recognised as the manifestation of the will of God, omnipotent, omnipresent; and the repulsive force as the manifestation of the will of the powers of evil, constantly opposing God. "There can be no mistaking this," exclaims the author with conviction; "here we are face to face . . . with the old Bible story" of the ceaseless conflict between good and evil, "which is at the base of all religions." How the frustrating power of evil can overcome even for a moment the compelling power of the omnipotent, the reader is left to discover. The repulsive force lastly is acknowledged to be "almost as necessary" in the world's economy as the compulsive force, hence the strangely inconsistent conclusion is arrived at that the evil force is good in moderation, and evil only when carried to excess. An attempt is made to grope out of this impasse by advancing the theory that "one day the earth will become a solid mass, without any liquids," and devoid of life, so that the victory of the omnipotent force will end in complete death. Ormuzd will vanquish, but only to reign over a dark, inanimate, and changeless world. Yet the book seems to have been written mainly for the purpose of proving that light and life are the highest manifestations of the compulsive force. We are also reminded in this connection—the relevance is not apparent—that St. Jude declares that the powers of evil were once angels of God, who "kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation." Arguments of this kind are not likely to be helpful towards the reconciliation of science with religion, which were, indeed, once the respective provinces of science and religion sufficiently understood, as unnecessary a task to undertake as that of the reconciliation of music or painting with divinity. Major Sedgwick carries his theory into chemistry, electricity, and physiology, and applies it to the explanation of the phenomena of those sciences with as much success as he has attained in the domain of physics. The book is an example of the sterility of imperfectly assimilated knowledge. Had the author appreciated the doctrine of the conservation of force—to which he never refers—he would have understood that his repelling and compelling forces are mutually convertible into each other, and that the tendency of modern physical discovery is in the direction not of a duality of forces, but of a unity of force manifesting itself under various aspects in an unintersticed, solid space, differentiated into chemical atoms and physical molecules and their accumulations. What that force is, in its last analysis, whether different from or identical with the differentiating influences, the how, why, and whence of matter and its phenomena under any possible theory of its existence, are questions that, in their very statement, transcend the power of the human mind.

The author's meaning is not always easy to grasp. He delights in sentences of a length that even a German would stare at, not seldom occupying more than a whole page. Consciously or unconsciously, he indulges in plays upon words (or writes as if he did) which rather obscure than illumine the argument. Thus, after tracing an analogy—with considerable verbal ingenuity, it must be allowed—between the life-history of the living cell and the Biblical story of Creation, he tells us that "suffering is the order of this life . . . nothing is done without suffering—not always painful suffering, but still suffering." To illustrate this remark, it is added, "thus the cell suffers expansion" when hungry; "again suffers contraction when growing and reproducing"; or the cell "tells of vicarious suffering—of plant-cells suffering willingly to supply kindred plant-cells, of plant-cells suffering unwillingly (poor things!) to supply animal-cells in which they have no interest." We can thus imagine the sufferings of peas and potatoes as they suffer conversion into the tissues of a ruthless man, in whom they have no interest. Such a singular confusion between two common meanings of a common word we do not remember to have hitherto encountered "in print."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Historic Faith: Short Lectures on the Apostles' Creed. By Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D. (Macmillan.)—"My object," says Dr. Westcott, in his preface, "was to show the direct bearing of the different articles of our historic faith upon our view of the world and of life." This, therefore, is a devotional rather than a theological book. What there is of the theological element is supplied in the notes, which show all the clearness of insight and lucidity of statement which we should expect from Dr. Westcott. We may specially mention the note of "The Idea of Blood in the New Testament," the nucleus of which may be said to lie in the words,—"The blood always includes the thought of the life preserved and active beyond death." From the main part of the volume we may give two extracts, which will serve to show the writer's manner of treatment. The subjects are respectively "Judgment" and "Resurrection":—

"How this last Coming of Christ to judgment shall be accomplished, which reveals the world to itself, we know not, and it is idle to speculate. But for each one of us death is its symbol. For each one of us that solemn coming, which seals our earthly work, is in a most real sense the vision of God, instantaneous and age-long, the vision in his light of ourselves. So it is then, to sum up what has been said, that we confess our belief that Christ shall come again to judge both the quick and the dead: we believe that he will come socially in the secret spiritual forces which mould kingdoms and Churches and at last with open majesty; we believe that he will come personally in those inner flashes which show us for a moment the very truth of things, and at last in that supreme hour when he will take account of our finished service. And when we reflect upon the confession we know that it answers to the noblest ideal of life. It declares that there is a purpose in the course of history and in the possibilities of our little parts: that we may look in both for intelligible tokens of the divine will: that it is our duty to lift our eyes to the end when the full work of the Saviour shall be indicated on the scene of his sufferings: that even now we are charged and enabled to find an eternal element underlying the commonest occupations, something which we shall once see as it appears to him whose we are and whom we serve."

"What St. Paul teaches us to expect is the manifestation of a power of life according to law under new conditions. God giveth to every seed a body of its own: not arbitrarily, but according to his most righteous will. The seed determines what the plant shall be, but it does not contain the plant. The golden ears with which we trust again to see the fields waving are not the bare grains which were committed to the earth. The reconstruction of the seed when the season has come round would not give us the flower or the fruit for which we hope. Nay, rather the seed dies, is dissolved, that the life may clothe itself in a nobler form. True it is that we cannot in this way escape from a physical continuity; but it is a continuity of life, and not of simple reconstruction. And St. Paul warns us that the change which we cannot follow is greater than the changes of earth which we can follow; that the development of life goes on; that the manifestation of life takes place, as I said, under new conditions. Everything, he tells us, which characterises a material body, the flower no less than the seed, shall then cease to be. The unbroken continuity shall enter into a new sphere, unaffected by the limitations through which earthly bodies are what they are."

Two Sides to Every Question. By Maude Jeanne Franc. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Miss Franc tells her story, as she puts it on her title-page, "from a South-Australian stand-point." We cannot see much difference between this stand-point and ours. These English people who "breathe in converse seasons" caelum, non animus, mutant. Love and money are antagonists there, as here; and young men who make haste to be rich burn their fingers by speculating in shares. The story is fairly readable, and it has the merit of keeping close to the realities of life; we have none of the extravagant coincidences or romantic reverses of fortune with which writers of this kind of fiction often play the part of Providence. Inheritances and legacies fall in, it is true, with a readiness and convenience which scarcely are to be hoped for in life. Apart from this, everything is natural enough. In short, if we cannot give this book very high praise, we have no serious fault to find with it, only remarking that we doubt whether "uncow" is good Scotch for "very" (p. 48), and are sure that "fortuitous" is not good English for "fortunate" (p. 67).

Robert Pocock. By George M. Arnold. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Robert Pocock was a worthy of Gravesend, who died in 1830, at the age of seventy years. He wrote a history of his native place, and he could also claim the titles of "antiquarian, naturalist, botanist, and printer." In this last capacity, he had the honour of being the first to set up a press in the town. He had, it would seem, a remarkable appetite for knowledge of every kind, and this volume, containing extracts from his diary, gives us a good idea of the collection which he thus gathered together. It is well that such men should be honoured, even though the honour comes, as it does in this case, more than half a century after its object has passed away.

POETRY.—Destiny, and other Poems. By M. J. Sevrano. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.)—"Destiny" is a poem of between two and three thousand verses, in the course of which three persons Ernest, Clarence, and Margaret, by name, muse, and, we are bound to say, prose at considerable length about life in general, and their own lives in particular. It is very easy to have enough, we might even venture to say too much, of this sort of thing:—

"No more might Fate, with aspect grim
Affright his soul; for Hope no more,
With syren voice to Pleasure's shore
Could lure him now; and he who spreads
No sail, the storm-tost ocean dreads
No longer—bitter recompense
Of Pain, that from the flames intense
Alone, where Happiness expires,
Spring in the soul the deathless fires
To being, that for her illume, Serene, the darkness of the tomb."

—From the Mountains of the East: a Quasi-dramatic Poem. By Ernest Edward Dugmore, M.A. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Mr. Dugmore here puts the history of Balaam into a series of dialogues or soliloquies in verse. The chief motive is to show how the seer became false to his own knowledge of good and evil, and prostituted his prophetic powers to base purposes. The solution of the problem is to be found, we suppose, in the third act, where Balaam is represented as driven to despair by the death of his wife. We cannot say that we find this satisfactory, and we are certain that the story is not improved by being forced into Mr. Dugmore's verse. Let any one compare the following with the original, and he will be inclined to accept our judgment of the whole:—

"BALAAM.
"Balaam the son of Beor hath said, the man Whose eyes have been enlightened, on whose ears
Have come the echoes of the Words of God,
Yea, who hath seen the Vision of the Almighty,
Fallen to earth, but looking into Heaven:—
How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and Thy Tabernacles, O thou Israel!
As valleys are they spread, as gardens by
The river side, as the lign aloes which
The Lord hath planted, and as cedar trees
Beside the waters! God hath brought him forth From Egypt. As a mighty lion, he Hath couched: who shall dare to stir him up?
Blessed from God is he that bleareth thee;
And cursed shall he be that curseth thee."

The writer of this clearly has not even a rudimentary notion of what blank verse should be.—Melodies of the Fatherland. Translated from the German by the Rev. Robert Maguire, D.D. (Home Words Publishing Office.)—Dr. Maguire has translated a number of hymns and devotional poems. Such volumes are, of course, intended for what may be called private rather than public circulation. It is dedicated to the writer's congregation, and will be received as the token of a mutual regard. There is a merit, however, in at least some of the pieces which warrants an appeal to a wider circle of readers.—We have also received Cinq-Mars, an Historical Tragedy. By W. F. O. Wigston. (John Wilson.)—The Knight of Castile, and other Poems. By Austin E. Smith. (Ward, Lock, and Co.)—Inter Flumina: Verses Written among Rivers. (Parker and Co.)

We have received Volume XIV. of the Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute. (Sampson Low and Co.)—The Irish Educational Guide and Scholastic Directory. (Mara, Dublin.)—The Birmingham Mason Science College Calendar, for the Session 1883-84. (Cornish Brothers, Birmingham.)—Chiromancy, by H. Frith and E. H. Allen. (Routledge and Sons.)

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

MR. GLADSTONE, having visited the Orkneys, steamed across to Copenhagen, where he was received, on the 17th inst., with every honour by the family party there assembled, consisting of the King and Queen of Denmark, the Czar and Czarina, the King of Greece, the Princess of Wales, and a crowd of junior Princes, all descendants or connections by marriage of King Christian. On Tuesday, the entire group, with all the diplomatists present in the city, except the representatives of Sweden, lunched with Mr. Gladstone on board the 'Pembroke Castle,' and afterwards listened to Mr. Tennyson reading his own poetry. Let us hope he did not read "The Charge of the Six Hundred." Mr. Gladstone's visit, coinciding with the sudden departure of Lord Dufferin for Constantinople, has set the journalists of the Continent all agog, and the wildest speculations are indulged in. The English Premier sought the Czar in order to reunite the two Bulgarias, or to sell Armenia for Egypt, or to arrange a Northern alliance with France, as a counterpoise to Germany. These speculations are, of course, dreams. There is not the slightest evidence that Mr. Gladstone transacted any political business at all, or had any objects whatever, except to make a pleasant trip to a new place, and some valuable fresh acquaintances. As for the Czar, a few days of perfect safety must be to him the truest holiday.

It is doubtful if there is more reality in the rumours about the King of Spain, but they look more true. After a splendid reception in Vienna, King Alfonso has gone to Homburg, there to meet the Emperor of Germany and the Crown Prince of Portugal. That might mean nothing, but the Emperor has summoned his Foreign Minister, Count Hatzfeldt, the German Ambassador at Madrid, and the Spanish Ambassador at Berlin, to assist in the conference. This is unusual, unless business is intended, and there can be but one business to discuss,—the admission of Spain, on the same terms as Italy, into the German-Austrian Alliance. The isolation of France would, under such an arrangement, be complete, and she would be held as in a vice; while in the event of war, a heavy corps d'armée must be retained to watch Spain. The plan is a very risky one for the King of Spain, but he is savage at the French Republican intrigues to upset him, and thinks Germany can prohibit them. It should be added that he wants a war, to consolidate his hold over his Army, and is believed to think that if Germany would guarantee him against France, he could personally command in an invasion of Morocco.

We should not wonder if trouble were at hand in Spain. The Liberals do not like either the German alliance or the present Ministry, and the French Republicans, who have always been closely liés with the Republicans of Spain, are furious at the position of France. The tendency to outbreak will, therefore, increase; and the speech of S. Castelar to the editor of the Progreso, reported by Reuter, is very ominous. S. Castelar is by far the most moderate of his party, he has learned in office the difficulty of governing Spain, and he specially admits that he is not unwilling to see whether a compromise between the Democracy and the Bourbons is not possible. Nevertheless, he declares that if the Constitution of 1869 is not restored, and if S. Sagasta is retained in power, "he should consider the moment arrived for thinking of other means of action which appeared to be condemned for ever." It would be necessary in that event to reunite the Democracy, and he would for that object spare no sacrifice. In other words, if the Government does not become more Liberal, S. Castelar will consent to insurrection, and will on behalf of the Unitarian Republicans make concessions to the Federalists. That is not a pleasant telegram for King Alfonso to show Count Hatzfeldt.

The struggle in Bulgaria has ended for the time in the complete victory of the Liberals. As we have explained elsewhere, Prince Alexander has failed to keep the promises made after his coup d'état, and in despair of conciliating his subjects has thrown himself upon Austria. The Russian Government, alarmed at his tendencies, has preferred to trust the people, and has threatened, if he continues obstinate, to leave him to their mercy. On the 19th inst., therefore, the Prince, by a formal manifesto, restored the Constitution of Tirnova, and appointed M. Zankoff, the old Liberal chief, head of the Cabinet and Minister of the Interior. No Russians are included in the Ministry; but Russian Generals will continue to command and organise the 30,000 militia. The Bulgarian Liberals, it is reported, still hope that on the occurrence of a vacancy in the Governor-Generalship of East Roumelia, which will happen next year, the province will be added to Bulgaria, by the appointment of Prince Alexander. Wallachia and Moldavia were fused into Roumania in that way.

Hundreds of columns of news about the negotiations with China have been published in the French papers this week, but the few facts may be stated in a dozen lines. These are that the French have not advanced a step in Tonquin, but after some sanguinary skirmishes are still confined to Hanoi; that M. Challemel-Lacour, over-ruled by the Cabinet, has left M. Ferry to manage the affair; that M. Ferry and the Marquis Tseng have held a consultation; and that no agreement has been arrived at. The hitch remains as at first. The French cannot, or will not, understand that the Chinese intend them to leave Tonquin, though they may hold the rest of Anam, and keep continually offering "neutral zones." The Chinese do not want neutral zones, which would be governed by France through Anamese Mandarins, and would be passed whenever France could allege that the zones were full of brigands, but to be able to govern Western China without wasting half their revenue on an army of observation. They will concede, under strict limitations, the navigation of the Songkoi, to all the world, as well as to France, but they will not have French troops in the delta. From their point of view, they are wise; and as the French Chamber meets in a month, October 25th, they will in all probability be successful.

The French Republicans have, it seems, revived the practice of sending a civilian Commissary with their expeditions, who controls the Generals in command. This annoys the French Generals, who detest civilian supervision, and in Tonquin has just produced a furious quarrel. Dr. Harmand, the Commissary there, insists, like St. Just, that, "conquerors or conquered, forward we must," and ordered General Bonet to renew an attack which the military men considered would lead to certain defeat. General Bonet refused, and was at once sent to Hong Kong on a "mission," that is, was superseded, an incident which has produced much excitement among Parisians and in barrack-rooms. The origin of this arrangement is not, we suspect, so much jealousy of the Generals, as dislike of their inclination to demand reinforcements, and so swell the importance both of their commands and their achievements. They think they will not be fairly honoured for great deeds done with 2,000 men. Considering that almost all successful Generals have worked under civilian Kings or Ministers—for example, Marlborough, Turenne, and Von Moltke—one hardly knows why the plan so often fails, but it does. Even in India the Generals cannot keep on terms with the "Politicals." In the present instance, the French Government have terminated the quarrel by sending Admiral Courbet with power to command everybody. The General, it is thought, will have no grudge against him, while he will have no motive for increasing the land forces.

The Australian Colonies have agreed to hold an Annexation Conference in November, which will meet at Sydney, and be attended by representatives from the whole of Australia and New Zealand. The Conference will formulate the reasons for desiring the annexation of neighbouring islands, detail a plan of occupation, and define the pecuniary responsibility which the combined Colonies will agree to undertake. Except as regards New Guinea, the movement is not likely to come to much, though this Government has annexed North Borneo; but the feeling in the Colonies is very excited. Mr. Service, the Premier of Victoria, said on Wednesday, that the landing of French convicts, such as has recently occurred in Brisbane, must be prohibited at any cost; and the colonists are quite in the temper to lynch them, which would produce complications. The Cape Colony nearly fought Great Britain on the same occasion.

A council of war never fights, and a caucus is, after all, only an unwieldy council of war. The party managers in Manchester have finally determined not to contest the seat. The only Liberal candidate, therefore, will be Dr. Pankhurst, who advocates Home-rule, universal suffrage of both sexes alike—thus incidentally handing over government to the women alone, who have a majority of more than half a million—the abolition of the House of Lords, and some form of nationalisation of the land. It is not believed that ordinary Liberals will vote for him, though he has agreed to give a general support to Mr. Gladstone's Government; and the seat is, in fact, handed over to Mr. Houldsworth. The result will bring both the caucus system and three-cornered voting into great discredit. There can be no doubt that the true motive of the decision to skulk was fear lest at the General Election all three Members should stand, and so risk the return of all three. As they could not all stand without the consent of the party, the fear shows that the Liberal caucus has no real hold over the candidates, and very little power of organisation. If Dr. Pankhurst came in and kept in at the next election, they would be rightly served, though the price is too high a one to pay for their punishment. Even now an independent candidate, relying solely on Liberalism, character, and the electors, and spending nothing, might break up the combination, and give the wire-pullers a much required lesson on the great truth that organisation is no substitute for pluck.

Herr Tisza, the Hungarian Premier, addressed his constituents on Thursday, in a speech intended to be a grave exposition of his policy as regards the recent crisis. He is determined that all political and agrarian rioting shall be put down, though he will treat submissive rioters leniently; and he is specially severe upon the anti-Semitic movement. He maintains that this is essentially a movement for the destruction of property, though the rioters appeal to "occult prejudices," and threatens that if the commotions increase, "temporary restrictions of liberal life will have to be employed." He would rather, however, employ social means, and calls on all Hungarians to draw to themselves honest men, without inquiry into creed, and to spurn him that is not honest. The rioters, we fear, would answer that is precisely what they are doing when they kill usurers. The language of Herr Tisza is sufficient to prove the seriousness of the disturbances, and their Socialistic character. They are spreading, it is stated, into the Cis-Leithan provinces, but no clear evidence of this has yet been given.

The Agnostic party in Switzerland are as much inclined to persecute as the Ultramontanes ever were. They have not only stopped the processions of the Salvation Army by force—which was done also in Bombay, and may, if feeling runs high, be as reasonable as our own prohibition of Catholic processions—but, according to the Geneva correspondent of the Times, have imprisoned Miss Booth at Neuchâtel for attending a religious meeting, and expelled a Mr. Clibborn from Geneva for singing a hymn. The advocates of these proceedings publicly argue that they are just, because a State must have the right to prevent the spread of "the religious poison" among the community even by force. What more could the Fathers of the Inquisition say? Those Fathers had, too, the excuse that their practice was in exact accord with their theory, and could, therefore, be expected beforehand; while the Swiss Agnostics profess to be devoted to religious freedom, and would rise in arms if any Canton punished a profession of atheism with imprisonment. Disbelief is at least as intolerant as belief, with the aggravation that it inflicts torture for nothing. If there is no future state, what does "the religious poison" signify? Why should not an ephemeris worship the Sun, if it likes?

We omitted to notice last week the terrible blow which has fallen on the leading Royalist personages in France. The Tribunal of Commerce has decided that the Directors of the Union Générale are responsible to the shareholders for false issues of shares and for mismanagement, and has ordered them to pay a sum of nearly a million sterling in compensation. It has, moreover, made the Directors jointly and severally responsible; so that if one of them cannot pay the sum required, the others must find the difference. There is still an appeal; but if this decision is upheld, Royalist families of the first standing, like the De Broglies, Harcourts, Cirecourts, and the like, will be partially or wholly ruined. The majority of them, moreover, were innocent of all but a foolish want of judgment in entering into financial business, they having trusted their managing director, M. Bontoux, with implicit confidence.

The annual meeting of the British Association was opened at Southport on Wednesday, the 19th instant. The President of the year is Professor Cayley, who delivered an address which to the greater number even of scientific men must have appeared painfully abstruse. It was devoted solely to mathematics, and besides a history of the instances in which mathematical theories have been suggested by questions of common life, or physical science, contained many recondite, not to say transcendental, speculations in pure mathematics, mathematics applied under imagined conditions. The general drift of this part of the address, which was far too full of thought for condensation, even if we were capable of the full comprehension necessary for such a task, was that the axioms of geometry are absolute truths only under imagined conditions, and that conditions can be conceived of under which they may not be true. For example, the proposition that two straight lines cannot enclose a space is not true of a smooth sphere. Mr. Cayley does not assert, as Mr. Clifford is supposed to have done, that he can conceive of four-dimensional space; but he does assert that he can conceive of beings to whom three-dimensional space seems as impossible as four-dimensional space does to us. "It may be at once admitted that we cannot conceive of a fourth dimension of space; the space as we conceive of it, and the physical space of our experience, are alike three-dimensional; but we can, I think, conceive space as being two or even one-dimensional; we can imagine rational beings living in a one-dimensional space (a line), or in a two-dimensional space (a surface), and conceiving of space accordingly, and to whom, therefore, a two-dimensional space, or (as the case may be) a three-dimensional space, would be as inconceivable as a four-dimensional space is to us." We suppose, therefore, Mr. Cayley thinks four-dimensional space or n -dimensional space to be possible, though beyond our intelligence, cramped as it is by our experience. Is not the end of that this,—that final truth is unattainable even in geometry?

Professor Ray Lankester, on Thursday, read a long and vehement paper in favour of creating appointments for scientific inquirers. He maintained that knowledge was declining and discovery languishing, because Englishmen, who scattered money on wars, new openings for trade, and "meaningless or injurious charities," would not provide any for scientific research. He recapitulated the services rendered to mankind by science, and showed that in England there were only thirty-eight scientific appointments, against 300 in Germany; from which country, he further maintained, we now draw all our soundest and most advanced knowledge. He especially animadverted on the diversion of the great legacy left by Sir T. Gresham, now worth some £3,000,000, from those purposes of scientific inquiry for which he destined it. Is not Mr. Lankester, in this vigorous and eloquent speech, a little false to his own principles?

Inquiry, as a fact, is conducted gratis. As a rule, great discoveries are made rather by hungry men than by well-paid men; and if, by keeping savants hungry, we can get more out of them, we clearly ought, on scientific principles, to prevent their getting sufficient to eat. What is the misery of the individual professor, or even his extinction by hunger, compared with the general interest of science? Mr. Lankester strikes us as degenerating. He is falling into the Christian weakness of pity, and by-and-by will think it wrong to starve dogs in order to increase the sum of knowledge.

The plan for employing female doctors in India, one of the few thoroughly sensible plans recently started by philanthropists, seems likely to be a success. A sum of £4,000 has been raised in Bombay, to guarantee salaries for two or three years to English ladies—one of them is Miss Pechey, M.D., a most successful student, who fought through the great Edinburgh fight—and £20,000 to start a native hospital for women; while in Madras, four ladies have been admitted to practise by the local Medical College. One of these is that remarkable woman, Mrs. Scharlieb, who came to England to perfect her medical education, and distanced all competitors at the London University. Lastly, Mr. Rivers Thompson, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal—and we may remark, the firmest opponent of the Ilbert Bill—in a Minute full of clear sense and sympathy for native suffering has over-riden the opposition of the Council of the Medical College, and ordered the admission of female students, if qualified by general education. The number of entrances is certain to be large, and in a few years each of the Three Presidencies will have a staff of female doctors thoroughly familiar with the language and inured to the climate. They will reduce the sum of human misery far more than a dozen orders admitting lads with an English veneer on them to positions for which they are hopelessly disqualified. We are glad to notice also that the new doctors intend to make a business of their work, to claim fees from those who can pay, and to earn if they can good incomes for themselves. One fortune made by a woman as a doctor in Calcutta will keep the supply more regular than any amount of philanthropy in individuals, who after a few years die out.

We have never been able to support the Permissive Bill, or to endorse what seem to us the exaggerated ideas of Teetotalers, but there is one strong law which we are surprised they do not attempt to carry. What is the argument against totally prohibiting the sale of alcohol to children under fifteen, under penalty of a loss of licence to the seller? Nobody doubts that children are better without alcohol, as they are without tobacco, late hours, and many other indulgencies not necessarily injurious to their elders. They have no natural claim to liberty, which, indeed, in all other matters of educational discipline, is steadily refused them; and they cannot need the drink, except under circumstances in which their elders would readily procure it for them. Respectable publicans, who keep their own children rigidly away from the bar, would not object to such a law, which, children not being free agents, may be justified on the same principle as the rule forbidding a publican to supply drink to a man already intoxicated. The prohibition, being absolute, would be easily worked; and it could, we believe, in the present temper of the people, be readily carried through the House of Commons.

A great opportunity is offered to London. The Duke of Bedford, in a letter to the Corporation of the City, offers to sell Covent Garden Market and the houses round it, the leases of which are about to fall in. He admits the necessity of improvements, but says he is unable to make them on the scale required, which, under our absurd system of life-tenancies, may be true. We do not suppose that the Corporation will accept the offer, as the Duke's Trustees have no power to accept a bid much lower than the value; and we do not quite know why "E. C." should expend its property for the benefit of "W. C." If, however, London were governed, as it ought to be, by a single Corporation, that body would jump eagerly at the offer, and not only effect a grand improvement in the very centre of London, but revolutionise the fruit and vegetable supply. At present, they are strict monopolies, and a good apple is dearer than a good orange which has come, perhaps, a thousand miles. If the dealers in Covent Garden had the orange trade, they would stub up three-fourths of the orange groves, and sell the fruit at sixpence apiece, pleading want of room.

It is believed that the Parnell Fund will pass £25,000, and the largest mortgage on his estate, £13,000, has already been paid off. We regret the success of the subscription, because we consider that Mr. Parnell's agitation has done more injury to Irishmen by demoralising them than it has done good by assisting them to combine against oppressive land laws. Apart from the cause, however, we see no discredit in the acceptance of a subscription of the kind, which has precedents in the cases of Daniel O'Connell, Mr. Cobden, General Grant, and Mrs. Garfield. There is no more reason why a nation should not pay its heroes informally, than why it should not pay them formally. The drawback to such popular grants of money is that they encourage the agitators, who are seeking nothing but gain, to devote themselves to agitation as a business, and to rival one another in currying favour with the populace. They know their claims will not be sifted as they would be by a Parliament, and strive to make them look great by excessive violence. The English prejudice against rewarding politicians in money, as we reward soldiers and sailors, has its root in an instinctive reason. If the statesman works for us for cash, he may also sell us for coin.

A rumour was circulated early in the week that the Government of Natal had presented an ultimatum to Cetewayo. He was to surrender within ten days, or he would be arrested. Either, however, the rumour was incorrect, or orders were sent from the Colonial Office to abstain from action against the King, for the story was officially declared unfounded. The King, therefore, remains in the Reserve, gathering forces or awaiting attack from Usibepu, whom a majority of Zulus look upon as the coming man. We can see no sound reason whatever for forbidding the Zulu tribes to fight the quarrel out. They evidently desire a general ruler, and their method of electing one has at least the merit of finality. We would protect the border, announce that if it were crossed by any party Zululand would be conquered, and then leave the clans to their own devices. They will not exterminate each other, though they will introduce a short period of anarchy, and any King who can maintain order will suit us.

The Lancet appears to believe that a case of unprecedented age capable of verification has at last been discovered. At present the highest age known capable of absolute proof is 106, at which Lady Smith died a few years since. It is affirmed, however, that at Auberine en Royans, a village near Grenoble, an old woman is living who is "authentically" known to be 123, and who is proved by certificates to have been married ninety-nine years ago last January. She had a son killed at the battle of Friedland, in 1807, who must, therefore, have been born, at the very least, ninety-three years ago. The local doctor, Dr. Bonne, believes in her; but we notice that she is practically supported by popular curiosity about her age, and has, therefore, every temptation to exaggerate. As she has her certificates, which could not have been forged, the real question is one of identity. Is she the person to whom the certificates were given, or the daughter, or a much younger sister? It is astounding, in cases of extreme age, when three generations of contemporaries have passed away, how inexact local evidence becomes.

The Free Library system extends slowly. Mr. John Lovell, on Wednesday week, read a paper to the Library Association, in which he showed that the Act enabling ratepayers to establish such libraries passed in 1850, but in twenty-one years only thirty-six libraries had been opened. Since 1871, however, progress had been more rapid, and there were now one hundred and thirteen communities possessing free libraries, and seventy-nine of them which publish exact returns have among them 2,344,736 volumes, an average of 30,000 volumes each. The books, moreover, are greatly in demand, though the passion for fiction is still unabated, the issue of novels never being less than fifty-six per cent. of the whole, and rising in places to seventy-seven per cent. The building difficulty is still great, and there is a dispute about the best kind of building, many librarians, we regret to see, being in favour of a division between the library proper and the reading-room. That is convenient for them, but all experience shows that the presence of books in masses tempts to reading. Nothing is more dreary or depressing than a reading-room looking like an exaggerated class-room without books.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MR. GLADSTONE'S HOLIDAY.

WE are not much interested, we confess, in the romances which the journalists of the Continent are pouring out about Mr. Gladstone's rapid visit to Copenhagen. Those romances would be curious as illustrations of the credulity of experts, were the sincerity of their authors certain; but it is not certain. The Jew speculators in arbitrages, who own or control most Continental newspapers, are very fond of putting out "tentatives" which may flutter the Markets, and their employes are just now as hard up as the Times for something of interest to say. They are dreadfully bored with Tonquin, and negotiations about places more obscure than if they were in Central Africa; they are not allowed to gossip much about their own foreign affairs; and a little wild talk about Mr. Gladstone, and his possible intention of inducing Russia and Denmark to help France in counteracting Germany, amuses their readers' imaginations. It is a dull time, and a little latitude must be allowed. Nor do we care greatly, we confess, to know what dress the Czar wears when he calls on Mr. Gladstone, or how Mr. Gladstone bowed when royal people not so big as the Czar followed up the gangway in his wake. A Liberal may confide even in his leader's manners. Mr. Gladstone has not been a great figure in the world for thirty years without learning international etiquette, or understanding the ceremonial courtesies of which Lord Beaconsfield would in the same position have been so unctuously profuse. The importance of this voyage in the 'Pembroke Castle' to our minds consists in this,—that such things should be telegraphed, that newspaper proprietors should spend hundreds to obtain such details, that, in short, the body of Englishmen should be so interested in Mr. Gladstone's personality. It is quite clear they are interested. They follow him with their minds round the coast, and through the islands, and over the sea, and drink in all details about him with a quenchless avidity. Pacing the deck at sea, or praising Mr. Tennyson to Orcadians, or entertaining a caddyful of Kings in the harbour of Copenhagen, the people find Mr. Gladstone always their most interesting object. They care very little about other Ministers, do not notice Lord Hartington's wanderings, ask for no report of that really curious scene, Lord Granville hobnobbing with M. Waddington and the "Marquis" Tseng together, and deciding in chitchat on the destiny of Tonquin; and, we suspect, are not greatly excited because Mr. Chamberlain has been studying Highland crofters. They cannot take their eyes off Mr. Gladstone. To them, he is the Ministry, the Government, the State, almost concrete and incarnate. That is a very remarkable phenomenon in politics, and one which, while everybody is waiting till the Empress-Mother at Peking can make up her mind, is worth a moment's observation.

The Times says it is all due to Mr. Gladstone's special personality, that a certain quality of homeliness in him attracts the sympathy of millions to whom his genius would be unintelligible; and, of course, that is in part true. Mr. Gladstone attracts the domestic as Lord Beaconsfield attracted the grandiose side of the national character, and is admired by millions because they feel that he is like themselves, yet greater than themselves, which, because it justifies themselves to themselves, is pleasant and attractive; but is there not something more? Attraction of that kind, if it is so strong, should be permanent; and Mr. Gladstone was at his very best and noblest when the mob were kicking the Police, in their desire to force an entrance through his door, and when no counter-mob rose up in his defence. It seems to us that there is a more permanent cause at work; that we shall see many successors to Mr. Gladstone, though, perhaps, none like him; that the Democracy, as it grows freer, is instinctively remodelling the Executive, and making for itself a King. The feeling of an aristocracy is always for a Cabinet which, like itself, worships prudence, and if circumstances are favourable, as in Venice, and under the system which prevailed in England from 1750 to 1832, it will trust a Cabinet with all power; but the feeling of a Democracy is for a Committee, regulated by an individual of more directly popular choice. That is the root, we take it, of the tendency, whenever Monarchy is overthrown, to fall back on the Presidential system, or to vest a single man with a Premiership such as the Venetians carefully avoided, and our own borough-owners always disliked. They were for the Duke of Newcastle, or the Duke of Portland, or Lord Liverpool, while the people recognised only Chatham, or Pitt, or Fox. We do not mean, as is so often alleged, that the tendency of the people is to Cæsarism. That method of expressing democracy, though it has found favour with Southern Europeans, has never shown itself able to attract men of the Teutonic race, who feel helpless and bewildered when deprived of the protection of law, and cultivate legends of obedience to it shown by the powerful rather than legends of successful attempts to break loose from its bonds. No Cæsar has arisen in Germany, or America, or England, even in times of the wildest danger and commotion, though Henry VIII. for a time nearly occupied the position. We mean that the Democracy, liking law, and liking, too, to see all things discussed by its own representatives, likes also to place a controlling or regulating power in a single man whom it can call rapidly and certainly to account. It is not sure of the Committee, cannot follow its action closely, and prefers to heap responsibility upon a person. That this is so in America is admitted on all hands, for the Presidentship is the organisation adopted even in managing municipalities or business undertakings; it has been so in France, whenever France was free; and in England, it has been marked throughout the last twenty-eight years,—that is, from the accession of Lord Palmerston. Throughout that time, no secession from the Cabinet or from the Ministry has made any perceptible difference. Men go and men come, sometimes great men; but while the chief remains unchanged, the party feels no shock, and the nation takes little notice. It is "Mr. Gladstone's Government," not the Government of a Whig or Radical Cabinet.

The danger of such a method of Government, the people, as it were, putting one man above the statesmen, and in a sense above Parliament, is patent; but the solidity it gives to the system is much less apparent or noticed. Yet that solidity is very real. The preference for Lord Palmerston, or Lord Beaconsfield, or Mr. Gladstone, restores to the State many of the advantages attributed to the old Kingship. Every Minister is obliged in the England of to-day to take counsel of a chief who acts as nexus of a group which otherwise might become either contentious or disunited. Mere popularity is not enough to make a subordinate Minister free. The party itself has to reckon with a leader whom it cannot override or change, and who can, therefore, give to its counsels that consistency and patience which democracies are always supposed to lack. The majority cannot wander away after some new idea, because it cannot carry its chief with it, and will not abandon him. Governments in England are said, especially abroad, to change so frequently that it is impossible to arrange alliances, or to pursue any settled scheme of international policy; and in a sense that is true, but the limits of change are made by the new system extraordinarily narrow. Parties go in and out, but practically for thirty years there have been but three statesmen in England with power to dictate foreign policy, and they have only changed with each other; while upon any subject on which the three were agreed—as, for example, on the value of an entente cordiale with France—there has been no change at all. No King or Emperor could have restrained a people from wandering on that point more effectually than a succession of "popular favourites" has done, and this whether in power or out of it. The "mobility" and "emotionalness" of democracy have not been apparent in that matter at all; on the contrary, consistency has almost been overstrained, and the reason is that through the whole period the same three men have led the people, and whether in power or out of it, have on this subject never swerved. We have lost, no doubt, something by their unquestioned ascendancy. In a Cabinet presided over by any one of the three, the remaining Ministers must lose, and do lose, something of original force, of individual courage, of power to lead the people by their opinions; but in return, we gain in steadiness, in deliberateness, and in persistency of action. We will not decide whether the gain is greater than the loss, but two data for decision certainly exist. One is that the gain, whatever its positive value, is precisely of the kind which it is asserted will most benefit and correct the master-evil of democracy,—its fluidity. The other is that history, on the whole, is on the side of the arrangement. The best argument we know of for kingship of the old kind, the effective and not the ceremonial kind, is the extraordinary absence of contempt for it among the statesmen whom it strained. They could not be deceived about it, as a populace might be; they saw it close, and often at its worst; they suffered from it perpetually; yet, while often hating or despising the individual king, they have almost to a man recognised in the institution some great advantage; and when obliged, as in America and France, to dispense with it, have replaced it by something as near to it as they dared. They felt the necessity in executive matters, or when adopting policies, or when taking an initiative of any kind, of a final, yet individual referee, not exactly one of themselves. Under a declining kingship, and with the popular will acting almost too directly, we in England are gaining such a referee from the special position which popular favour allots to each successive Premier, and which makes of him something more than the chief member of the Cabinet, and nearest representative of the Throne. We suspect that the habit of singling out one man as the depositary of public confidence will continue, and that the Cabinet of the future in which there is no such man will evoke very little party loyalty, and no national enthusiasm. A Government in which all were equal would be an invisible Government, and no invisible Government has ever yet attracted the Democracy.

THE REVOLUTION IN BULGARIA.

THE very worst thing that could happen to Eastern Europe would be a cordial agreement between the Romanoffs and the Hapsburgs. There could be but one basis for such an agreement, and that would be a partition of the Balkan peninsula, as injurious to the world as the partition of Poland. In the present state of Russian and German opinion, the Romanoffs have not the power of surrendering their reversionary title to Constantinople, or the Hapsburgs of giving up their claim to spread southwards to Salonica, the Russians holding that Constantinople is theirs on religious grounds, and the Germans that the trading wealth for which they sigh must come with entrance into Asiatic waters. Salonica in German hands would be, they think, the emporium of Asiatic Turkey. The only basis of agreement, therefore, would be a division under which Bosnia, Serbia, Montenegro, Macedonia, and Greece would fall to Austria, and Roumania, Bulgaria, East Roumelia, and Constantinople, to Russia. Such an agreement, it is known, has been discussed; it has the approval of many Austrian and Russian statesmen, and it was, we believe, almost publicly endorsed by the Austrian Heir-Apparent. It would be a fatal blow to Eastern Europe. The South Slavs would lose all chance of liberty, and of their natural development; while Greece would become a German enclave, with her aspirations ended, and her people forced at every turn to consider the wishes of a Power which they regard as leaden. Their natural genius would be as completely stifled as that of Italy under Austrian domination. By sea and land equally, they would be at the mercy of Vienna. None of the new provinces, Russian or Austrian, could be leniently governed, for none would be contented, and all would be subjected to a terrible conscription; while the chronic suspicion which divides Austria and Russia, and makes the whole East a field of intrigue, would only be accentuated. The frontiers of the two Empires would march for eleven hundred miles with no natural barrier between them, and life on the border would become life in a camp.

We are not sorry, therefore, to believe that the chance of agreement is at present very small, and watch the duel of intrigue now going on in the former territories of Turkey with no wish, except that it may continue until both Powers have so wearied out the population that the only arrangement consistent with freedom, a Federation of the Balkan, shall be the aspiration of Slav and Greek alike; and the peoples of the peninsula, suffering from similar dangers and similar oppressions, shall begin to feel as if they were a nation with common interests to defend. Just now, the duel always going on has become momentarily visible, and the Russian Government is supposed to have scored a hit. For some time past, the advantages have all been upon the Austrian side. To begin with, the Hapsburgs obtained a European sanction to their occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, that is, to the richest potentially of all the territories in dispute. Then they acquired some hold over Montenegro, which has never been explained, but which undoubtedly led the Prince to restrain his subjects in the dispute about the right to raise conscripts in the Crivoschie. Again, they conciliated King Milano of Serbia till they could rely on the neutrality, if not the obedience of that State; and finally, they induced the Roumanian Government to sue for admission into the German-Austrian alliance, and Prince Alexander of Bulgaria to plan the removal of his Russian advisers, preparatory to the same step. Those were important advantages, but they were less solid than they seemed. The Hapsburgs are less hated in Roumania than the Romanoffs, who are considered there, since the Treaty of Berlin, both arrogant and ungrateful, but everywhere else in Old Turkey they are either dreaded or detested. They could not take a plébiscite anywhere. The Greeks fear them beyond reason, and the South Slavs regard them as the instruments of two hostile castes. In Bosnia, in Serbia, in both Bulgarias, in Macedonia, and in Greece successful Austrian advance is regarded with a horror far exceeding the nevertheless strong distaste for the advance of Russia. The Russian Foreign Office, which is not nearly so much afraid of popular movements as is sometimes fancied in the West, has taken advantage of this state of opinion, and is everywhere exhibiting itself in the character of protector of the rights of the mass of the community. In Serbia, Russia favours the advocates of a new and far more democratic constitution; and in Bulgaria, she demands the restoration of the suspended liberties of the people. Prince Alexander, when, two years ago, he assumed all powers, promised to use his powers to accelerate improvement in Bulgaria; and had he kept his word would, we still believe, have been far more popular than the Liberals. He had, however, overrated his own capacity, and the discontent is so great that but for Russian support the Bulgarians would dismiss him, and either elect a totally new Prince, or call Prince Vogorides, the administrator of Eastern Roumelia, to the throne. The Russian Government, therefore, convinced that its influence was waning, and suspecting the Prince of readiness to cast in his lot with the German alliance, offered Prince Alexander the alternative of restoring the Constitution or facing his people alone,—that is, of a successful revolution. As he is unwilling to depart, and, it is said, strongly recommended both from Berlin and Vienna not to abdicate, he has yielded, and on the 19th inst. issued a proclamation recalling the Assembly, and appointing the Liberal Chief, M. Zankoff, once more Premier. The Liberals, who have recovered power, and who are very bitter against Prince Alexander for his coup d'état, are, of course, grateful to St. Petersburg; and, for the time, Austrian influence is defeated, and Russian is in the ascendant. Russia has no more "annexed" Bulgaria than she has annexed Montenegro, but she has broken the authority of the "Germanising" Prince, and has prevented a Balkan State from entering the German-Austrian alliance.

This victory is considered a grand counter-stroke, and in one way so it is; but, like the Austrian victories, it is purchased at a price, an extension of popular suspicion and distrust. The Bulgarians do not want to be Russian, any more than the Servians want to be Austrian. The Slavs want to govern themselves in their own way, even if that way involves, as it certainly did in Bulgaria, temporary muddling. They distrust their Princes, and the Powers behind them, more and more, though they are conscious for the present that they cannot openly resist them. The feeling deepens, and becomes stronger with every new intrigue, until it may be taken as certain that if the people of the Balkans were free from the dread of military occupation, they would send Austrian and Russian away alike, dismiss their Princes, and organise themselves into a loosely coherent Federated Republic. To have created such a feeling is not a successful result of diplomacy and intrigue, and although the feeling is not, of course, as yet executive, it must in the end produce action. The people are getting politically educated. They are all learning soldiery of a much stricter kind than their old militia training. They are all beginning to perceive that the Princes have other objects than the welfare of the people. And finally, they are all learning that from Bucharest to Athens every man in what was once European Turkey has common external interests, and may, if he pleases, help every other. All that tends towards common action, which we may live to see begin, just as we lived to see it in Italy, where the jealousies, rivalries, and differences among the States were at least as strong, and seemed even more insuperable. The Balkan States are not more overshadowed by their neighbours than the Italian States were, and from the character of their people would find insurrection easier. Meanwhile, neither Austria nor Russia gains anything, for their strength is not increased by the extension of "influence" over distrusted Princes and populations which regard their efforts to advance only with apprehension. Either Power would gain more by securing the cordial adhesion of a single State, than it does by all its astute and tortuous diplomacy.

GETTING UP THE STEAM.

THE Conservatives are getting up the steam for the work of the autumn, and Mr. James Lowther's shrill speech at Maryport on Wednesday may be regarded as a kind of premonitory whistle, intended to inform the world that the dead season is drawing to a close, and that the party machine is about to start again. It would be unfair to Mr. Lowther to speak of him as exactly a representative man. He has been fifteen years in Parliament, and Lord Beaconsfield made him a Minister; but neither age nor office has had the slightest effect upon the reckless candour with which, from the time when he invented Obstruction down to his latest appearances as the avowed champion of Protection, he has proclaimed his own opinions and defied the party managers. What the mass of his political associates only think, Mr. Lowther says openly; what they whisper in the safe seclusion of their clubs and caucuses, he publishes upon the house-tops. Every one, however, will acknowledge that there is not to be found in the ranks of his party a better partisan, and when Liberals wish to know the worst that is said or believed of them by their opponents, it is to Mr. Lowther's speeches that they turn instinctively. From this point of view, his latest effort must be pronounced full and instructive. His Maryport oration is a long and unbroken catena of damnable epithets. The hostility and disaffection of the Irish were, he asserts, never so marked. At no period had the business of Parliament been in such a discreditable state as it was last Session. Millions had been voted away without discussion in a thin House in the month of August, and on a Sunday morning. Mr. Lowther himself had vainly protested against this unexampled sacrilege, but it was carried through, "amid disorderly interruptions, initiated and encouraged by the Treasury Bench, and participated in by the Prime Minister himself." (This picture of Mr. Gladstone hounding on his followers to an unconstitutional use of the Sabbath is in Mr. Lowther's best manner, and is sure to be imitated freely by inferior artists.) The new Rules and the Grand Committees were an "egregious failure." "It was being acknowledged by everybody, except the Prime Minister, that the system of devolution was as rank and signal a failure as the rest of the policy of the Government." He was not prepared to say that there was "any great harm" in the Agricultural Holdings Bill, but what faith could the farmers have in a Ministry which had by means of "discreditable quibbles" evaded the law against the importation of diseased foreign cattle? Abroad, the Government had abandoned the "traditional policy" of England, which was to maintain a cordial alliance with the "old Conservative Powers" of Central Europe. In Colonial matters they were still more at sea, and the restoration of Cetewayo (described in the Lowther dialect as the "sending back of the dusky warrior to the scene of his former iniquities") had been "fraught with disastrous consequences to our empire." Mr. Lowther's comprehensive survey at last brought him to the field of domestic politics, but we need not follow him further. His speech was pitched in the same key from first to last, the moral of the whole being that it is the one duty of Conservatives to strain every nerve to compass the speedy downfall of a Government whose follies and failures are unredeemed by even the faintest trace of patriotism or statesmanship.

Mr. Lowther's invective, barren and wearisome as it is, is worth noticing, for two reasons. In the first place, it shows how extremely difficult the abler Conservatives find the task of justifying and explaining the intense bitterness which they and their followers feel for Mr. Gladstone and his Government. No one who reads Mr. Lowther's speech can doubt either the genuineness of his aversion for the Cabinet whose enormities he denounces, or the strength of his desire to convince both himself and his hearers that things are really as bad as he makes them out to be. He is so angry, that a measured and reasoned attack would afford him no satisfaction, and, in order to sustain his passion at its proper level, he is obliged to take refuge in indiscriminate and transparently hollow abuse. No one, for instance, knows better than Mr. Lowther that last Session produced a more than average crop of useful legislation. An admission to that effect would not be at all inconsistent with his character as a stout and unbending partisan. But it would be inconsistent with the accepted Tory maxim that nothing succeeds, even by accident, under the evil auspices of the present Government, and Mr. Lowther therefore boldly declares, and doubtless tries to believe, that the business of Parliament was "never in such a discreditable state." Many Conservatives, again, bore witness in the House of Commons to the excellent results which attended the reference of the Bankruptcy Bill to a Grand Committee. It was Mr. Lowther, if we remember right, who once declared these Committees to be a copy of the Birmingham Caucus, and predicted that they would double the time spent in the consideration of a Bill. Be that as it may, he is not content to express his own dissatisfaction with the new forms of Procedure, but must needs assert, in direct contradiction to the testimony of Members on his own side, that the system of devolution is acknowledged by everybody to be as "rank a failure as the rest of the policy of the Ministry." The same falsetto tone pervades the whole of Mr. Lowther's speech. Everything must be wrong, under the worst possible of Governments. To admit that in a single instance it had shown wisdom or courage, or even been smiled upon by fortune, would be to allow a fatal exception to the general principle to which, by the central law of its being, all its history must conform. If the facts fail to shape themselves as the theory requires, they are quietly ignored, or audaciously perverted. In all this, Mr. Lowther only gives exaggerated expression, as is his wont, to the prevailing temper of his party. They are angry beyond measure with the Government, more angry than ever since fortune, which was so long adverse to it, began to set decisively in its favour; and finding the country unsympathetic and contented, they try at once to justify and to stimulate their passion by artificial denunciations of imaginary crimes.

Mr. Lowther's speech is worth attention in another way, as illustrating the lines upon which the Tory leaders seem determined to carry on their campaign. It will be observed that he offers the country nothing as the reward of the struggle to which he invites it, except relief from the present Government. The Tories, who either never read, or have very quickly forgotten the Midlothian speeches, are convinced almost to a man that Lord Beaconsfield was talked out of office by eloquent abuse. The same simple belief in the efficacy of Mr. Gladstone's methods, independently of Mr. Gladstone himself, which sustains Sir Stafford Northcote every autumn in his weary pilgrimage from platform to platform, leads Mr. Lowther and the lesser orators of the party to give themselves up entirely to invective. They forget how large a part of Mr. Gladstone's speeches was purely constructive, and how many of the measures that have been or will be passed by the present Parliament were inscribed on the programme which he persuaded the country to adopt. They forget, too, that the nation condemned the legislative impotence of Lord Beaconsfield's Administration, no less heartily than its pernicious activity abroad. It would, of course, be idle to expect the Conservatives, whose opportunity will come, if ever, in some fit of popular exhaustion like that of 1874, to throw away their best chance, by promising large changes in the Constitution and the Law. But, unless we are mistaken, they will find it no less difficult to attract the sympathy of the people by mere negations than to destroy their confidence in Mr. Gladstone's Government by insincere and hysterical abuse.

THE FILLING-UP OF THE WORLD.

IT is a great pity we cannot have another world hooked on to this one, to be explored and settled. There is plenty of spare force and enterprise to do the work, it would be very interesting; and if a few lives were consumed in the great task, their biographers are both ready and willing. The planet Earth grows small. It is not peopled yet, though it is being peopled at a prodigious rate, till a couple of centuries hence New York State may be a little China, and Queensland a somewhat crowded region; but it is already occupied very nearly. This Tonquin affair brings home, to those who think, the fact that the epoch of Colony-founding, which has lasted three hundred years—ever since men discovered America, and realised fully that the world was a little ball, gyrating in Space—and which has been marked by such magnificent and such cruel episodes, has very nearly ended. The day of conquest is not over, has possibly hardly begun, for science is becoming a religion, and when once that religion is believed, the lot of the inferior races will be a hard one; but the day of colonies proper seems to be almost over. Not only has discovery so nearly reached its limit that even dreamers cease to fancy new islands or unseen continents discoverable, but the regions fit to grow nations are all taken, mostly by Englishmen, although Englishmen, according to themselves, unlike their rivals, have no ambition, are the most domestic of peoples, and never annex. The Portuguese have a noble slice of the world, a territory which will one day sustain a hundred millions,—not of Portuguese; the Spaniards own country after country,—a round dozen of magnificent States which one day will have histories; but the English have the remainder, and among these three peoples unoccupied Earth is now a property, surveyed and fenced in. If France or Germany wished ever so much to found a new France or a new Germany outside her own borders, it could not be done. Either might conceivably conquer a place fit for future greatness, as, for example, Brazil, where a handful of many-coloured people bar out mankind from one of its richest possessions; but of lands to be obtained without conquest, by settlement, or by short wars with savages, there are practically none left. Europe is occupied, as we all know; not an inch which is not fenced off by a civilised State, armed with the terrible modern power of pouring out a lead spray to a distance of a thousand yards, through which nothing living may burst. Asia, besides being over half its expanse choked with people, is held throughout by legal title by States ready to defend their rights. Even the huge Valley of the Amour is a property, and though Asia Minor will some day be repopled by invaders who will restore its marvellous fertility, it is to-day one of the Turkish ruined estates. Except an island or two in the Eastern Archipelago, there is nothing to take on which men of the higher races could settle and expect to flourish. A group or two in the Pacific await the colonist, but can never attract him; but the only unoccupied island of grand magnitude, New Guinea, is virtually occupied. We English are very virtuous just now, a good deal overloaded, and much bothered by believing two systems of morality at once; but if anybody touches New Guinea, we shall help Australia to fight for it, as we should fight for the Scilly Isles. In Africa, all that can be profitably settled is gone. Madagascar, though not full, is full enough to defend itself; North Africa belongs to the French, South Africa to the English; and from the Chotts, which are to be made a sea, down to the Zambesi, there is no place where a great colony could be founded. There are provinces badly defended, and deltas occupied only by savages, and lacustrine regions scarcely peopled, but they are none of them available for colonies. Either they are too secluded, like the last-named, or too full, like the North-West Coast, or too deadly, like the Valley of the Niger. France, and England, and Portugal, and even Belgium, are nibbling at bits of the African continent; but it is with an idea of trading, or at most of making sugar plantations, not of settling or founding States. A single American State has more potentialities in it than all the lands that Europe has been trying for three centuries to steal upon the West-African seaboard. There remain only the two Americas, and practically the English and their American children, with the Spaniards and the Portuguese, claim and possess them both by legal title. There are not a thousand square miles anywhere which Prince Bismarck could mark on a map and say, "This shall be mine." It is true there are rich, unoccupied regions which would hold all Germany, or all Europe for that matter; but the Prince could not say Brazil shall be a new Germany, or the back region of Peru a Prussia. Not only would their owners fight for the lands they cannot fill, or even explore, but the new Power which even Bismarck will not irritate, the Power which adds two thousand men a day to its fighting strength, regards those vast and rich desolations as its reversionary heritage, and would quite calmly, but quite finally forbid a German descent. There is practically no land anywhere any more for a great new colony. Every land is either filled, or occupied, or held by possessors who look forward reasonably or otherwise to future occupation, and who are protected either, like the Australians, by sufficient force, or, like the Brazilians, by world-wide laws, which, till a strong necessity arrives, cannot be burst through.

This is a considerable change in the position of the World, and one which may produce considerable results. For one thing, it may produce conquests. We English, clothed to the chin in territories and buried over the lips in subjects, hold conquest to be immoral, and Belgians and Danes agree with us; but the great races of Earth for the most part either reject the theory, or accept it only in words. Germany is goodness itself, but she does not give back Lorraine, and is urging Austria to conquer the Balkan peninsula. The French Republic is peace, but Frenchmen have not a scruple about Tonquin, took Tunis with hardly a colourable pretext—nobody has since even seen a Kroumir—and would conquer China to-morrow, but for the cost and the reluctance of the conscripts to leave France. Our own descendants, unless they alter greatly, will swallow Mexico, whenever it is convenient; and when they want Brazil will treat the Portuguese sovereignty as the paper claim which, indeed, in verity it is. The close of the Colony-making period will not, unless Europe loses its energy or increases in scrupulousness, tend to peace; and that will not be the only result. The absence of new grooves for emigration drives emigrants to the old ones, and among the old ones they choose by preference one or two. Emigration becomes a vast descent, a cascade of European humanity upon North America, which is therefore filling at a portentous rate. It is seventeen years since an able historian, who had been slowly traversing the Far West, pondering much, instead of buying land, told us that the thing which struck him most was that emigration on the great scale was a temporary phenomenon, an affair of a century or so; that the Union was filling, that jealous competition had begun, and that in a few years, as historians count time, the foreigner would be warned off. His prophecy is not fulfilled yet, but already in the Union the authorities send back paupers because their own are too many; already the workmen suffer from competition; already they ask if it may not be this rush from abroad which makes Trade-Unionism impossible, and so steadily, as the Washington Commissioners of Inquiry report this week, sends down wages. The unoccupied lands check the fall, by drawing off the able-bodied; but they also are being occupied, they, though they relieve pressure, increase the natural increment of the population, and already the end is growing faintly visible. The American people complain of over-work—complain truly, in most trades, according to English ideas—and it looks as if the painful destiny of mankind, suspended in North America for a second of time—for what is a century in history but a second?—were overtaking the race there too. That destiny throughout all history has been to work all day, every day, in order to keep alive, with capital punishment at the end of the life's toil. It would be a wretched destiny, were this life all; but no race has escaped it, and it is falling fast upon ours, though they inherited so rich and wide-spread an estate. As America fills, and wages fall, and the land is taken up, immigration must decline; and Europe must face—like China—her social problem, her difficulty of feeding all, even when all are industrious, without help from that enormous relief. The able and the discontented will perforce stay at home, and millions, all educated, may find life such a struggle as they find it now in Stepney, where on Monday fifteen hundred workmen, in fierce distress, resolved in public meeting that the waste lands of England ought to be devoted to them. They will sow wheat on the Strand rather than be so poor, and are so ardent that they half believe the Strand would yield a crop.

THE TRADES' UNIONS AND THE LAND.

THE debate and division on the Land Question at the Trades' Union Congress is, in two respects, encouraging. It showed that the English workman prefers what seems to him a practicable scheme, to one of larger proportions which does not strike him as practicable. A Continental working-man would have despised such a motion as that brought forward by Mr. Arch, when he was appealed to at the same time by so magnificent a phrase as the "Nationalisation of Land." But the Delegates at Nottingham thought that they understood what reclamation of waste stood for, whereas they did not understand even dimly what nationalisation of land stood for, and they preferred the lesser boon to the greater. The other encouraging thing is the little attention that seems to have been paid to any suggestion of confiscation. Mr. Arch and the Delegates generally were not very clear as to what they wanted done, or how they hoped to do it; but they had no conscious wish to rob any other class. Probably one reason why reclamation was more popular than nationalisation was that the workmen assumed that waste lands were no man's property, and thought that they might be appropriated without dishonesty.

But when these two merits have been conceded, all that is due in the way of praise has been given. Nothing could be more visionary than a great deal of what was said, though at intervals it was relieved by a gleam of strong common-sense. Thus, Mr. Knight, of Newcastle, saw quite clearly that nationalisation of land would mean the abolition of private property in land, for the poor as well as for the rich. Thousands of working-men, he said, possess freehold property purchased with their savings; and what is to become of this, if the nationalisation of land is carried out? It is sincerely to be hoped that before the scheme comes to be seriously debated—if that time ever does come—the number of workmen who have bought land will have increased tenfold. If that were the case, we should have no fear that the experiment of nationalisation would ever be tried. It is the men who have not got land, not the men who have got it, who want to make the State the universal landlord. For the most part, however, the speeches wanted this healthy admixture of common-place; and this is as true of those made in favour of Mr. Arch's comparatively moderate motion, as of those made in support of Mr. Rowland's amendment. For example, what is the worth of such a statement as this,—that the waste lands of the country, if cultivated, would yield £100,000,000 worth of wholesome food. Mr. Arch forgets that when a Royal Commission says that ten million acres now lying waste are capable of cultivation, this is not at all the same thing as saying they are capable of profitable tillage by an occupying owner. Yet if reclamation is to involve all that Mr. Arch supposes, this is what "capable of cultivation" must stand for. It is not enough that the wholesome food should be produced in the shape of sheep or cattle. The land reformer of Mr. Arch's type is commonly as severe on the capitalist who raises stock, as on the capitalist who prefers to keep his land wild. The labourer must be planted on the soil, and left to support himself by cultivating just the five or ten acres which would give him a living return for his labour. We should not envy the man who was told to make Surrey sand produce £10 an acre, if he had nothing but his own arms to bring about the result.

Again, we should greatly like to know how Mr. Arch arrives at his conclusion that protection to the sitting tenant would give £87,000,000 more value from the soil of England than is to be had under the system of merely compensating the outgoing tenant. Why eighty-seven millions, neither more nor less? Why not ninety, or eighty, or even eighty-five? Why, again, should Mr. Arch suppose that the constant object of a landlord is to get rid of an improving tenant? Yet, on his reading of the effects of the Agricultural Holdings Act, this is what the majority of landlords must have in view. Mr. Arch assumes that as soon as a tenant has "made his home on a farm in bad condition, and by skill, industry, and the expenditure of capital, raised the productiveness of the soil," the landlord will at once raise the rent, and so force the tenant either to forego the value of his improvements, or to break up his home. Surely he forgets that the landlord will have no motive for acting in this way, since if the tenant does break up his home, his landlord will have to pay him the full value of all the improvements he has made. We greatly doubt whether the Agricultural Holdings Act, either in its present form, or in the form that Mr. Arch would give to it, will produce any appreciable results of an economical kind,—will, that is, add in any large way to the total produce of British fields. It will remedy a little actual injustice, and some possible or apprehended injustice, and make tenants happier, which is a good thing, but that will be all. And the reason is that in most parts of England improvements are still made by the landlord, and until farmers undergo a very great change will continue to be made by him, or not to be made at all. The slowness of landlords to spend money is nothing to the slowness of tenants. We do not mean that there is not a good deal to be done in the way of a reform in the English Land system. But the effect of each particular change will be slight in itself, and not observable, perhaps, until some time afterwards. The notion that there is land enough to employ 100,000 townsmen crying out for some one to cultivate it, and 100,000 townsmen only asking for land to cultivate, is altogether a delusion. We can imagine nothing more wretched than the lot of a townsman set down to till a hungry and ungrateful soil, and to make a livelihood by doing so. Unless he was sentenced to do it by way of punishment, it would be impossible to keep him at work after the harvest of the first year had informed him of the character of the soil, and of the chances of the tiller. There is such a thing as putting more into land than it is possible to get out of it. Mr. Arch's townsmen might be protected against this temptation, by not having what is wanted to be put in; but if they were not in this predicament, they would in many cases be only wasting their labour, and any capital they might have in addition. Whatever the merit of high farming—and it is slowly being abandoned as too risky for the small percentage it returns—it is quite certain that high farming is not what peasant proprietors will ever try.

RAILWAYS AND THEIR CUSTOMERS.

IN his famous essay on "The Social Organism," Mr. Herbert Spencer traces an analogy between the organs which in a highly-organised animal convey the blood to the parts requiring to be fed, and the channels in which, in a highly-organised community, the commodities and money which are the life-blood of the State are distributed amongst its various divisions. The Railway System, with its double lines and its continuous flow of traffic to and fro, are in a nation what the arteries and veins are in the body. As the blood is the life, it is of the highest importance that the channels by which it is conveyed should be in as healthy and perfect a state as possible, and should perform their functions with the greatest possible ease and regularity. The condition of our Railways is, then, one of the most important elements in determining whether the general condition of our national life is sound or otherwise. In this view, among the most interesting documents of the year are the General Reports of the Board of Trade on Railways, of which that for 1882 was issued on Saturday week. This Report deals only with the financial aspect of Railway Companies. But not only is this perhaps the most interesting side to most people, but it is also the most easily ascertained and best test of their general condition. If it is true that good finance is the essence of good politics in the State, it is still truer in the case of Railway Companies. It is satisfactory, therefore, not only to Railway shareholders, but to the public in general, that the Report shows an eminently prosperous condition of Railway finance.

In a year in which commerce and agriculture certainly did not advance by hops and bounds, there is an increase nearly all round. There is a very slight decrease, equal to $\frac{1}{50}$ th of a penny a mile, in net earnings per mile, and $\frac{1}{4}$ th per cent. on the net earnings on capital, as compared with 1881; but as the dividends paid showed an increase of nearly $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., it is obvious that the reduction is more apparent than real. On the other hand, there is an increase of about 3 per cent. in capital, in gross receipts, in working expenses, and in net earnings. The increase in working expenses is the most unfavourable item in the Railway budget. There is ample room for reduction here, and the growth in a year in which materials and labour were comparatively cheap rather tends to show that the Staff is either too large or too highly paid. It is probable that the Boards of Directors and the ornamental portions of Railway administration, like those in the State, are too expensive. However, as long as the expenses do not actually outgrow the receipts, there is no great cause of complaint. When we turn to see how the receipts are made up, we find that the increase in goods traffic in 1881 is only 1 per cent., or a third less than the increase of working expenses, so that it would seem that in commodities generally the Railways were hardly paying their way. But as the actual increase in the quantities of goods carried showed a very considerable increase, there has been a reduction of rates, which is an encouraging sign that the Railways do their work more easily and smoothly than they did.

But the most salient feature of the Report is the enormous increase it shows in the receipts for the carriage of that most valuable of all commodities,—man. The fact that the increase is wholly due to the increase of third-class passenger traffic, is one of the most gratifying proofs we could have had of the increase of general prosperity in the country. The total increase in passenger receipts was at the rate of 4 per cent., but as there was a decrease in first and second-class receipts, the actual rate of third-class increase was nearly 7 per cent. As far as regards first and second-class passengers, the receipts in 1882 are £70,000 less than the year before. But the increase of more than a million in third-class receipts far more than outweighs that slight falling-off. The falling-off of first and second-class passengers shows, of course, that a certain proportion of the gain to third-class fares is caused by the richer classes travelling at the cheaper rate. That of itself marks a very considerable improvement in the accommodation offered to third-class passengers. When the Midland Railway first set the example of throwing open all its trains to third-class passengers, there were not a few Railway magnates who anticipated that the innovation would lead the Companies down the broad and easy road to falling dividends and general failure. Many prophesied that in a year or two the Midland itself would have to abandon the experiment as a mistake. Mr. Allport and his Directors may now boast not only that their commercial enterprise was guided by the most sagacious foresight, but that they have conferred a great benefit on themselves, on their competitors, and above all, on the public.

The northern lines have been the most diligent in catering for third-class passengers, and they have been rewarded by the results. Now that decent carriages are provided, it is found not only that decently-behaved people travel in them, but that there is a considerable improvement in the demeanour of those who used to behave themselves indecently. Near London and on some of the southern lines, the names of which will occur to every one, the third-class passengers are still carried about in narrow vans, more like cattle-pens than carriages, draughty, yet ill-ventilated, without any attempt at comfort or cleanliness, generally crowded, not only to the excess authorised by the Company's own rules, but far beyond it, and often at extravagant rates. The result is that people being treated like beasts sometimes behave as such, and a third-class carriage in the neighbourhood of London is too often more like the commonest of common lodging-houses than a place intended for the reception of respectable members of society. It is extraordinary that these Companies refuse to profit by experience, and do not in their own interests, if not in those of the public, provide decent accommodation for the people who, after all, like the Irish pigs, are "the boys that pay the rent." Unless some unexpected revolution in our industrial organisation should take place, these lines cannot expect to realise the profits out of goods traffic made by the northern lines. But the figures of third-class passenger traffic are seemingly capable of indefinite extension. The mere acquisition of the habit of locomotion would be an immense benefit to our agricultural population. It would materially awaken their intelligence, as well as enlarge their experiences. It would tend to that ideal condition of things postulated by the political economist, in which labour is always on the flow from where it is least wanted to where it is most wanted,—a postulate sadly out of harmony with the present facts of English rural life. One is inclined to wonder whether the disinclination to improve the third-class passenger accommodation is not due in part to a fear of thus awakening the intelligence and energy of the masses. It no doubt would tend to make them more homogeneous, to make them more easily able to combine, and thus to raise the agricultural labourer out of the dependent condition in which he now is. Whatever the reason may be, the disregard now shown for the goose who has demonstrated his capacity for laying golden eggs is almost criminal to the shareholders, and a gross neglect of duty towards the public, which has entrusted the Companies with the monopoly in their districts of the function of distribution. Perhaps this Report will open the eyes of the blind, and make them see that their own interests are identical with that of the poorer classes of their countrymen. The reform must come, and it is for the interests of every one that it should come as soon as possible. We incline to prophesy that it will not be long before the distinction between the classes in railway carriages will have disappeared. No doubt, there will continue to be special facilities afforded for the invalid and the duke in Pullman and drawing-room cars, and so forth. But the gradual decay of first and second-class traffic will inevitably drive the most aristocratic of Companies into abandoning a distinction which is no longer needed. The spectacle of three or four carriages in the middle of the train standing empty, while the rest are crowded to suffocation, is one which neither the public nor the railway officials themselves will long put up with. The Democracy will be as triumphant in railway as in national administration.

To turn for a moment to another matter, it is amusing, in the face of this Report, to hear the doleful laments which are sometimes sent forth on behalf of railway shareholders at the way in which they toil for the public, and yet get kicks instead of halfpence. The halfpence are forthcoming in a very plentiful supply. The ordinary rate of interest on capital in this country may be taken at 4 per cent. Of the total 283 millions of ordinary Railway capital, 198 millions receive dividends at the rate of more than 4 per cent.; while 138 millions receive more than 5 per cent., some of it receiving even 17½ per cent. It is true that 43 millions receive nothing, but 11 millions of this is represented by the unfortunate Chatham and Dover; and as 22 millions of new capital were created during the year, a large portion of the deficit is probably made up thereby. But that is not all. There are nearly 200 millions of guaranteed and preferential and debenture capital which receive more than 4 per cent., with 200 millions more which get 4 per cent. Moreover, it must be remembered that a great deal of this latter class of capital is due in past years to "a swelling of nominal capital in conversion operations," the ordinary shareholders often getting an increase of nominal capital without having to put their hands into their pockets, the amounts paid on this additional capital going really to swell the income on the previous capital. As the security of the Railway Companies, with their firmly-entrenched monopolies and certain prospect of increment with the increment of the country, is greater than that of a mortgagee of landed property, the Railway capitalist cannot justly, it would seem, be held up for our sympathy and compassion as a down-trodden being, whom a hard taskmaster robs of his wages. If Sir Edward Watkin and those of his kidney would set themselves more earnestly to the performance of their duties to the public, and let the railway shareholders' privileges take care of themselves, they would do far more than any association to protect and benefit their clients.

PROFESSOR CAYLEY'S ADDRESS.

THE Address of Professor Cayley, President for the year of the British Association, will not be much discussed, either in print or in society. Not many can descant on landscape as seen from five miles of altitude in air. Of the very few persons completely qualified to form an opinion on the merits of the address, only four or five could throw that opinion into a "popular" form,—by which, in this instance, we mean a form intelligible to the educated;—and they would think the labour almost thrown away. They would as soon explain to telegraph "operators" the mathematics of electricity. To the remainder of English mankind, the address will, we fear, be a sealed book, or rather, an intellectual puzzle at which they may be tempted to try, but the interpretation of which they know while they are trying is hopelessly beyond them. Metaphysics are to many minds repellent, and there are people otherwise intellectual to whom theology seems not only tasteless, but innutritious; but no speculations overawe and, so to speak, alarm the ordinary mind like those of the pure mathematician, when he reaches the point at which reason would not aid him, but for the light imagination throws. It is not dislike which is felt, far less contempt, but an uncomfortable awe, quite separate in kind among mental emotions, and arising, as we conceive, from a suddenly generated and distressing conviction that the hearer or reader lacks positive mental powers which other minds, no doubt exceptional, but still quite human, evidently possess. Ignorance of science is not in itself disconcerting, but there is positive discomfort among men ordinarily intelligent, but not fit to be Professors, when they hear a man of whose right to say so they cannot doubt declare that he can conceive of sentient beings living in space of one dimension, in a pure line. They know they cannot conceive it, and feel as if a geological "fault" in their minds, a want, a kind of idiosyncrasy, had been revealed to them. This does not generate repulsion exactly, but awe so near to it that even Professor Cayley perceived it, and, with humorous cruelty, declared that in some cases "a Meeting was the individual which, in the process of evolution, must be sacrificed to the development of the race." So he sacrificed his meeting with a clear conscience, and, it must be confessed, with a completeness which left nothing to be desired. When the Professor ended, listeners' headache must, for all his lucidity of expression and careful explanation of his terminology, have been prevalent even among the mathematicians scattered amidst that audience.

But though the Address cannot be discussed, the wisdom of the Association in arranging for its delivery will, and that not in amiable terms. It will be said that, although the object of most of the papers read in the meetings of the British Association is "the advancement of Science," the use of the President's Address is a different one; that his duty is to review progress over as wide a field as he can, to indicate the line of scientific advance, and to interest the people of Great Britain in scientific inquiry. His business is to secure an audience for science, or rather to extend the audience, not to narrow it by an address the main effect of which upon its hearers was to create an impression that scientific speculation was too lofty an occupation for any but exceptional powers. "Popularisation" is a horrible phrase, but if the end of the Association is not the popularisation of science, what, it will be asked, is the use of its popularising machinery? Why does it summon all mankind to attend, and why allow those discussions, which in the main must be the comments of the half-instructed upon the views of selected experts? The Association surely would not allow the ablest man of science in Europe to deliver the President's address, if he could or would only talk in an unknown tongue, or a tongue the grammar of which was known, and that but imperfectly, only to one section; and that is practically what Professor Cayley did. He spoke, and spoke admirably, of high mysteries, but in language so little known, that the vote of thanks proposed must have sounded a little comic, like a vote of thanks from an assemblage of deaf mutes, with a partially deaf man seated here and there, to some great pianist. It will be said that the greatest opportunity given to Science during the year, the one day when her advocates are sure of a page in the Times and the ear of the world, on most days closed to her disciples, is wilfully, almost perversely, thrown away. The Association will be adjured to return to common-sense and the "practical," and in future to confine the chair to men who can hold an audience rapt, or induce all Britain to consider their thoughts, if only for the day.

The objectors have much to say for themselves, and will, we suspect, prevail; and yet those who listen to them, if not they themselves, are conscious that a fallacy lurks in their plausible rebukes. Carry out their view logically, and the greatest men in Science could never be selected as Presidents of the year, or, being Presidents, must be prohibited from talking to the meetings of the deepest truths or loftiest speculations they have come across in their researches. Such truths, such speculations, must constantly be so far in advance of those attained by the majority as to be scarcely intelligible to them; and even sometimes must, as in this case, be altogether beyond their intellectual grasp. So is the idea of Space beyond the grasp of children, yet how teach astronomy without assuming the idea of Space? To limit the utterance of such speakers is to exclude truth, to proscribe knowledge, to deprive teaching of its highest effect,—that disciplining and strengthening—why have we not the word "nervating"?—strain which it produces on those who stand but just short, yet not far short, of the teacher's stand-point. If Professor Cayley so excites or so illumines the mind of one mathematician that he is induced to redouble exertion, and to carry the torch still farther onward, more is done for mathematics, and therefore for science generally, than would be done by years of lectures productive only of mental titillation, or of those "discussions" which are, for the most part, only mellifluous expressions of gratified wonder. The pain—for it is pain—that such a lecture causes to an audience is not injurious pain, but bracing pain, making those who even partially understand the stronger and more ardent. Those who understand may be few, but the Association cannot seek breadth of audience, for if it did, its Presidents could never utter any but "things easy to understand," and could never lift their hearers nearer to the light at all. The utmost it can do is to select the ablest man in any subject, and be sure that in the address he delivers there shall be no obscurity, and of obscurity no one who understands accuses Professor Cayley. It is with science as with learning,—the clearness of the learned will not always make them intelligible. An Association for the advancement of Oriental learning would be very foolish, if it refused its chair to a Sinologue of the highest knowledge, because when giving forth what he knew, he must perforce be unintelligible to the mass of English mankind, and unprintable besides. He might, nevertheless, be stirring up minds which, though far less advanced than his own, were competent even more than his own to extract out of Chinese learning all the good it contains. As to the injury done to the Association by the unpopularity of such an address, we do not believe that it occurs. Men never quite dislike what they respect, and the old woman's submissive answer when asked if she understood the sermon, "Wad I hae the presumption?" expresses the most general of mental conditions. The frivolous do not read the "heavy" articles in the Quarterlies, but they think they ought to be there, and respect the managers the more. The real danger of the Association is not that of allowing its Presidents to soar beyond their audiences' mental ken, but of tempting them to indulge in "popular balderdash," in so-called "eloquence," or in those foolish appeals to the lust for wonder which are the instruments of charlatans. It is well that Englishmen should be reminded now and again that progress in science involves hard thinking, even though during the lesson a few of their heads should ache with half-angry bewilderment, and the consciousness that they are hopelessly out of their depth. This time, at least, no one can accuse the President of tickling the ears of anybody.

IS GOULDSTONE SANE?

THE attempts which are being made to induce the Crown to commute the sentence of death passed on William Gouldstone, for the murder of his five children, into one of detention at Broadmoor during her Majesty's pleasure, forms a curious illustration of the perverse conventionalism which so often misleads the popular judgment of a great crime. The state of Gouldstone's mind was most carefully investigated at the trial, and it is no exaggeration to say that the evidence adduced to prove his alleged want of sanity was not worth a straw. It was shown, indeed, that his mother and her sister had suffered from protracted fits of "despondency," under which the former had more than once attempted her life, and that his second cousin on the father's side had been confined in a madhouse for sixteen months. His employer, again, while admitting that he knew nothing of him personally, declared that the "general feeling" among his fellow-workmen was that he was insane. Beyond the fact, however, that Gouldstone had committed an exceptionally atrocious crime, the only evidence which the workmen who were called could give to account for this "general feeling" consisted in two or three casual expressions on the part of the prisoner—described as a quiet, but "rather morose" man—of his wish for a painless and instantaneous death. The medical expert who examined him reported that he considered him "rather weak in his mind;" but it soon appeared that the only solid reason he could assign for his opinion was that the man did not "seem to appreciate the gravity of the crime with which he was charged." He declined to certify that the prisoner was suffering from any known mental disease, acknowledged that his conversation was that of a rational person, and believed that he knew the penalty of what he was doing at the time when he committed the crime. This last admission, uncontradicted by any other witness, and harmonising with all the proved facts of the case, was in itself sufficient to dispose of the plea of insanity as a legal defence. The jury, after an unusually brief deliberation, brought in a verdict of guilty, in which it is clear that the Judge entirely concurred. We do not understand that it is suggested that any evidence bearing on the prisoner's state of mind is forthcoming which was not produced at the trial, and it is abundantly plain that if the issue as to his sanity were to be raised afresh in some civil proceeding—if, for instance, the question had to be determined whether he was competent to enter into a contract or to make a will—no jury would hesitate for a moment, upon the materials which we have summarised, to pronounce in favour of his mental capacity. The indisposition to regard Gouldstone as a responsible agent is not, however, to be explained merely by the fact that he has been sentenced to die for an unusually shocking offence. Doubtless, both the instinctive sentiment which shrinks from the supposition that any human being whose will was not utterly distorted by disease could plan or perpetrate so unnatural a crime, and the growing horror of the punishment of death, which supplies ready-made supporters for the wildest theories of the mad-doctors in capital cases, have had a powerful influence upon the people who have convinced themselves, and who are now seeking to convince the rest of the world, that the murderer must have been insane. But the real reason for the agitation against Gouldstone's sentence lies rather deeper than this, and is to be found in the inability, which so many of us show when we are confronted with unusual manifestations either of heroism or of depravity, to escape from the domination of the conventional maxims and the rules of thumb which are justified by our ordinary experience. A man of good character and inoffensive habits, not the least addicted to drink, regularly employed, and in fairly good circumstances, returns home at the end of the day, and in the most matter-of-fact way, without passion or excitement, murders his whole family, drowning three of the children in the cistern, and hammering to death the other two at their mother's breast. What is the inference to which the instinctive judgment of mankind (supported in the present case, as the letters in the Times show, by the mad-doctors) is irresistibly led? Clearly, that the man could not have been in possession of his faculties. Habitual criminals whose whole nature has been twisted and warped not unfrequently commit motiveless crimes (rarely, however, murder). The quietest and steadiest of men, under the sting of sudden passion or the solvent of protracted wretchedness, lose their self-mastery, and, transformed for a moment beyond recognition, are guilty of enormities from which, as soon as done, they shrink back with loathing and dismay. But here—so say the correspondents of the Times—we have a purposeless crime, dictated by no intelligible motive, and carried out in cold-blood by a man of irreproachable antecedents. Unless, then, all our ordinary canons are at fault, we must fall back, they tell us, upon the insanity of the criminal, as the only hypothesis which adequately explains the facts.

But is there, when all the circumstances are taken into account, anything so mysterious and inexplicable in Gouldstone's crime that it can only be interpreted by the arbitrary supposition that a man who, admittedly till that moment, had always exhibited perfect sanity, was suddenly visited by an attack of mental disease? We think not, and we hold the opinion without for the moment adopting the position of either side, in the interminable controversy between the doctors and the lawyers as to what precise degree of intellectual infirmity ought to be deemed sufficient to exempt a man from penal responsibility for his acts. Gouldstone's crime appears to us to have been dictated by one of the commonest of motives,—revenge; and that it differed from other and more commonplace manifestations of the same passion was mainly due to the fact that he sought to avenge himself not on a particular individual, or in order to obtain satisfaction for a single wrong, but to defeat the invisible power of whose unappeasable resentment he conceived himself to be the victim. A sober, hard-working man, earning 25s. a week, he belonged to the upper stratum of the artisan class, who dread before all things being degraded to a lower level in the social scale, and who feel with a vividness and intensity which it is difficult for some of us to realise the insecurity of their future. He married, and in less than three years had three sons. He is described by those who knew him as having been always fond of his wife and children, but to a man with 25s. a week each new child is a perceptible drain upon the shrinking margin of his resources, and a prospective burden of incalculable weight. It is clear that Gouldstone, a "morose" man, reflecting on his own position and comparing it with that of others, seeing his family increase as he thought with preternatural rapidity, while his wages remained stationary, and the struggle to keep up to the standard of respectability in externals, on which men of his class set so high a price, grew every year more difficult, gradually convinced himself that he had become in a special sense a target for the malignity of Fortune. The precise case is an unusual one, though an American poisoner a few years ago confessed that she murdered her children for this very reason; but the feeling that a man is being slowly hemmed in and hunted down by a pitiless destiny is common enough, and is one of the most frequent sources of the temper out of which criminal designs are born. The very invisibility of the power against which he is matched, the blind arbitrariness of its successive strokes, the impersonal and motiveless cruelty with which it dogs his steps, fills the victim with a bitterness of resentment and an implacable determination to avenge himself such as could hardly be aroused by the persecution or injustice of a fellow-man. Imagine this to be the temper to which, by brooding over his fancied wrongs, and constantly counting up his score against Providence, Gouldstone had attained, when little more than a year after the birth of his third son he became again a father, and this time of twins. From that moment, as we read the evidence, he abandoned all hope that the fate, which he now saw was plainly determined to crush him, would relent, and be satisfied with the sacrifices it had already exacted; and he began to concentrate his mind on the formation of some plan which would at once frustrate the designs of his unseen enemy, and gratify his own long-hoarded passion for revenge. During the week which followed the birth of his children, he was twice the worse for drink; on the Saturday, he absented himself from the annual bean-feast of his fellow-workmen; the next three days he wandered about, and on the Wednesday afternoon he returned home and murdered his five children. He gave himself up without a struggle to the police, explaining to them that he "thought it was getting too hot, with five kids within three and a half years," and that he "thought it was time to put a stop to it." He declared several times that he felt happy now, and that the children would be better off in heaven, if there were such a place, than if left to the mercy of the world. He was happy, because he felt that though he would "get the rope," he had come off victorious in the contest with his implacable adversary, and taken vengeance for the wrongs of years, by cheating of its prey the destiny whose set purpose was to drag down both himself and his children step by step into the abyss of poverty and wretchedness. Where are the symptoms of insanity in this man's conduct? Is it less rational to avenge oneself on a malignant but impersonal and irresistible foe by snatching from it its chosen victims, than by taking the lives of its innocent ministers? And if it is not, why should Gouldstone escape the hangman, any more than the Phoenix-Park assassins?

THE SCOTCH PROFESSOR OF TO-DAY.

AMONG the strenuous idlers of the season, there is always to be found a per-centage of intelligent, but sub-priggish persons, who haunt the sea-side resorts, and follow the beaten tracks of the Continent, mainly to hunt up what the Ferrols, in Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's "Louisiana," style "new types" of humanity. They are quite indifferent about ozone, they are too insincere to gush, although they are also too polite to yawn, over scenery that privately they think a bit of a bore. They are to be found, indeed, in the picture-galleries, but not because they love Rubens, or Raphael, or Paul Potter, but that they may hear what they term the "charming naïveté" of their neighbours' criticisms. They have their innings, however, at the six o'clock table d'hôte. They spend the dinner hour listening, and, if need be, "drawing," with a view to forming what it delights them to consider "estimates of character." Their holiday is a failure, they think, if at the end of a month or six weeks of table d'hôtes, they do not succeed in discovering a "new type," to share the honours and the chat of afternoon tea during the winter, with the new play at the Lyceum and the new novel by Mr. Henry James. This mania for "types" is, on the whole, a harmless one, although it produces a great number of long letters—the male "type"-hunter is, indeed, the only adult of his sex who writes long letters now-a-days—and leads too many cleverish women to write fiction of the Howells-and-water variety. There is one "type" which seems as yet to have escaped the social entomologist, although he can hardly be said to be new. He is now-a-days to be found anywhere and everywhere, in Oban and Bournemouth, in the Engadine and the Trosachs, in the Louvre or on the beach at Scheveningen. He has even leisure enough to go to Australia, via San Francisco, and has been known to take advantage of it. He has a decided, though not obtrusive, personality. Several little things, such as a weakness for appearing in broadcloth at all times and under all circumstances, and a habit of pausing and reflecting before answering a question, mark him out as holding a place midway between the layman and the clergyman. Some of the younger men of this "type," indeed, are said to affect modern ways, to smoke cigarettes, play lawn tennis, worship Miss Ellen Terry, and even on occasion to throw off a triquet. But the majority of them are distinguished by an agreeable old-fashionedness. The crape on their hats may be too deep; their hair may be too long for these "prison crop" days; in talk they may not be able, after the fashion of the hour,

"To slip from politics to puns,
To pass from Mahomet to Moses."

But if you get behind the superficialities of a mere table d'hôte acquaintance, you find in them genuine culture, genuine knowledge of things, and even of men; above all, a gentle humour, and an Emersonian serenity that sit well only on men who have attained that easy competence which abolishes the "English hell of not getting on," without costs. Why has not Mrs. Oliphant included a full-length portrait—no mere vignette or "side-face"—of the Scotch Professor in her National Gallery, and so saved him from the all too "instantaneous photography" of the holiday-"type"-hunter, which is sure to mark him for its victim one of these days?

The sword of doom is reported to be hanging over the large fees, if not also over the short sessions, of the Scotch Professors. The Bill for handing over the Universities North of the Tweed to the tender mercies of an Executive Commission, which had to be abandoned this year, will, we are told, be brought forward again next Session. With any such measure or prospect, however, we are not now concerned. Besides, it may be doubted if any Government or any Executive Commission will impair or "reduce" the material prosperity of the Scotch Professor; what it may take away from him in fees it will surely give back in direct endowment. What that material prosperity exactly is may be gathered from a little Parliamentary paper giving the emoluments and pensions of the "Principals, Professors, and other Officers, in each of the Scottish Universities," which was published shortly before the Session closed, and which has in consequence received no attention. Some of the figures contained in this Return throw a certain amount of light on the amount of oatmeal on which Scotch Professors cultivate their different Muses. Of the thirty-nine Professors by whom Edinburgh University is manned, eighteen, or nearly a half, are in receipt of upwards of £1,000 a year. Of the eighteen, five are in receipt of upwards of £2,000, the income of one—the Professor of Anatomy—being £3,280. Latin, Greek, and Mathematics are to a University course very much what the Three R's are to an elementary one. The incomes of the Professors of these three subjects in Edinburgh were, in 1882-1883, £1,540, £1,347, and £1,481 respectively; and it may be added that one of these teachers is thirty-two and another thirty-three years of age. The poorest Professorial income in Edinburgh University is £242, the recipient being the Professor of History. Glasgow University has twenty-eight Professors; ten are in receipt of upwards of £1,000, and three of upwards of £2,000 a year. The incomes of the Professors of Latin, Greek, and Mathematics are even larger than those of their Edinburgh rivals, being respectively £2,163, £1,854, and £2,068; no one of these Professors is over 50 years of age. The smallest Professorial income in Glasgow is £403. Passing to Aberdeen University, we find fewer "prizes" in the way of incomes. Of 23 Professors, only one, the Professor of Anatomy, has upwards of £1,000 a year, his income for 1882-1883 being £1,440. Yet the lowest Professorial income is £355, and the teachers of Latin, Greek, and Mathematics earned last year respectively £952, £951, and £872. The poverty of St. Andrew's University has passed into a proverb. The highest Professorial income in 1882-1883 was £620; and one Professor received only £135. A St. Andrew's Professor is not on an average paid any better than the chief teacher in an elementary school of the best class, and he is not paid so well as a third-class clerk in a Government office, or a young man who has attained the second grade in what Mr. John Morley pleasantly styles "the hierarchy of trade." But we are informed in this Return that "the incomes of the Principal and Professors of the United Colleges have suffered diminution from agricultural losses during the last five years; and while they have begun again to improve, the likely incomes in the future are not adequate or fully represented by the Return." In any case, the poverty of St. Andrew's is such a scandal, that, as is universally allowed, either it or the University itself must be extinguished; and in the meantime, it would be absurdly unfair to judge of the position of Scotch Professors by St. Andrew's incomes. When any one of their number becomes too old or infirm to perform duty, a pension is within his reach. Edinburgh and Glasgow have each an Emeritus Professor of Greek; the pension of the one is £368, of the other, £362. Two retired Professors have pensions of upwards of £1,000 each.

The position of the Scotch Professor of the present day may have its disadvantages and drawbacks, and it is possible that he may have to part with a portion of his income to pay assistants, though the fact is not brought out in the Parliamentary Return from which we have quoted. But it may be doubted if there is a more enviable post than his in the British educational, or perhaps even in the professorial world. As a rule, he is engaged for not more than six months of the year; he has practically the whole of spring, summer, and autumn to himself. He does not, under ordinary circumstances, teach above two or three hours a day. When he has mastered the routine of his class, or written out a course of lectures on his subject satisfactory to himself, even the work he has to perform becomes to a large extent routine. The English don may have as large an income, but then he has to work much harder for it, and he is burdened with the supervision of Undergraduates, from which a Scotch Professor is absolutely free. The Professor in the modern "college" of the Manchester or Birmingham type may have almost as much leisure and freedom, but he has not nearly so large an income. The earnings of a Scotch Professor are not, of course, to be compared with those of a highly successful barrister or medical man. But his position secures him power and social consideration at least equal to theirs. He is his own master; his appointment is ad vitam, aut culpam; when he becomes old or his health fails, a by no means despicable pension, added to his own savings during his years of activity, relieves his declining days of what his countrymen style "worldly care." If he does not choose to travel, and so to lay himself open to the wiles of "type"-hunters, he may make substantial additions to his income or his reputation, or both, by engaging in literary or other work. The Medical Professors notoriously consider their college earnings as only "the basis" of their incomes, while the names of lay Professors attached to each of the four Northern Universities who have distinguished themselves either in general literature or as specialists are happily so numerous at this time, that it would be invidious to mention any of them.

It is, however, the social agreeableness of the Scotch Professor's life that makes it so enviable. Even in these days of intellectual centralisation in London, a Northern University town is a very pleasant place to live in; and its Professors may spend half the year in London, if they choose. It is the Professors that perpetuate the old literary traditions of Edinburgh. It is the Professors that uphold the supremacy of sweetness and light, amid the hurry and strain of commercial life in Glasgow and Aberdeen. The wealthy and sagacious Scotch burghers appreciate their Professors, who are, as a rule, of themselves, if not of "the people" in a still humbler and more democratic sense. No Scotch dinner of the more ambitious sort in a University town is considered complete, unless at least two Professors are present at it. Then what town could a scholar, provided he had fair remuneration for his labour, prefer to St. Andrew's, Dean Stanley's "mine own St. Andrew's"? It has long been the Oxford of Scotland; only some forty miles from Edinburgh, it will soon become the Eastbourne of the North as well. Even a quarter of a century ago, a gazetteer said that "its excellent educational establishments and convenience as a watering-place make it an eligible residence for a highly respectable population." Now, what with the Bay and the boarding-schools of St. Andrew's, its golf and its gossip, its "links" and its learning, its modern "salubrity" on week-days, and its mediæval solemnity, tempered by the polished prettinesses of the Rev. "A. K. H. B." on Sundays, this "highly respectable population" is becoming a highly refined and even fashionable one of the best marine order. The Professors of the University contribute to it just that academic aroma which is required to make the charm of the whole firm and good. The boast that in Scotland there is one University to every million of the population, while in Germany there is one to every two millions, and in England there is one to every six millions, may in the future, as in the past, be warranted by reliable statistics. But Scotsmen must expect that the gates of their Professorial paradise will be the more eagerly assailed by outsiders, the more its charms become known.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

AN ITALIAN'S VERSION OF "HARK, MY SOUL."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Anent the statement made by Mr. Gladstone in the present number of the Nineteenth Century, to the effect that the hymn, in our sense of the word, is almost unknown to the Italian language, it may interest some of your readers to know of an attempt made some years ago by an Italian to render for his countrymen some of our English hymns. In 1857 there was published at Turin a small book, called "Inni Cristiani," with the object, as the writer states, of "furnishing the Christians of Italy with a collection of devotional hymns, for use in public and in private." The book, which was published anonymously, was the work of Count Tasca, an ardent Italian patriot, who, besides these translations, wrote some original hymns in Italian, and some spirited patriotic songs. His estate of Seriate, near Bergamo, was for some time occupied by the Austrians, and he himself obliged to live in exile; but, under Victor Emmanuel, he was restored to his home and possessions, and, further, held some post under the Italian Government. He was a hearty admirer of the English, among whom he had many warm friends.

The "Inni Cristiani" consists of translations of English hymns; and among them is the one translated by Mr. Gladstone, "Hark, my Soul," which I copy, for such of your readers as may care to compare the two translations. It will be noted that while the English translator has endeavoured to preserve the metre of the original, only departing from it in the use of dissyllabic rhymes, the Italian has allowed himself greater liberty.

The latter, probably following some mutilated English version, omits the last verse of the hymn.—I am, Sir, &c., R. I. O.

"Odi, alma mia! Ve' 'l tuo Signore! è desso!
 Del Redentor la voce udir non brami?
 Odi oï che Gesù ti chiede Ei stesso:
 'Povero peccator, dimmi se m'ami?
 I rotti ceppi tuoi son l'opra mia;
 Le tue membra io sanai piagato e rotte;
 Te smarrito io riposi in sulla via,
 Ed in giorno per te cangiai la notte.
 D'una madre l'amor fia che mai cesse
 Verso il bambin ch'ella portò nel seno?
 Ma s'anche il figlio ella scordar potesse,
 L'affetto mio non mai ti verrà meno.
 È immutabil l'amor che in me si serra;
 Sublime più che i più sublimi in cielo,
 Profondo più che i più profondi in terra,
 Forte così che sfida il mortal gelo.
 Presto otterrai della Mia gloria il dono:
 L'opra compita della grazia, lo stesso
 Del ciel con te divider voglio il trono:
 Povero peccator, di', m'ami adesso?'"

THE LIBERAL PARTY IN MANCHESTER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A more miserable surrender than that which has just been made by the leaders of the Liberal party in Manchester to the Tory candidate has seldom been known, certainly never in my knowledge in Manchester. The Manchester leaders get old, and want changing now and then. And money for an election is not easily found, at present. These are the chief reasons. But another is, what to do with the third Liberal Member at the next election. We cannot carry three seats. The talk about only two Sessions to run in the present Parliament, and about the etiquette of allowing the minority Member to retain his seat, are only after-thoughts of men who have not got strong arguments to support the conclusion they had come to, not to fight. The Pankhurst difficulty is of the same nature. Dr. Pankhurst will take the Irish vote from Mr. Houldsworth, and weaken him as much as he will weaken the Liberals. And we have the Doctor always with us. The crowds outside the Reform Club last night showed how Liberals felt. If we were a small borough, a volunteer could easily step in and win the seat for Gladstone. The thing is not in the least impossible even in Manchester.—I am, Sir, &c., Manchester, September 18th.

THE NEW PATENT LAW.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your article on the new Patent Law, I notice one or two slight inaccuracies. The present stamp duty on provisional protection is £5, not £25, as stated; and the amount payable to Government for the first three years £25, not £75. The Bill is not such a godsend to patentees as would at first sight appear, as it is no part of the examiner's duty to see that the patent is valid, but simply to prevent the patentee claiming more than one invention under one patent; to practically force him to largely disclose the nature of his invention in his title; to define his invention strictly in his provisional specification, and so leave less room for enlarging upon it in his final specification; to interfere to prevent him claiming any more in his final specification than the examiner (probably a man ignorant of the science to which the patent relates) considers justified by the provisional specification (leaving him the option of submitting or of instituting an expensive appeal); and lastly, to see that the Office rules have been complied with. Again, while there is rather more opportunity by the new law to correct accidental errors, and to make disclaimers, nothing approaching the American system of reissuing is allowed, no new claim or enlargement of an old claim is permitted, and no damages can be given for infringements made before the correction, "unless the patentee establishes to the satisfaction of the Court that his original claim was framed in good-faith, and with reasonable skill and knowledge,"—a clause that will probably be generally construed by Courts to mean, "unless his complete specification was settled by a patent agent or counsel." Again, whereas now an inventor has practically a monopoly, and can decide himself what is a fair royalty, and who is to be trusted as a licensee, under the new law he will be obliged to license rival manufacturers on terms that an official of the Board of Trade may consider fair,—in other words, if the invention turns out a failure, the inventor bears all the loss;

if it proves a success, he cannot work it as he would consider most advantageous to himself, but must license it on terms which another man decides as equitable, to manufacturers whose interest it may be—probably will be, in many cases—to spoil the reputation of the new invention, in favour of the manufacture for which their plant is specially adapted. This they can easily do, by flooding the market for the moment with badly-made specimens of the patented invention; and this is what many unscrupulous or careless manufacturers will do, unless special rules be yet made to prevent it (and a mighty difficult business that will be).

By the present law, an inventor need not disclose the full details of his patent until he gets a patent; by the new law, he is obliged to do this, with the chance of being successfully opposed, and of never getting a patent at all.

The only real, substantial advantages a patentee obtains under the new law are, the first cost is greatly lessened, the after stamp duties are practically lightened, and racing for the seal, to avoid or take advantage of the flagrant injustice exemplified in the case of Bates and Redgate is abolished. The increase in duration of provisional protection is hardly an advantage, as it also increases the period of uncertainty and risk.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE IMPROVEMENT OF EGYPT.

SIR,—In your recent issue, you allude to the sufferings and delays caused by the present state of transition in Egypt,—of transition, we may fairly call it, from the Asiatic to the European manner of government. Now, it is only too true that some of these sufferings have been increased by our over-caution in the matter of assuming responsibility. The English nation has shrunk from boldly claiming a "protectorate," has weakened itself for good on the banks of the Nile by a well-meant endeavour to avoid the unavoidable. This is quite consistent with our national character and past history. We are singularly slow to accept the logical consequences of our success in foreign expeditions. But is it fair to assume that the Egyptians are any worse off on account of this English hesitation? I do not deny that they might be better off, if we did our duty more boldly. Many improvements might be rapidly carried out which now take a long time to achieve. But are our Egyptian allies any worse off than they would have been if left to themselves? It may seem so to earnest and active-minded men on the spot, who become impatient at every foolish blunder and delay, when reform and good government seem so near and so easily within reach. But would the natives of their own motion have made any reforms at all, or wished for any better government than that which their fathers had experienced? If they would not, as seems most likely, then the English are only postponing an opportunity for doing good, and not doing any great harm. Matters will drag on, with disappointing slowness, it may be, until the mere fact of the Egyptian Administration being almost entirely in English hands gives us as much influence for good as a nominal and acknowledged "protectorate" could do. I have never thought it possible for us to withdraw from the country altogether, because of the troubles that would be sure to arise between the Egyptians and their foreign creditors. But there are different ways of keeping our hold on Egypt, and the system which is now being tried seems to be the only one that our timid public opinion will sanction, for the present. What we must not forget, however, is that the native fears the reformer almost as much as he hates the usurer; and that whenever there is to be any strong pressure put upon Moslem prejudices, there must be English bayonets in the background to support our Anglo-Egyptians.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE HIGHER TRAINING OF WOMEN OF BUSINESS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—May I ask your help, and that of your readers, in making known a small movement now being undertaken in London? Its object is to procure the admission of women to an employment which we believe to be very suitable to them, but from which they have hitherto been almost entirely excluded:

namely, to clerkships in the upper mercantile offices. We propose by means of bi-weekly evening classes carefully to prepare a certain number of ladies for office-work generally, including book-keeping, and at the same time to establish a register of employers (merchants, warehousemen, &c.), who may be willing to admit women to their offices as clerks. By thorough training, and careful recommendation of our students (as well-conducted and thorough workers) to such employers, we hope to give the latter reason to be satisfied with their decision to employ women as well as men. The classes are held in the City, and the fees will be 1s. per evening. Any help, either in sending us suitable candidates, or in giving us the names of employers favourable to our cause, will be most welcome. All particulars will be furnished by Miss Franks, 23 Mortimer Street, W.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A. P. B.

P.S.—These classes are, I need not say, not in the least in competition with those of the excellent Society for the Employment of Women in Berners Street.

THE WORD "CUSS."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In a review of Skeat's "Etymological Dictionary," in the Spectator of August 11th, the reviewer ventures on a conjecture which is quite baseless, and to an American, ludicrously so. "Has not 'customer,' he inquires, "undergone similar curtailment also in the American cuss?" Now, beyond a shadow of doubt, the American cuss is the vulgarised form of "curse." It appears in a verbal form very frequently in vulgar speech,—e.g., "He is the greatest feller to cuss and swear that ever you see." The same spirit of humour which prompts Englishmen to describe fellow human beings as "poor devils," or "queer devils," prompts uneducated Americans to describe a man as a "mean cuss" (curse), or "a funny cuss," or "an odd cuss." The adjectival form of the word is also familiar,—e.g., "I had the cussedest" (or "the most cussed") "time in getting that mule to go." So, also, the adverbial form, "He is a cussedly stingy fellow."

I trust these citations from popular speech are sufficiently numerous to show that the reviewer is in error in imagining that "cuss" is an abbreviation of "customer."—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE CLOSING OF THE HIGHLANDS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In reference to your well-timed article on "The Closing of the Scottish Highlands," will you kindly allow me to announce through your columns the formation of a "Highland Land-law Reform Association of London, the object of which, when secured, will, it is hoped, open up the Highlands, not only for the benefit of Highlanders, but for the health-preserving enjoyment of all? The system which so ruthlessly expatriated the bulk of the native population, and drove the remnant to eke out existence on inhospitable, barren patches on the sea-shore, or to pine away in the slums of our great cities, is slowly but surely closing against health and pleasure-seekers the "land of brown heath and shaggy wood." As far as Highlanders are concerned, every effort will be made to effect such changes in the Land Laws as will prevent further encroachment upon their right to live and thrive in the land of their birth, and rectify the wrongs and mismanagement of a system which has scattered or crushed a brave soldier race, who in many a battle so bravely sustained the brunt on behalf of British honour.

The laws under which the few are permitted to rigidly preserve for deer and grouse large tracts of country that might be usefully employed in rearing sheep and Highland cattle, and on which large numbers of people now living on the borderland of starvation might be productively employed, require to be very radically amended. The appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the condition of the Crofters is a hopeful, though tardy, acknowledgement on the part of the Government that the condition of the Highlands is not satisfactory; and to those "who have eyes to see and ears to hear," there are not wanting signs that a social reform must ere long take place. A "Clearance Map of the Highlands," showing the districts depopulated, the boundaries of deer forests, grouse preserves, &c., which is being prepared under the auspices of this Association, will, it is hoped, be an accurate bird's-eye view of how the welfare of the people has been sacrificed to the interests of game-preservers. The general public, though less directly than

Highlanders, are interested in reforming the present system; and the object of this Association should, therefore, be generally approved, and receive the support of all interested in making the Highlands the home of a happy, contented people, and breathing-space for all, rather than, as at present, the sporting-ground of aristocrats.—I am, Sir, &c.,

DONALD MURRAY.

9 Bridge Street, Westminster, September 11th.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The letter of "G. K. H." in your issue of the 8th inst. requires a somewhat longer reply than the editorial note affixed to it. As a Scotchman, and one of those professional men to whom your article referred, who crave in their holidays for mountain air and exercise, I am deeply interested in "The Closing of the Highlands." As I have just returned from Braemar, perhaps you will allow me to say a word.

"G. K. H." stigmatises as a "strange inaccuracy" the statement in your article:—"Visitors at Braemar cannot obtain leave to cross the Dee during the shooting season, and only grudgingly at any time." In disproof of the statement, he goes on to say that there are five bridges in the twenty-four miles between Ballater and a little above the Linn of Dee. This would be a fair enough allowance, perhaps, if the bridges were available. "Two," he says, "are open to the public beyond dispute." If he is as intimate with Braemar as the "several seasons" he has passed there would argue, he must be aware that the other three bridges are just as much "beyond dispute" closed to the public. There is one available bridge about fourteen miles from Ballater, and another about twenty-four miles from Ballater; and that is all. And observe, these bridges are only in existence because the main road happens to cross the river where they are. But your correspondent adds:—"There is a good ford above Castleton of Braemar, available for tourists on foot or in carriages." I should like very much to know his definition of a good ford for foot passengers. I know one or two men who have crossed the Dee on foot at this point, when the water was exceptionally low. To ford the river with safety in an ordinary state of the water, and still more when the stream is swollen, one would need to practise the method common among our Celtic sires, when a dozen men would enter a river linked hand-in-hand and fight their way across, on the principle that not more than two or three of them were likely to be off their feet at the same time. But the dress in which they waded across long ago was probably better adapted for the purpose than the trouser or knickerbocker of our modern epoch. Could we get back the old freedom of the hills, we should be willing, perhaps, to face the risk and inconvenience of the old method of fording. But one does not care to come dripping and exhausted out of the bed of a river, to have an encounter with a gamekeeper on the further bank. So far from the ford above Castleton being available for foot-passengers, for the past ten days it has not even been available for carriages. I was on the Invercauld side of the river last week, and expected to get ferried across at some point, as a few years ago there was no difficulty in this. But after applying in vain to more than one possessor of a ferry-boat, I was obliged, in order to reach Braemar, which lay within two or three stone-casts, to trudge a weary seven or eight miles extra at the end of my day's walk. Having a wife at home and some other relatives, I did not feel inclined to try "G. K. H.'s" "good ford."

Your correspondent further gives a list of places of interest open to the public in the neighbourhood. It is not a very long list, when one reflects that it includes such places as Derry Lodge, which is ten miles away, and Ben Macdhui, which is twenty. Perhaps he would say whether Cairn Gorm or Cairn Toul are as open as their neighbour Ben Macdhui, or whether even Ben Macdhui is really open from the Spey side. Men have told me that in order to make the ascent from that side unopposed, they have had to start at one o'clock in the morning. Athletes who can ford the Dee in all weathers may laugh at muscular gamekeepers with rifles over their shoulders. But to us ordinary tourists, the active intervention of such persons causes a momentary sensation of dread. It is not always possible to get together on a day's notice parties of six or seven strong, like your friends on Ben Alder.

Doubtless, your correspondent's enjoyment of such places as the Colonel's Bed was enhanced by the sense of the watchful care which is taken of one, lest one should stray from the track. You have a pleasing feeling of having a gilly in personal attendance. It adds to the romance of the situation, as one goes along the desolate mountain-path, to feel that the scene in Scott's "Lady of the Lake" may be re-enacted on a small scale, and any

"Taft of broom give life
To plaided warrior armed for strife."

What a comfort that the Great Wizard was born a hundred years ago! Had he been on those solitary rambles of his which gave birth to lay and romance, in these enlightened days of ours, he would have been laid by the heels, and that halt of his considerably added to by some of those guardians of the hills whose authority the spirit of the young Borderer had dared to question.

In the days of our juvenile enthusiasm, we used to quote Scott's lines about "the land of brown heath and shaggy wood," and ask triumphantly,—

"What mortal hand
Shall e're untie the filial band
That knots me to thy rugged strand"?

But if things go on as at present, hands quite equal to this task will be found,—those of the game preserver and the gamekeeper.

It demands, perhaps, a special training to appreciate the sort of liberty which a Scotchman now enjoys in many parts of the wilds of his native land. The splendid licence which I have revelled in for a season or two wandering about the valleys and mountains of Tirol has spoiled me, no doubt, for the more ordered freedom of my own land. I had forgotten that I was no longer in the territory of one of the old despotisms of Europe, but under a Government which journalists like you facetiously assume to be a democracy.

I have talked jestingly of the fording of a rapid Highland stream, but there is another side to it. "The mountain and the flood" are apt to claim their melancholy list of victims, as Braemar knows this season only too well. I cannot help recalling the most memorable incident of my visit to Braemar four years ago, when a young Englishman, the member of a reading party, was drowned crossing the Tilt, at what, by parity of reasoning, I suppose "G. K. H." would call "a good ford." It was in going along a public footpath that the young man met his death, but the proprietor doubtless objected to its being too public, and the bridge had disappeared. Perhaps we must wait till a corpse is carried down past Castleton of Braemar, before we obtain decent facilities for crossing the Dee.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

"GRASS OF PARNASSUS."

O HAPPY singers, and happy song,
That had never a pang of birth,
When first in the human heart grew strong
Earth, and the wonder of Earth!

Had I, too, lived when the Earth was young,
Earth that is now so old,—
When Faith and Fancy were of one tongue,
That are aliens now, and cold;

Then half of fancy, and half of faith,
I had woven, fair flower, for thee
A dream-like legend of love and death,
To match thy purity.

For not the drooping flower by the stream,
Nor the flower that is written with woe,
To the Earth has lent a lovelier gleam,
To the heart a holier glow.

But now I should mock thy loveliness,
Or do thee despite, fair flower,
By a fable fashioned in antique dress,
As an actor tricked for an hour.

Rather I gather thee reverently
From thy place in the rush-grown sod,
And think, frail flower, were it only for thee,
I should know that God is God!

For if haply a power that was not divine,
Or the forces of earth or air,
Could have moulded matter to life like mine,
Or made thee a form so fair;

Yet only the God whom we love as Love
Could so have made me and thee,
That thou by thy simple beauty canst move
Such a world of love in me.

MR. SIDGWICK ON POLITICAL ECONOMY.*

MR. SIDGWICK'S name has become a full guarantee that the subject on which he undertakes to write will be one on which he has brought to bear all the powers of a singularly mature and reflective intellect. That he not only knows a great deal about every subject on which he writes, but that he also knows a great deal more than he writes, is the prevailing impression he leaves on the mind of any observant reader. And it is even possible to suspect that, of the two portions of his knowledge, that which he knows and writes, and that which he knows but does not write, the latter is not always the least valuable. For we cannot but think that Mr. Sidgwick's dread of dogmatism has almost become a fanaticism; and hence whatever he writes is so crowded with "qualifications" and "limitations," that his conclusions have much difficulty in making themselves heard amid the clamour of their subordinate exceptions. Essentially critical in his habit of mind, Mr. Sidgwick has been so accustomed to see difficulties almost everywhere, that he seems ill at ease, and even appears to us to be least successful, in any place where he does not find them. To dogmatism he objects—dogmatically. But in nearly everything else he hesitates in a way and to an extent that does but scant justice to his extensive resources of knowledge and vigorous as well as patient insight.

The exact position and aim of a work like this must, however, always be kept in mind, to correct any feeling at all akin to disappointment that we may be tempted to indulge in. His primary aim has been, according to his own account, to "eliminate unnecessary controversy." Hence, while the work makes no claim to originality, it is, on the other hand, "not precisely an elementary treatise." In the truth of the latter portion of this description we rest content. No one who fairly faces the task of mastering this book will call it elementary. Not only is the subject handled with an exhaustive thoroughness that must tax any reader—of which no sensible reader would complain—but the difficulties of Mr. Sidgwick's style are sometimes enormous; and these two causes combine to render this work almost as tough as the introduction to Hume's works by the late Professor Green, perhaps the most difficult piece of reading this century has produced. But in eliminating unnecessary controversy, we cannot think Mr. Sidgwick has had all the success he so well deserves. We will hereafter examine in detail some of the attempts made "to clear our conceptions,"—the phrase that with Mr. Sidgwick frequently introduces one of those investigations which, by their length, intricacy, and minuteness, tax to the utmost whatever clearness of conception his reader may have had to start with. But we venture to doubt whether our author's habit of mind is favourable to success in this task. Had Mr. Sidgwick found the fabled travellers disputing as to the green or blue colour of the chameleon, we do not think it would have occurred to him to seek for the animal, and decide who was right. He would have pointed out that between green and blue there is, after all, only the difference of a tint—not very much to quarrel about—and that, moreover, between a greenish-blue and a bluish-green the line is very difficult to draw. Now, this kind of treatment may be a good dialectical exercise, but we cannot think that it is calculated to produce in any science an advance at all in proportion to the ingenuity and industry displayed. The field may thus be cleared of lumber and the atmosphere of heat, for the benefit of other workers; but Mr. Sidgwick is so able and excellent a worker, that we feel a sort of grudge that he should be to some extent wasted on preparatory work. And though, in the presence of work of such high class we feel that our word "wasted" is really far too strong, we are perforce obliged to use it for the conveyance of the impression which parts of this book have left upon us.

But in some ways we can be even grateful that this mode of treatment should have been adopted, for the pains taken to clear the field have given us some very choice digressions from the line of strict economics. Thus, at the commencement of the chapter on the Definition of Value, we have some fruitful and important remarks on the true worth of the investigation of definitions generally. Mr. Sidgwick points out there that the reward of search for accurate definitions is not the definitions themselves when found, but the knowledge of the thing implied in the finding of its definition. "While we are apparently aiming at definitions of terms, our attention should be really fixed on distinctions and relations of fact." In a word, it is not the finding but the seeking that is of value. And the real function of definition should be not to find a meaning for a word, but to apply a word consistently to a definitely realized set of attributes. This, of course, is no new theory, but it is both admirably stated and judiciously placed.

Judged, however, by its actual results, we are not able to congratulate ourselves on the very great success of this book in removing many difficulties of our own; and in some few instances we even find ourselves called upon to accept, by way of "clearer conceptions," conclusions which we regard as less true than those arrived at in the writings of other economists. Thus, when we are invited to consider the two meanings of the word value, as in the phrases "value in use" and "value in exchange," we conceive ourselves to be distinctly pointed in a wrong direction. The passion for reconciliation of differences which seems to be the moving motive of most of Mr. Sidgwick's work, induces him to try to find a single meaning for the word value which shall suit both these phrases. Mr. Sidgwick analyses thus:—

"What do we mean when we speak of a man setting value on, or attaching value to, things to which the idea of exchange is inapplicable, —whether this inapplicability be due to circumstances isolating the man, as, for instance, if we think of Robinson Crusoe on his island; or to the fact that no one else would buy the things, as in the case of old letters and other memorials, knowledge of various kinds, &c.? We do not, I think, mean exactly that the things are useful to him; though no doubt they are in a certain sense useful,—that is, they satisfy or prevent some desire which is, or would be, felt in the absence of them. But we mean that the man would, if necessary, give some thing to gain or keep them."

The italics are not ours, and they seem to us to emphasize an error,—another form of precisely the same error as that of Mill, who, in treating of value, has allowed himself to put the measure for the thing measured. If a foreigner asked an Englishman what was the meaning of the word "yard," the reply,—"My walking-stick is a yard," would obviously be true only in a very peculiar and limited sense; but it would be exactly as true as to say, with Mill, that the value of a thing means "the quantity of some other thing, or of things in general, which it exchanges for." And we cannot think that Mr. Sidgwick in any way strengthens Mill's definition by merely introducing the notion of a something which would be given, "if necessary," rather than part with the valued commodity; even though the nature of the something is left "quite indefinite." This Robinson-Crusoe aspect of value has been treated, we think, far more satisfactorily by an economist in whose disparagement Mr. Sidgwick makes his nearest approach to dogmatism. Professor Bonamy Price, in his Practical Political Economy, says,—"Of the first kind [unsaleable but valuable articles] was Robinson Crusoe's gun, which beyond all doubt he valued greatly." We do not think Mr. Sidgwick's investigation would have suffered in either gracefulness or accuracy, if he had acknowledged and more closely followed his predecessor's work in this particular instance, and had adopted, with a "qualification" he would have so well known how to introduce, the view of value held by Professor Price. He would then have told us that as a rule value is essentially subjective in the me, not commercial in the market, whether that market be actual or only potential. Professor Price holds that value "expresses a feeling, a sense of attachment, of affection for a thing, a caring for it, a desire to possess it, an intention more or less strong to retain it in possession." And we do not think that Mr. Sidgwick's position can stand for a moment against the effects of the investigation needed to complete the above explanation of Professor Price. For we may remark, that though to value a thing is very generally to desire its possession, it is not so always. We may value things which we no longer desire to possess. Two friends may each make us a present of the same book, at different times. One of the two copies is now a superfluity on our shelves, we no longer desire its possession; but yet, being a present, we value it far too much to sell it; we value it so much, that we shall probably give it away. This is no mere paradox; the exception is small, but real and important. The feeling of Value is not only independent of Exchange, it may be even hostile to the idea of exchange. Thus we obtain that the value of a thing is that feeling of esteem which we entertain for it, which very usually, but not always, prompts us to desire to obtain or retain its possession; and which, when so prompting us, is capable of measurement, within certain limits, by the quantitative incidents of exchange. We therefore hold that in reducing the idea of value to a central notion of giving something, Mr. Sidgwick has contributed rather to obscure than to enlighten this much debated point.

But though we are thus unable to follow Mr. Sidgwick's account of what Value is, we are glad to acknowledge the great ability and service of his investigation of its measurement. That real measure of value for different places and different times, which Mill declares impossible, and which Jevons thought could never be extricated from the maze of alternative considerations involved in the very nature of the problem, Mr. Sidgwick claims to have reduced to terms of "habitual consumption." To find out whether (e.g.) gold is cheaper or dearer now than twenty years ago, each man would have to answer the question for himself by reference to the amount a given quantity of gold would purchase, then and now, of the articles which he habitually consumes. This would answer the question for the individual; to answer it as a whole, the separate results would have to be calculated for all the individuals of the community, since the articles of habitual consumption would be different in different classes of that community. Thus, though Mill's statement of the impossibility of an absolute measure of value is shown to be theoretically too positively enunciated, yet for all practical purposes it remains as clearly true as ever; the more so, since habits of consumption are themselves liable to alter.

We are gratified to find that Mr. Sidgwick, when he comes to consider the nature of Wealth, is inclined to include under it services as well as material utilities. The hard and fast line that economists have too long drawn between these kinds of wealth has always in our idea been fruitful of needless and unphilosophical distinctions, and of perplexity where all should be plain. Mr. Sidgwick justly says, "There would seem to be a certain absurdity in saying that people are poorer because they cure their diseases by medical advice instead of drugs, improve their minds by hearing lectures instead of reading books, guard their property by policemen instead of man-traps and spring-guns, or amuse themselves by hearing songs instead of looking at pictures." With the acceptance of this view the distinction between productive and unproductive labour must, of course, fall, and another absurdity is done away with. Against this distinction we have long declared war. It makes a productive labourer of a man who bores and fashions a piece of wood and drills holes in it, and leaves unproductive the artist, without whom the flute so fashioned either remains a drilled stick, silent and tuneless, or, noisy but tuneless, becomes an instrument of torture. We find, therefore, with some disappointment, that Mr. Sidgwick after all considers himself bound to include material wealth alone under the term "Wealth," and in thus using language at variance with his own inclinations is almost driven into some small incongruities. For instance, we are told, on page 96,—"The 'produce,' therefore, of which we are to examine the variations must be conceived as something of which material wealth is the chief but not the sole constituent." Now, surely "produce" and "production" should be strictly correlative terms; yet we find on the next page,—"The production of a community, then, in our present view of it, may be defined as the adaptation, by the aggregate of its labour, of external matter, organic or inorganic, to the satisfaction of the aggregate of its wants." We do not see quite how these two sentences can be fully reconciled, even when the term "production" has been expressly extended so as to include the distributors as well as the actual makers of the commodities. For the one expressly includes what the other by implication excludes; and thus, since produce may be other than material, whilst production is confined to external matter, we are landed in the anomaly that there can be produce of which there has been no production. This is one case where words have been introduced into a definition with a view to its amplification, but really with the effect of unduly limiting it. Another similar case appears to us to be found in the definition of labour itself, which Mr. Sidgwick gives us thus:—"I include under the term labour all kinds of voluntary exertion, intellectual as well as muscular, which contributes directly or indirectly to the increase of produce, as above defined." Surely there are here several words too many. Why is labour to include only voluntary exertion? The word "voluntary" is in itself mysterious, and may, we admit, mean almost anything. But we should be surprised to find Mr. Sidgwick allowing to it a meaning that would render it applicable to the lash-exacted toil of a slave; and yet surely a slave "labours." And again, the voluntary exertion is to increase produce. But produce need not be material, whilst production must; so we have then some labour which is not production, but which increases produce. We submit that a shorter definition of labour not open to these objections could be found, thus,—"Labour is human exertion for a human end;" and even here we confess to a doubt whether something might not be gained by the omission of the word "human."

Even at the risk of appearing to confine ourselves too exclusively to the early portion of the work, we must notice another of Mr. Sidgwick's gallant attempts to obtain greater clearness in the elementary conceptions of economics,—namely, his investigation of Capital. There are passages in this chapter of such immense grammatical difficulty, that we have some diffidence in approaching the examination of its conclusions. But so far as we understand Mr. Sidgwick—and we have done our very best to understand aright—we find, with reference to capital, positions taken which we cannot share. The final account of what capital is, Mr. Sidgwick gives in these words:—

"It would seem, then, that the term 'capital,' as scientifically used, is not so much adapted to distinguish one portion of accumulated wealth from the rest, as rather to express an aspect which all such wealth presents—so far as it is produced and used with due regard to economy—up to the very moment of consumption; as being, namely, the intermediate results of labour employed for future utilities, which in some way or other are greater in proportion to the labour required for enjoying them, through the prolongation of the interval between the labour and the enjoyment." (p. 139.)

Now, we have it here laid down that "capital" is the name applied to one aspect of all accumulated wealth. This accumulation is explained on a previous page, thus:—"What is really accumulated is mainly the results of labour in the form of what we may call generally instruments to make labour more efficient, including under the notion of instruments all buildings used in production, and all improvements of land." Thus what has been commonly known as circulating capital is abolished altogether; and the articles consumed by labourers are expressly excluded from the category of capital, when it is laid down that not all the results of labour that are used to produce profit are to be called capital, but only such as would not exist in their present form, or not be used in their present manner except as a means to some further result. This is a treatment which has some obvious advantages; but it is difficult to consistently maintain. We are not, therefore, surprised that Mr. Sidgwick, speaking of the food, clothing, &c., consumed by labourers, says:—"There must always be a certain stock of such commodities, finished, but undistributed, which forms a part of the capital of manufacturers and traders; still, it is not this part of their capital that admits of being, in any important sense of the word, accumulated." Here, then, is wealth, incapable of accumulation in any important sense, which is to be called capital, a name which is, nevertheless, explained as applicable only to actually accumulated wealth. And when, in addition to this difficulty, we have to find for ourselves a clear meaning for the sentence about future utilities being in some way or other greater in proportion to the labour required for enjoying them, we confess ourselves not much aided to a clearer vision of what capital actually is.

But we must here leave the consideration of the attempts made to add precision and clearness to the elementary conceptions of the materials, so to speak, of the science. Those efforts are always admirable, in their fearless thoroughness and their keen acumen; and though we have pointed out where they seem to us to have failed, we have done so with a very full appreciation of the difficulties that have been faced, and of the equal capacity and honesty of intellect which Mr. Sidgwick has brought to bear on them. So earnest a seeker after truth will, we are sure, desire nothing better than a rigid examination of his positions; and if we have pointed out positions that seem weak to us, it is in the full belief that Mr. Sidgwick, should we have convinced him of the necessity, will be able to strengthen them.

Of the later investigations we must speak far too briefly for our own wishes. The subject of Rent is handled, as might be expected of a Cambridge economist, from Ricardo's point of view entirely,—for the emendations introduced into the historical portion of Ricardo's doctrine leave untouched its main position. The two forms under which the Ricardo theory is commonly stated, the hierarchy of fertilities and the successive doses of capital, are skilfully blended into one, and the theory itself is about as well stated as it is possible to state it. But we must confess that we should have gladly seen some reply to the criticisms of those who more or less impugn this theory. It has become quite a fashion with a large school of economists to go about saying that the Ricardo theory is "simply a fact," and refusing to it any real discussion at all. This departure from the truly scientific attitude receives sanction from Mr. Sidgwick, when he says of the statical theory of the actual determination of rent that it is "as incontrovertible as any part of pure economic theory can be." To say this without deigning any answer to the criticisms made on it by Thorold Rogers, and Bonamy Price—criticisms that come from different quarters, but are both formidable—is to make an error in a direction in which Mr. Sidgwick rarely errs. The main difficulty of the theory Mr. Sidgwick takes in his stride when he determines the normal rent of a farm as, "the surplus which the price of its produce would be expected to afford to a farmer of ordinary ability and industry, after subtracting the farmer's wages of management, together with interest at the ordinary rate on the capital employed by him upon the land." Now, what is this ordinary rate, and how does it come to be ordinary? And what regulates the farmer's wages of management? These questions are not difficult to answer; but we submit the Ricardo theory needs enlarging in order to answer them.

We have freely expressed our dissent from our author, and it remains to express also our great admiration. Many of the investigations in this volume are excellent; some most brilliant. Many other points that we admire we should like to mention, and on many others to break a lance. But we must take leave of this book now, with the expression of a hope that in many future editions it may grow to be even a yet worthier exposition of the economic views of this profound and vigorous thinker.

JOHN BULL ET SON ILE.*

DESCRIPTION is the compliment paid to peculiarity. The more marked, too, the features are, the easier it is to represent them. The danger in such a case is of producing a caricature instead of a likeness, and for a Frenchman in describing John Bull entirely to overcome this temptation was not to be expected. The writer of this book, however, has succeeded, at least partially, in his undertaking; but his success is due in much to the subject, and would have been greater had he been less inclined to be witty and epigrammatic. Exaggeration in Max O'Rell is not only "a lust of the blood," it is also "a permission of the will." He advises his compatriots never to sit down alone in the open air in London; never to speak to a woman of the lowest class; never to stay in a railway-carriage alone with a woman; all this for fear of being black-mailed. Further, he desires to be interesting, and is often prurient, as on pages 16, 35, 293, 307, &c.; and we believe that he calumniates French mothers, when he on page 33 represents them as being morbidly curious concerning the errors of their youthful sons. It were puerile in us to notice "these preposterous conclusions," were it not that this book contains the best description ever given of "John Bull" as he appears to an ordinary Frenchman. By John Bull the author means the average English bourgeois, and sketches him as "a large landowner, with muscular arms, with long, broad, flat, solid feet; with a jaw-bone of iron, which holds securely whatever it seizes upon." John, too, "is moral, and persuaded of the purity of his intentions and of the sacred character of his mission;" and, besides, "he is as obstinate as a mule." "English women are remarkable for their freshness, their frank and self-assured manners, and for the length of their feet. With such feet, a faux pas is impossible, for they cannot lose their centre of gravity. When they are pretty they are angels of beauty, but generally their faces are expressionless," &c.

In this nineteenth century photographers have taken the place of the artists of the past, and, as can be seen from these few extracts, Max O'Rell's picture of the Englishman is not more than a fairly good photograph. But for this very reason his remarks upon English manners and institutions are not without a certain interest. He tells us that "in English family life there is no intimacy, no free expression of the feeling; there is friendship, but little love." We fear that science here bears out Max O'Rell's statements. As external pressure increases or diminishes, so also does the cohesion between the units which make up the social organism increase or diminish. England is protected from external pressure by the sea; the ties which bind man to man are, therefore, looser here than elsewhere; there is more individuality, and life is poorer in affections. The author has then observed correctly when he notices the independence of English character, and speaks of "pride as being eminently an English virtue;" but when he goes on to say that when "one English woman walks lame all English women imitate her," he contradicts himself; dependence and servile imitation ought not to strike a Frenchman in England. His opinions, too, of English institutions give proof of some fairness. While speaking favourably of the Monarchy, he is no friend of the aristocracy and the House of Lords. "The existence of this House is an insult to the common-sense of the English nation." He sees that the aristocracy in England is giving place to the plutocracy, "qui dit noble, en Angleterre, dit riche." Nor does the nepotism of these institutions escape him:—"The Court is more German than English," and "other German Princes are made generals, admirals," &c.; besides, "The noble on his death-bed recommends his youngest children to a grateful country, which does not forget them." The unjust incidence of the poor-tax in towns and the corruption of the City Companies are both condemned by Max O'Rell as earnestly as by Mr. Frith himself. The flunkeyism shown by a part at least of the English Press to the powers that be attracts his attention, and he speaks of columns of platitudes of an abject servility. This, it may be said in passing, strikes Americans in the same way as it does Frenchmen. But, on the whole, Max O'Rell admits that in information and "news" the English paper is superior to the French one. He asserts, however, that its "articles" are vastly inferior to those written by French journalists. Now this may be due to Max O'Rell's taste, which certainly is a pronounced one. "The Times is an old, creaking weather-cock, which represents nothing but the interests of the great City bankers," for "the mass of the people do not read this old, envious, pedantic, and morose gazette." On the other hand, he has nothing but praise to give to Punch; "full of life and humour, it proves that it is possible to be both witty and refined."

Coming to our theatres, he says that "the Stage in England has, in the nineteenth century, fallen as low as possible." In proof of this assertion, he instances the realism of the Surrey Theatre, and speaks of a performance at Drury Lane as "sickening." "The only English theatre which can be called serious is the Lyceum," and "Mr. H. Irving, possessing as he does both talent and industry, is the best English actor, the only successor to the Garricks, Keans," &c. Max O'Rell explains this lamentable state of affairs by the fact that there is no national theatre in England,—no one like the Théâtre Français. Although an Anglomaniac might here retort that the répertoire of the Porte St. Martin is as hopelessly melodramatic as that of the Surrey, and that the pieces played at the Palais Royal are as disgusting as anything can well be, yet few thoughtful Englishmen will deny that the want of a National Theatre is a want in England keenly felt and deeply to be deplored.

While Max O'Rell gives but one chapter of his book to the theatre, he devotes six chapters to describing the part which religion plays in English life. "If piety," he writes, "consists in quarrelling about the dogmas, instead of in putting the principles of religion into practice, the piety of John Bull is unequalled." The conclusion of the whole matter seems to him to be that "the Frenchman makes a parade of his vices, and that the Englishman is the hypocrite of virtue." But not even when Max O'Rell couples "Salvationist" and dervish together does he go beyond what Mr. Matthew Arnold has already said on this subject. Only, Mr. Arnold sees much of what Puritanism has done for England; he can measure the vital force by virtue of which Protestantism exists; and all this Max O'Rell ignores, perhaps from malice prepense. Two statements of his should here be taken together. While asserting that "drunkenness alone cannot explain the savage brutality of the lowest class in England," he yet speaks of the district visitor—"the lady bountiful"—as a benefactor of the human race; and adds that "the charitable institutions and societies, the hospitals and workhouses of England are to be counted by hundreds." This seeming contradiction demands explanation. It may be asserted that, just as sensuality is the form of viciousness peculiarly French, so is brutality the distinctively English vice. If, in England, therefore, private and public charities are more numerous than elsewhere, if, in a people whose chief virtue is self-respect, and whose chief vice is savage ferocity, sympathy for the weak, the helpless, the outcasts, is not weaker than in other parts of the world, then an Englishman may be pardoned for assuming that these good works are distinctly the fruits of the religion of love. But Max O'Rell is determined to see in the "collection" the hinge upon which the whole matter turns. The austerities, absurdities, vulgarities, however, which can survive the amused badinage of Mr. Matthew Arnold are not, we fear, likely to succumb to such cheap contempt.

Concerning the state of education in England, Max O'Rell seems to speak with much fairness. "There is no Englishman who cannot and does not read," is a verdict of which the present generation may well be proud. As regards her common schools, England may now be classed, if not with Germany and America, yet surely with France and Italy; the blank ignorance of our lowest class can no longer be compared with that of the Russian monjik. The chapter upon middle-class education, or rather upon private boarding-schools, school agencies, &c., ought to be read by all those who wish to understand the full meaning of that oft-quoted verdict of Mr. Matthew Arnold that the middle-class education in England is the worst in the world. Of the English Public Schools and Universities, Max O'Rell speaks with praise,—perhaps with too much praise. We could wish that his statements were true, that indeed in the Public Schools there was "no such thing as advancement according to seniority, which is the premium given in France to stupidity." Although as regards this we may be slightly ahead of France, yet here, too, we are far behind Germany and Switzerland. Besides, there are some weaknesses peculiar to English nature which do not afflict other peoples, and which exercise a baleful influence upon English schools. "The hero of the English schoolboy," writes Max O'Rell, "is not the most intelligent boy in his class or in the school, but the quickest runner, the best athlete." Mr. Matthew Arnold has, too, already noticed that physical development is cared for too exclusively in English schools; is made an end, and not a means to an end. But Max O'Rell has directed attention not only to an arc, but to the whole sweep of this vicious circle, viz., to the want of respect for intelligence characteristic of all classes of Englishmen. Even "the English parvenu is far more insupportable than his like in France, because the Englishman has not, as has the Frenchman, a certain leaven of admiration and respect for knowledge and talent." We thank Max O'Rell heartily for having on page 72 of his book cited an after-dinner speech of a certain Lord Mayor, the arrogant bad-taste of which was mainly due to this conceit of—ignorance! What publicity can do to diminish this vice ought to be done. We much fear, however, that he who boasts of his lack of knowledge does so chiefly because he is certain to be respected for the length of his purse.

But if Max O'Rell is surprised by the vulgarity and assumption of the nouveaux riches in England, he is shocked by the brutalisation of the English lowest class. "Just as clean and neat," he writes, "as are the women of the middle-classes, just so ignoble and disgusting are the women of the lowest class." Their immorality astonishes even a Frenchman,—c'est de la chiennerie sauvage! He instances a file of "sandwiches" as the "saddest spectacle of human degradation,"—and did the degradation consist only in the savage brutality of the nickname, his remark would be justified. Here is the conclusion he comes to:—"London is, in truth, an ignoble mixture of beer and Gospel, of gin and Bible, of drunkenness and hypocrisy, of unheard-of filth and of measureless luxury, of misery and of prosperity, of the poor, who are hungry, cold, and cowardly, of the rich, who are insolent in riches and happiness, and whose annual revenue would seem to us a colossal fortune." Allowing for all exaggeration, there is yet enough truth in this indictment to give Englishmen pause. For this charge is brought against us not only by a solitary Frenchman, but also by observers of all nationalities,—by Germans, by Italians, and by Russians; it must sooner or later be faced and met.

One factor has been left out of the account by Max O'Rell. We do not feel inclined to blame him for not having attempted in this book to forecast the future of the English people, yet a description, even if it be scrupulously accurate, of actualities alone is apt to convey a wrong impression; a mask may be a good likeness of a dead face, it is certain to be a caricature of a living one. That drunkenness has much diminished of late years in England, and is still diminishing, even Max O'Rell must know. That the poor, both in town and country, will before long be rehoused, that middle-class education will at no distant period be undertaken by the State, are assertions whose truth no one questions. The high level of general comfort in France is due mainly to the results of the first Revolution, to the institution of peasant-proprietors; and whether as proprietors or as leaseholders under the State it cannot be doubted that, before many years elapse, means will be taken in England to assure to an ever-increasing proportion of the community the benefits arising out of property in land. In fact, it may be said, with the writer in the Fortnightly Review for September, that the aim of English statesmen is to make life worth the living for the tens of thousands to whom it is now hopeless misery. Every force in the England of to-day makes towards improving the condition of the lower classes of the people; in this aim, religion and science are agreed; all enthusiasms and all generousities are here at one with even the self-interest of the few. When all the influences for good, then, are summed up, the picture is by no means so gloomy as Max O'Rell would have us believe. But if he confines us rigorously to the present, forbidding us to seek consolation in the past, or to put hope in the future, then we shall be compelled to acknowledge that while "John Bull" has made all the virtues which have their root in stalwart self-respect peculiarly his virtues, yet "in respect for the rights of others, and in sympathy with the sufferings of others, he is deficient." "This ye should have done, and not left the other undone."

THE LIFE OF SAMUEL SHARPE.*

MR. CLAYDEN'S work, viewed in its literary aspect, is well done. He has had an abundance of good material, but it was material which needed a skilful setting-forth and arranging. This it has received at his hands, and we have as the result a remarkably interesting book, with which Mr. Sharpe's friends have, we should say, good reason to be satisfied.

We say this the more willingly, because Mr. Clayden, in discharging his function as a biographer, has made, we think, a very serious mistake,—the mistake of thrusting his own opinions upon his readers in an unnecessary and even offensive way. Mr. Sharpe was a convinced Unitarian; he was strongly opposed to what is called the orthodox creed, and to the formularies in which it is stated. But what need is there for his biographer to say, "Trinitarianism has always needed these paper bulwarks. It rests upon them. It perishes without them. The waves of free discussion speedily undermine its sandy basis"? This is, of course, very poor invective. Things do not rest upon bulwarks, and bulwarks of paper cannot keep off waves. But poor or not, it is a foolish and needless affront to a faith which an immense majority of Christians have professed, and which can show a matchless roll of saints and scholars. Mr. Sharpe, again, had no sort of sympathy with the Ritualism which is one of the developments of the Oxford movement. But it is beyond the province of the biographer to write of "Puseyism,"—"As a popular movement, it has become Ritualism; at its very best, a marriage of religious awakening to artistic revival; at its worst, 'a thing of shreds and patches,' a mixture of man-millinery and music; the attempt of feeble clerical minds to magnify their office." This chapter on Mr. Sharpe's contributions to the Inquirer gives occasion for the airing of not a few opinions which may or may not be just, but which certainly are out of place. We quite think that Mr. James Lowther is an "irresponsible politician," and his proposed duty of five shillings per quarter on wheat "a paltry bribe." But Mr. Sharpe does not appear to have said so. Why, then, does Mr. Clayden say it, à propos of an article written in the Inquirer forty years ago; and why does he go on to fall foul of Sir Edward Sullivan and Mr. MacIver, and "the sugar-boiling operatives of Bristol and the East End of London"? And now to pass on to the subject of the book.

The chief reason which makes the life of Samuel Sharpe well worthy of a record is to be found in its simplicity and sincerity and absolute devotion to duty. Seldom, indeed, have there been men who have so resolutely striven from youth to age "to scorn delights and live laborious days." Perhaps Mr. Sharpe was too great a scorner of delights, and so somewhat wanting in sympathy with fellow-creatures who could not pretend to be so wholly remote from the gayer and lighter side of life. It is possible to imagine that on occasion a man less dry, so to speak, and more genial, might have exercised a wider influence. Yet his fault, if fault it was, was but the exaggeration of a virtue rare indeed and genuine in an age which worships wealth, and the ease and pleasure which it gives. We seldom find anything in biography more truly admirable than the resolution with which the choice of accumulating wealth on the one hand, and of a life of ease and refined enjoyment on the other, he put aside both, to do what he conceived to be his duty. It will be best told in the simple words in which he himself recorded it:—

"I entered business, the youngest in the firm, with a very small capital. I saw at once that by the death of partners responsibility would always be growing upon me, and that it was my duty to live economically and to prepare for it by laying by money. When sixty years old my health failed, and I went out of business. Elder relations had left me money, and when I withdrew my capital and invested it I found myself possessed of — a year, with the habit of spending one-third of it, or less. My children were dropping around me, and I did not wish to change my quiet habits. I saw the folly and even the wickedness of accumulating without a rational motive, and I seriously turned over in my mind how to spend money usefully. Besides ordinary charities, the three lines then open to me were,—to print and give away my books, which were of a class very little saleable; to help University College, which I saw was moving the education of the nation; and, thirdly, to help the unpopular cause of Unitarianism. I began giving small sums freely to Unitarian appeals for help to chapels, meaning to set an example which I hoped might be followed, of giving £10 or £20, in place of the former £5; and £100 or £50, in place of the former £20. This example, I am glad to see, has often been followed. My translation of the Bible and History of the Hebrew Nation cost nearly £200 a year, to give every Dissenting student for the ministry whose college would accept such gifts. In thus giving away money my daughters nobly encouraged me, and were quite content with our quiet, inexpensive way of living."

Of course, this is no complete list of his charities. These were numerous and large. In none of them, we fancy, did he take more pleasure than in helping boys who could not otherwise have obtained it to get their education in University College School. University College, indeed, was an institution which owes much gratitude to him, not only for the £20,000 in money which he gave to it, but for a very constant interest in its work.

If he had done nothing more than thus liberally and wisely act on the principle that "none of the things which we possess are our own," his life had been well worth writing. But by the studies also to which he devoted his leisure while he was yet in business, and almost his whole time afterwards, he did much service. And this service was of a kind that needs, while it deserves, a recognition of this kind. Mr. Sharpe had not the gift of attracting popular regard to his work. He is called on the title-page of his biography, "Egyptologist and Translator of the Bible," yet it is probable that few, even of those who have concerned themselves with researches into the antiquity and history of Egypt, and with the question of a revised translation of the Scriptures, know the value of what he did in respect of these two matters. It did not fall to his lot to make any great discovery in Egyptian study; but his patient labour helped much to build up the great edifice, so to speak, which has been gradually built up in this province of knowledge. Comparatively few, again, have seen his "Translation of the Bible;" not one reader, we should say, for a hundred, who have diligently compared the work of the Revisers with the Authorised Version. But it must never be forgotten that he was a pioneer in the work, and a pioneer who did real service in helping to remove some serious obstacles. It was not only that he advocated the cause and put his name to petitions. He supplied the materials of which others made use; and, better than all, he actually set his own shoulder to the wheel, and finished entirely by his own labour a Revised translation of the whole Bible. The preface to this volume was dated on his eighty-first birthday, but it did not actually appear till the following year, the year in which the Revised Version of the New Testament was published. He lived to see this, and was able to examine some points in it. This he did with the greatest interest, though he did not live to criticise it in detail. Two months afterwards (in July, 1881), he passed away by a quiet and painless death. The old man, as he sits "in his arm-chair upon the garden steps, with the calm countenance of the great bust of Melpomene before him, and with the Hebrew text he had written on the garden wall behind him — 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one God'" — makes a picture which fittingly ends a life of faith and quiet devotion to study.

There is much interesting matter in the volume besides the record of Mr. Sharpe's life and labours. In his family story there are many noteworthy figures, none of them more so than the half-sister, Catherine Sharpe, who gave up herself to the care of her brothers and sisters, orphaned of both father and mother within the space of a few months. Mr. Sharpe, too, had many friends, some of them famous men, and he was accustomed to record his impressions of their conversation. On the whole, this is a picture of life so simple, so dignified, so full of duty faithfully discharged, and keen intellectual interest, that it is a pleasure and a profit to contemplate it.

* Samuel Sharpe: Egyptologist and Translator of the Bible. By F. W. Clayden. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.

AN AMERICAN COACHING PARTY.*

THIS volume, which does not contain a single dull or unreadable page, is the record of a delightful coaching journey from Brighton to Inverness, undertaken by the writer and a party of American friends. Of course, we are at once reminded of the captivating Strange Adventures of a Phaeton, which some of us still think the pleasantest of Mr. William Black's pleasant books, but Mr. Carnegie seems to have been beforehand with his fellow-Scot in the inception of the happy thought of a drive through Britain, though the popular novelist was the first to put it into a concrete form. As a work of art simply, this volume does not profess to enter into competition with its distinguished predecessor; though, if artistic worth is to be gauged, not by conformity to formal and artificial canons, but by the measure of success with which an intended purpose is achieved, and a desired impression conveyed, it is not easy to see how Mr. Carnegie's book could have been better than it is.

The railway has not, perhaps, proved the irredeemably prosaic thing it seemed to those who grieved over its early aggressions half a century ago; the great appropriator, Nature, has adopted it kindly, and many a landscape has gained a new charm from the white, curling cloud, floating above the meadows, or losing itself among the stems of the far-off plantation; but, after all, stage-coach travel, with its sense of freedom and exhilaration, its nearness to nature, its fascinating music of rolling wheels and clattering hoofs, and shrill, jubilant horn, remains still what De Quincey called it, the poetry of motion. When, therefore, Mr. Carnegie determined to show his old British home to his American friends, he arranged that the exhibition should be given under the most favourable conditions, so far as he could control them; and happily the elements became his allies, so that even in our uncertain climate the voyagers knew no abatement of the joys of travel. The party, indeed, deserved the best; for they were prepared, even if they met the worst, to make the best of it. As Mr. Carnegie sagely remarks:—

"There is everything in the way one takes things. 'Whatever is, is right,' is a good maxim for travellers to adopt, but the charioteers improved on that. The first resolution they passed was, 'Whatever is, is lovely; all that does happen and all that doesn't happen shall be altogether lovely.' We shall quarrel with nothing, admire everything and everybody. A surly beggar shall afford us sport, if anybody can be surly under our smiles; and stale bread and poor fare shall only serve to remind us that we have banquetted at the Windsor. Even no dinner at all shall pass for a good joke. Rain shall be hailed as good for the growing corn, a cold day pass as invigorating, a warm one be welcomed as suggestive of summer at home, and even a Scotch mist serve to remind us of the mysterious ways of Providence. In this mood the start was made. Could any one suggest a better for our purpose?"

To such a question an unhesitating negative is the only reasonable reply, and it is pleasant to learn that this best of all possible moods was more abiding than good moods are wont to be. Mr. Matthew Arnold says that,—

"Tasks in hours of insight willed,
May be through hours of gloom fulfilled;"

but the task willed by the charioteers in their hour of insight was no less than the total suppression of all hours of gloom, and it was fulfilled in a way that did equal credit to heart, head, temper, and digestion. A day's rain was a pleasant change, the anticipation, which came to nothing, of going without a night's lodging was positively exhilarating, and even the bitter disappointment of finding that the world-renowned Banbury Cross, instead of being a worshipful antiquity, was as modern as Chicago, seems to have been borne not with more stoical resignation, but with an approach to genuine cheerfulness.

One of the many things for which ordinary readers will feel, or ought to feel, profoundly grateful to Mr. Carnegie is that he has stoutly resisted the temptation—if, indeed, he ever felt it—to give long-winded descriptions of scenery. Mr. Ruskin complains that people only read his descriptions, and skip his theology, political economy, and the like; but then, Mr. Ruskin stands by himself, and even Mr. Black is inimitable. Mr. Carnegie, therefore, wisely contents himself with those impressions of travel which do not make impossible demands upon the pen, and what he gives us is so welcome that we would not have it anything else. He has evidently not got beyond a vigorous middle-age, and at least some years of childhood were spent in his Scottish birthplace; but in spite of his patriotic enthusiasm for Caledonia stern and wild, he seems to have left the old days behind, and writes more like a Yankee with a Knickerbocker pedigree than like a full born Briton returning to the old home. His delight in the roadside inns of England is the sort of emotion aroused by things which are not only pleasant, but strange as well; their very names, especially such rural ones as "The Lamb and Lark," "The Wheat Sheaf," and "The Barley Mow," are full of fascination for him; and not only he, but the whole party seems to have been profoundly impressed by the many virtues of the English "landlord" and "landlady":—

"The scrupulous care bestowed upon us and our belongings by the innkeepers excited remark. Not one article was lost of the fifty packages, great and small, required by fifteen persons. It was not even practicable to get rid of any trifling article which had served its purpose; old gloves or discarded brushes, quietly stowed away in some drawer or other, would be handed to us at the next stage, having been sent by express by these careful, honest people. It was a great and interesting occasion, as the reporters say, when the stowed-away pair of old slippers, which had been purposely left, were delivered to one of our ladies with a set speech after dinner one evening. Little did she suspect what was contained in the nice package which had been forwarded. Our cast-off things were veritable Devil's ducats, which would return to plague us. To the grandest feature of the Briton's character, the love of truth, let one more cardinal virtue be added,—his downright honesty."

Mr. Carnegie is, however, fully alive to what he considers the weak points in the English character and institutions. His residence in the United States has made him a republican of the republicans, and he is wont to indulge in rather "withering" remarks upon our social arrangements. After noting the facts that the Marquis of Stafford is a hard-working Director of the London and North-Western Railway, that the Duke of Devonshire is Chairman of the Barrow Steel Company, and that Lord Granville and Earl Dudley have a large pecuniary interest in the iron trade, he exclaims:—

"It is all right, you see, my friends, to be a steel-rail manufacturer or an iron-master. How fortunate! But the line must be drawn somewhere, and we draw it at trade. The A. T. Stewarts and the Morrisons have no standing in society in England. They are in vulgar trade. Now, if they brewed beer, for instance, they would be somebodies, and might confidently look forward to a baronetcy at least; for a great deal of beer, a peerage is not beyond reach."

This rhetorical assault, which is quite in Sir Wilfrid Lawson's manner, might, perhaps, be mildly parried by a suggestion that even in the paradise of Republicanism, arbitrary caste distinctions are not unknown; but, at any rate, they have no princes in the United States, so we are left entirely unprotected from the good-natured, but still tremendous satire of the following passage concerning Mr. Gladstone and the Prince of Wales:—

"We attended church at Windsor, and saw the great man and the Prince come to the door together. There the former stopped, and the other walked up the aisle, causing a flutter in the congregation. Mr. Gladstone followed at a respectful distance, and took his seat several pews behind. How absurd you are, my young-lady Republican! Can you not understand? One is only the leading man in the Empire—a man who, in a fifty years' tussle with the foremost statesmen of the age, has won the crown both for attainments and character; but the other, bless your ignorant little head!—he is a Prince."

St. George's Chapel seems to have stimulated all Mr. Carnegie's powers of sarcasm, and after saying his say about Mr. Gladstone and the Prince of Wales, he turns to another distinguished person—the Earl of Beaconsfield—of whose character and aims he gives the following brief, but uncompromising estimate:—

"When I was not gazing at Gladstone's face, I was moralising upon the last Knight of the Garter, whose flag still floats above the stall. Disraeli won the blue ribbon about as worthily as most men, and by much the same means,—he flattered the monarch. But there is this to be said of him,—he had brains, and made himself. What a commentary upon pride of birth, the flag of the poor literary adventurer floating beside that of my lord duke's! It pleased me much to see it. How that man must have chuckled as he bowed his way among his dupes, from her Majesty to Salisbury, and passed the Radical extension of the franchise that doomed hereditary privilege to speedy extinction!"

In this amusing, plain-spoken way does Mr. Carnegie comment upon things and persons English; but where he is, so far as words go, most uncompromisingly severe, there is no mistaking the underlying amiability. He is simply anxious to show that the resolution to find everything "altogether lovely" has not dimmed his Republican vision or impaired his logical impartiality, and, considering that he is an Americanised Scotchman, and, therefore, a critic both by nature and training, we are, on the whole, let down very easily.

There are several good stories in the book, as, indeed, there could hardly fail to be, and we select the following, not as the best—though the conclusion is a fine stroke of humour—but as one of the shortest. The party had reached Sanquhar, where the Cameronians abjured their allegiance to "the ungodly king," and Mr. Carnegie tells how some of them—

"Stepped into a stationer's shop there, and met a character. One side of the shop was filled with the publications of the Bible Society, the other with drugs. 'A strange combination, this,' I remarked.—'Weel, man, no sae bad. Pheseek for the body, an' pheseek for the soul,—castor oil and Bibles no sae bad.' Harry and I laughed. 'Have you the Revised Version here yet?' I inquired.—'Na, na, the auld thing here! Nane of yer new-fangled editions of the Scripture for us. But I hear they've shortened the Lord's Prayer. Noo, that's nae a bad thing for them as hae to get up early in the mornin's.'"

We must have read many hundreds of Scottish stories, but we cannot recall one with a stronger flavour of national character than this. The general denunciation of theological novelties, with the cautious exception in favour of a convenient shortening of a prayer, is deliciously Caledonian.

Should Mr. Carnegie's book reach a second edition, as it well deserves, a few unimportant errors may as well be corrected. Mr. Robert Lowe's title is "Sherbrooke," not "Sherborne;" Milton wrote "fresh woods and pastures new," not "fresh fields," &c.; the popular juvenile sweetmeat is "toffee," not "taffee;" and "Balliol," not "Baliol," is the correct spelling of the name of the well-known Oxford College. As for the following sentence, it is so hopelessly muddled that correction is impossible:—"I wish," writes Mr. Carnegie, "I could quote something, from Adam Bede, I think it is—where Garth, the stonemason, thinks good work in his masonry the best prayer he has to stand upon;" but unfortunately, Mr. Garth is not a character in Adam Bede, he is not a stonemason, and he never made the remark here attributed to him, so the quotation very fairly matches the celebrated definition of a crab as "a red fish that walks backwards." Double the number of errors would not, however, seriously diminish our enjoyment of a most delightful volume, and we thank the writer most heartily for some very pleasant hours.

DANIEL WEBSTER.*

MR. LODGE's biography of Daniel Webster deserves somewhat more attention than is the "natural due" of the excellent and useful series to which it belongs. For one thing, it is not simply a compilation from existing Webster literature. Mr. Lodge has drawn freely from Mr. Curtis's memoir of the American Boanerges, and frankly acknowledges his obligations to it. But he has made independent investigations into Webster's life, as at least one magazine controversy in which he has been engaged adequately proves; and he takes a different view from Mr. Curtis of certain rather dubious professional transactions in which their common hero was engaged. Then, we question if a compact volume like this, giving a succinct and bright narrative of Webster's career, with extracts from his speeches, (but could Mr. Lodge not have given more from his letters?) is not the best cairn to erect to his memory. Webster was not an original statesman, and he was not a profound lawyer, although for his day he attained an extraordinary success, both at the Bar and in the Senate. He was not inventive; he was even indolent. But he could give passionate expression to other men's ideas; of all eminent Americans who have given themselves up to public life, he is the most vocal. He was an imposing, almost a heroic personality, and his biography should be a brief prose epic. But above everything, Daniel Webster has, more than any other American politician that was distinguished before the Civil War, impressed the British mind as embodying the force and representing the grandeur of Democracy in the New World. "The noblest of all your notabilities," and "a magnificent specimen," exclaimed Carlyle, in a letter to Emerson, after seeing Webster at breakfast, and then proceeded to draw this Rembrandtesque portrait of him,—“The tanned complexion, that amorphous, crag-like face; the dull, black eyes under the precipice of brows, like dull anthracite furnaces, needing only to be blown; the mastiff mouth, accurately closed. I have not traced so much of silent Berserker rage, that I remember of, in any man. I guess I should not like to be your nigger! Webster is not loquacious, but he is pertinent, conclusive; a dignified, perfectly-bred man, though not English in breeding; a man worthy of the best reception among us, and meeting such, I understand.” Webster strikes one, especially in his speeches, as an Englishman rather than an American, or, at all events, rather than a Yankee. He was an orator, but he did not “orate.” He was the younger brother of Fox, rather than the elder brother of Mr. Wendell Phillips. Anything fresh about or upon Daniel Webster will, therefore, always be heartily welcomed on this side of the Atlantic.

It would be no difficult matter to pick holes in Mr. Lodge's style. He has at too easy command, and uses far too freely, the vocabulary of “gush” and panegyric, of which such adjectives as “intense,” “bold,” “penetrating,” and “far-reaching” are flowers, and which in this country is now practically confined to provincial platforms and to votes of thanks to provincial lecturers. We come perpetually, too, upon puzzling expressions, such “as the iron constitution hidden somewhere in the small, frail body” and “that stately creature wrung with anguish.” These may be simply modern Americanisms, but the description of Webster as “a stately creature” seems as grotesquely inappropriate as would be a description of Danton as “a nice Titan.” But Mr. Lodge's vivacity, enthusiasm, and impartiality cover a multitude of literary infirmities. We like those portions of his biography best in which he dwells upon Webster's private life. Webster was no saint; as Mr. Lodge apologetically says, “He was a splendid animal, as well as a great man, and he had strong passions and appetites, which he indulged at times to the detriment of his health and reputation.” But like so many of the men of Anglo-Saxon blood who were born in the eighteenth century, and were full of its ideas, like our own Fox and Burns, for example, he had singularly warm affections. He was an attached son—Mr. Lodge gives us some pleasant glimpses of his father, the stalwart borderer and Puritan, Ebenezer Webster—a kind husband and father, fond of children, of nature in all, but especially in its grander forms. At the same time, Mr. Lodge does not disguise or condone Webster's great weakness, his incapacity to keep out of debt. It may be said that in this respect he is no worse than Cobden or the second Pitt. But there is a shadiness about his impecuniosity which does not suggest itself in connection with theirs. Mr. Lodge proves beyond all question that Webster accepted not very long before his death a gift of ten thousand dollars from an admirer of “The Seventh of March Oration,” in which he practically threw overboard his anti-slavery principles, and defended the Fugitive Slave Law. He was latterly maintained in large measure by New England manufacturers and capitalists, and “repaid them with an occasional magnificent compliment;” and we confess the relationship between him and them does not look much prettier because, as Mr. Lodge puts it, “he seems to have regarded the merchants and bankers of State Street very much as a feudal baron regarded his peasantry.” Then, “he came down to Salem to prosecute a murderer, and the opposing counsel objected that he was brought there to hurry beyond the law and the evidence, and it was even murmured audibly in the court-room that he had a fee from the relatives of the murdered man in his pocket. A fee of that kind he certainly received, either then or afterwards. Every ugly public attack that was made upon him related to money, and it is painful that the biographer of such a man as Webster should be compelled to give many pages to show that his hero was not in the pay of manufacturers, and did not receive a bribe in carrying out the provisions of the Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo. The refutation may be perfectly successful, but there ought to have been no need of it.” This is quite true. Webster's debts appear to have been quite inexcusable; he was the most popular advocate of his time, and could by honest professional effort have made an income sufficiently large not only to satisfy his wants, but even to gratify very luxurious tastes. There is no denying that, as Mr. Lodge says, “his moral character was not equal to his intellectual force.” It is to be feared, too, that his moral fibre deteriorated as he grew older.

Daniel Webster's public life was a torso, if not a tragedy. His leading ambition was never gratified; he never got higher up the ladder of official politics than the Secretaryship of State, and his closing days were embittered by the preference given by his party to General Scott over himself as their candidate for the Presidency. The reason for this failure Mr. Lodge apparently believes to have been the fact that Webster was in politics a party advocate rather than a champion. He says, further, that "he was deficient in that intensity of conviction which carries men beyond and above all triumphs of statesmanship, and makes them the embodiment of the great moral forces which move the world." There is a superficial amount of truth in this, and it may well be believed that Webster's party found men who were very much better and more loyal partisans than himself, and therefore much better fitted for the rôle of standard-bearer. What, moreover, could look more inconsistent than that the politician who entered public life as a Free-trader—his speech on the Berlin and Milan decrees showed that for the time, and for a man of his temperament, he had obtained a really wonderful mastery of financial questions—and keen opponent of slavery, should have degenerated into an advocate of a modified Protection and of the Fugitive Slave Law? But in truth, it was alike the weakness and the strength of Webster that he placed the integrity of the Union above Party, and even above principle. He abhorred, he could not tolerate, the idea of secession, and, to prevent it, he was willing to part with or to modify his own views, even when he knew that these were right. He was wrong in lowering the anti-slavery flag in order to please the South, in 1848; he both sinned against principle, and committed a grave political blunder. But his motives were not wholly impure. His patriotism was genuine and lofty, if somewhat imaginative. He believed in the Union; he gloried in its past; he had almost beatific visions as to its future. The Liverpool navy who pointed to him when he was walking along the street, and said, "There goes a King!" was quite right. Webster was a king who never had the opportunity of reigning. Had a crisis in the history of the Union occurred in his life-time, it would have supplied him with what he most stood in need, a genuine moral purpose and mission. He would have rushed to the aid of his country, and become its saviour, as certainly and probably as effectually as did the elder Pitt in the case of England. But such a chance never came to Webster, and so his political career was marked by disappointments, and worse than disappointments. He was at his best, because at his truest, in his famous orations at Plymouth in 1822, and at Bunker Hill in 1825 and 1843, and in his eulogies on Adams and Jefferson in 1826. His greatest effort is commonly declared to be his two days' "speech in the Senate against Hayne," of South Carolina, on the right of "nullification," in 1830. This, however, is largely forensic, and has not the true patriotic ring of some of his other speeches, declamatory though these are. Webster's best orations, indeed, are quite as sincere as Burke's or Fox's, and very much more sincere than Sheridan's. Had he kept himself absolutely aloof from party politics, which in 1852 he declared to be "utterly vain," and constituted himself the orator or prose poet of the national sentiment in the United States—such a person is needed there more than ever, in these days of materialism and millionaires—the admiration which his name inspires would have been as unqualified on both sides of the Atlantic as even now it is cordial.

FARRER'S TOUR IN GREECE.*

EMERSON, in one of his charming letters to Carlyle, gently twits Frederick's biographer with having made a covenant with his eyes, that they should not see anything he did not wish they should see. Recent travellers in Greece seem to have made a somewhat similar covenant with their eyes. To some the land seems a paradise, and its inhabitants, like Master Wackford Squeers, next door to cherubim. To others it seems the antithesis of that realm, and its children as black as their putative sire is painted. The truth, of course, lies between these extreme views; but it is very difficult to say to which extreme it lies nearer. Probably, what Sir Charles (then Colonel) Napier said of Lord Byron's view is true still:—"Of all those who came to help the Greeks," he said, "I never heard one except Lord Byron and Mr. Gordon that seemed to have justly estimated their character. All came expecting to find the Peloponnesus filled with Plutarch's men, and all returned thinking the inhabitants of Newgate more moral. Lord Byron judged them fairly; he knew that half-civilised men are full of vices, and that great allowance must be made for emancipated slaves." It is true that the Greeks themselves would reject with scorn the notion that they are still only a half-civilised people. It is none the less a fact that they are, and a fact that must be reckoned with by all who are bent on making a tour in Greece. It is also true that they can no longer plead such excuses as emancipated slaves can plead for their vices. The question as to whether they have or have not used the position which Europe has assured to them in a manner at all commensurate with their opportunities, is one which this book does not call upon us to decide. Mr. Farrer and his companions scampered hastily through a portion of North Greece, and across the Peloponnesus, and Mr. Farrer has written an account of their progress which may be read most decidedly with pleasure. Comparisons are proverbially invidious, and if we say that this book is written, so to speak, on the lines of Mr. Kinglake's Eothen, we must not refrain from adding that it is vastly inferior to that incomparable book of travel. On the other hand, it is vastly superior to those miserable hashes of old diaries which are so frequently published as travels, and combine the parasangy dullness of the opening chapters of Xenophon's Anabasis with personal recollections that have no interest for the reader, nor would, if he were wise, have any interest left in them for the writer. A man may upset his matutinal tub, and be bitten by fleas. He may enter these incidents in his diary, if he has leisure enough for such idleness; but why he should print them, and thousands of other such trivial personal records, we do not understand. We quite understand, though, that print as he may, he will not find readers for his trumpery revelations. Mr. Farrer's "Tour" is not one of these diary-fed compilations; though we think that he insists a little too often upon the unsavoury discomforts which make a man's life wretched on board an over-crowded steamer, and that the "entomological researches" which he is fond of noticing have nothing to make them worth noticing at all, unless it should happen that the "researcher" is gifted with the angelic temper and sublime stoicism which Sir John Franklin was wont to display on such occasions. It will also, perhaps, strike peaceful readers that Mr. Farrer and his train were a little too fond of what he calls "baculatory arguments," and much too prompt in showing their revolvers, which, after all, they were never called upon to use in grim earnest. Nor does it appear that the Government escort which was provided for them ever failed of securing them from the chance of having to do so. It would seem, therefore, that Mr. Farrer might have expressed and shown a little more gratitude for the poor soldiery whom he ridicules so scornfully for their eternal great-coats and for their partiality for garlic. In fact, although he writes, no doubt, as "a gentleman for gentlemen," he occasionally strikes a note which reminds of Dr. Morris's Irish servant, who thought it so absurd of Frenchmen to clothe their infantry in blue and their artillery in red. Moreover, gentlemen (we are speaking now of Mr. Farrer's companions, as well as himself) who so thoroughly despised the conversation of the natives that they concealed from them, perhaps unnecessarily, their own knowledge of Greek, need hardly, we think, have displayed the conscientiousness of puritanical soap-boilers when questioned as to their politics. It is true that they were smarting under Lord Beaconsfield's defeat, and stung perhaps on that account into aggressive truthfulness, but we confess that if we thought as little of an Otaheitan's opinions as Mr. Farrer and his companions did of their Greek hosts', we should be "Trojan or Tyrian," in his position, for the nonce, and think it no robbery to howl with the wolves.

Mr. Farrer is a sufficiently good scholar to make the archaeological portion of his volume worth reading by those who are willing to take their notions of Greek art, &c., from Smith's Dictionaries; and to his query whether Phœbus Apollo did not send as well as heal pestilence, we can return a cheerful "Why, cert'nly." But à propos of the question which he discusses, in a long and for him decidedly a pretentious note, about the temple of that god at Phigalia, we entirely decline to accept his theory that the inhabitants of a petty Peloponnesian town erected that edifice as a thank-offering to Phœbus for sending the plague to Athens. Mr. Farrer has a keen eye for scenery, and Lord Windsor's illustrations, which are modest enough, are illustrations in the true sense of the word, and deserve high commendation. The following sketch of a part of "happy Arcadia" will astonish many who have hitherto formed their ideas of that land from the fanciful conceptions of Italian poets and their imitators :—

"The next few hours unfold all the hideousness of central Arcadia. True, that on the north, Mount Oyllene and other snow-capped peaks give a far distance which leaves nothing to be desired, and that the same may be said of Taygetus, on the south; but unless the day be unusually clear, they are invisible, and in any case there is no pleasing object in the foreground or middle distance on which the eye can rest. Clouds of dust on the road, marshy flats on either hand, shapeless hills without vegetation, no signs of life but the endless chorus of countless frogs; such is the central Arcadia of to-day, —a bleak, unlovely table-land."

Western Arcadia to some extent makes up for this, and Mr. Farrer waxes warm in praising the Alpheus valley, which makes himself and his companions feel "that Greece is worth visiting for its natural beauty alone;" and sadly reflect "that, but for man's wantonness and indolence, the whole of its now arid surface might resemble western Arcadia." The last proposition is open to doubt, but something more than alterations in climate is needed to explain the sparse population of Attica, compared with that of Corfu. That the climate of the former has altered may be inferred from the account which Mr. Farrer gives of that λαμπρότατος αἰθήρ which Euripides has made so famous. He declares the foulness of no climate can surpass the horrors sometimes provided by that of Athens :—

"After a still day of cloudless beauty and warmth, the traveller awakes to find a white world; the flakes continually falling all that day; on the next, the streets are impassable in the thaw; on the third, it rains from morning to night; the fourth is clear and bright, but with a north wind, in contrast to which any English March breezes are balmy zephyrs, —a wind that drives whole dust-bins into the eyes round every corner, that cuts into the very marrow, and against which it is often impossible to keep one's feet."

It is easy to read between the lines of this indictment, and see that the climate is not so guilty as Mr. Farrer would have us think. We may say the same of the complaints which he makes about the endless and profitless lavatory operations in which he says the women of the country seem always to be engaged, and of several other observations which he makes upon the manners and customs of modern Greeks. On the whole, however, we are strongly inclined to believe that the advance made by Greece since the Revolution has not been so rapid as might have been expected, and that had Palmerston foreseen what has actually taken place, he would not have surrendered Corfu, as he once said he never would to the subjects of King Otho, to the subjects even of King George I. We would rather trust also a judge like Lord Strangford than college tutors and other less responsible enthusiasts, as to the value to be put upon the intellectual and moral qualities of modern Greeks. But these are points which this book can hardly be said to raise, and we can confidently recommend it as a volume of very pleasantly told and admirably illustrated travel.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Oliver Wendell Holmes. By W. S. Kennedy. (Cassino and Co., Boston, U.S.; Sampson Low and Co., London.)—One has a feeling that there is something illegitimate about these accounts of living celebrities. Perhaps this is a prejudice of the past. The celebrities themselves seem to favour it. Statesmen, and savans, and poets, and millionaires are "at home" to visitors whose known intention it is to describe to the world their homes, their studies, nay, their very dinner-tables and cigar-boxes. We must be content, therefore, to take what is given us, and only to require good-taste. This condition Mr. Kennedy fairly well satisfies. He gives some interesting details about Mr. Holmes's ancestry. Culture seems to have been, and promises to be, hereditary in the family. Mr. Kennedy mentions as kinsfolk of the poet descended from a common ancestress Dr. W. Ellery Channing, the two R. H. Danas, and Wendell Phillips. This ancestress was a Mrs. Bradstreet, wife of Simon Bradstreet, Governor of Massachusetts in 1689, who has the distinction of writing the first volume of verse published in America. College life is described, with its extraordinary abundance of bear-play and practical joking, the result, it would seem, of the almost total absence of sport. Mr. Holmes was, as might be expected, the poet of his "class," or, as we should say, "year." After a brief trial of the law, he adopted the profession of medicine, receiving the degree of M.D. from Harvard in 1836. (He was born in 1809.) In 1838, he was appointed Professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, held it for two years, then practised for seven as a physician at Boston, and in 1847 was appointed to a Chair at Harvard (in the same subjects as before). The subjects were afterwards divided, Mr. Holmes retaining anatomy. He resigned his Professorship in 1882. In 1827, he wrote, jointly with a friend, a small volume of verse. After that, his verse contributions to periodical literature became frequent. In 1857 appeared the first number of the "Atlantic Monthly," and in it the first instalment of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table." Mr. James Russell Lowell was the editor, and Longfellow, Emerson, and Motley among the contributors. The magazine had its birth at an inn, Porter's Tavern, in North Avenue, where the contributors held their meetings, with an interchange of mirth that is well described in Mr. Holmes's lines :—

"Such jests, that, drained of every joke,
The very bank of laughter broke;
Such deeds, that laughter nearly died
With stitches in his belted side;
While Time, caught fast in Pleasure's chain,
His double goblet snapped in twain,
And stood with half in either hand,
Both brimming full,—but not of sand!"

Mr. Kennedy gives a full account of Mr. Holmes's literary work. We cannot quite follow his criticism. His collocation of "Crabbe, Pope, Hood, and the Prize Poets of the English Universities," seems a little odd. But his remarks on the poets' "Anglicism" are quite just. Even as Virgil brought the Sicily of Theocritus into the Mantuan plain, so the writers of that day put "a picture of Regent's Park on one side of a stereoscope and a picture of Boston Common at the other, and tried to make one of them." The chapter on "Mr. Holmes as a Scientist" will be new to most readers. Yet here, too, he has done some notable things. His papers against homoeopathy were certainly vigorous, whatever their scientific merit. He calls it "a system of universal poisoning, nullified in practice by the infinitesimal contrivance." But allopathists did not escape. Here is a characteristic passage from an address in which he denounced the abuse of drugs :—

"How could a people which has a revolution once in four years, which has contrived the bowie-knife and the revolver, which has chewed the juice out of all the superlatives in the language in Fourth of July orations, and so used up its epithets in the rhetoric of abuse, that it takes two great quarto dictionaries to supply the demand; which insists on sending out yachts, and horses, and boys to out-sail, out-light, and checkmate all the rest of creation; how could such a people be content with any but 'hemi' practice? What wonder that the Stars and Stripes wave over doses of ninety grains of sulphate of quinine, and that the American Eagle screams with delight to see three grains of calomel given at a single mouthful?"

Mr. Holmes has not, on the whole, written much, —βαλὰ μὲν ἀλλὰ πόδα.

A Fair Country Maid. By E. Fairfax Byrrne. 3 vols. (Bentley and Son.)—The opening of this tale is attractive. Derrick Devonport, squire of Hollyss Hall, meets the "fair country maid," Marjorie Morrison, and we recognise at once two interesting figures. Not less interesting are the next to whom we are introduced, Abel Greenough, an agricultural Radical, and Zachary Pearse, the artistic quarryman. Then comes in a romantic element. Marjorie is related to the family that owns Hollyss Hall, and the portrait of her ancestress, the very image of her remote descendant, is hanging in the picture-gallery. Another character, also promising an interesting development, is added to the list, —Saul Howell, an Oxford friend of the squire, who had been faithful to the Nonconforming traditions of his family, and had brought all his gifts and acquirements to the ministry of a Dissenting community at Milltown. The development of the story fails, as is so often the case, to please as much as the introduction. The "fair maid" has four lovers, and makes a choice with which we perhaps ought, yet do not feel able, to sympathise. Then come misunderstandings and difficulties, complicated by the monomania which has taken possession of the mind of Marjorie's brother John, a monomania born of the tradition of relationship, that he is the rightful heir of the Hall and its estates. The tragedy with which the story ends is not, we think, very skillfully managed. The details of the death of Abel are scarcely probable; and the explanation of the murder which acquits Saul Howell of actual guilt is decidedly unsatisfactory. Still, the tale shows some power; and more promise, especially if it be, as we suppose, a first attempt in fiction. Here is a pleasant little touch. Mrs. Morrison, the beauty's mother, has been grievously put out by domestic difficulties :—"The good lady had arranged to spend the afternoon in a state of tearful collapse; and to aid this process, she had put on her second-best, black-silk dress, and a cap with mauve ribbons, and retiring to the parlour, had brought out her Bible and Jeremy Taylor's 'Holy Living and Dying,' and seated herself stiffly in the best arm-chair, with the books disposed on a table near her."

The Heavenly Bodies. By William Miller. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Mr. Miller discusses at great length what we cannot but think a somewhat unprofitable question,—the plurality of inhabited worlds. We call it "unprofitable," not in the sense in which all astronomical questions are "unprofitable," but as starting with a radical fault, that we are forced to transfer conditions with which we are acquainted to places where we have no right to suppose such conditions. We cannot live, it is true, with a temperature at boiling heat, but there may be, for all that we know, beings who can. However, any one who wants to see what has been said on the subject, and what astronomers have discovered about the conditions of atmosphere, heat, &c., in the planets, can find what he wants to know in Mr. Miller's carefully compiled book,—we say compiled, for we understand that his knowledge of these matters is not first-hand. The most reasonable belief on the subject seems to be that at some time in the history of a world, not necessarily of all worlds, but possibly and probably of more than one (we know absolutely nothing about the worlds which probably depend upon the fixed stars), there is a period during which life is possible. The Moon, possibly, has had such a period; so, possibly, has Mars; whereas, Jupiter may have one yet in the future.

Glossary of Terms and Phrases. Edited by the Rev. H. Percy Smith. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Mr. Percy Smith has been assisted by some able contributors, among whom may be mentioned Sir George W. Cox and Mr. Fennell, the editor of "Pindar." The Glossary of Terms and Phrases is intended "to bring together such words, expressions, quotations, &c., English or other, as are among the more uncommon in current literature, and required not for the scientific, but for the ordinary reader, explanations for the want of which the meaning of a sentence or a paragraph, even the drift of an argument, is often missed." We may take instances at random. The item "Brief" is explained to mean (1) Pontifical letters, which are either addressed to individuals or "bodies, or, more solemnly, to the whole Church; and (2) in the Prayer-book, Queen's Letters, authorising collections, now discontinued. Under "Brigade," again, we learn that in the Artillery alone the word corresponds to a battalion of Infantry. The meaning of "Bristol Boy" is given as the poet Thomas Chatterton, and that of "Broad-Bottom Administration" as that of H. Pelham in 1744, as having been a grand coalition of parties. The utility of the book is manifest; that it is done by competent hands, we do not doubt. The reputation of the writers is sufficient guarantee, and all our examination of the items has tended to confirm the belief. The scholarship in particular, so generally deficient in books of this kind, is exact.

Marianela. By Perez Caldós. From the Spanish by Clara Bell, (Gottschberger, New York; Trübner, London.)—Books from Spain are not so common but that they excite a special interest. This is but a slight story, and the motive is not, we should say, new. A young man blind from his birth loves the girl who has been his constant companion. But she is plain, and even deformed, while his face and figure are of remarkable beauty. He is restored to sight by a skilful oculist, and among the first shapes which he sees is a beautiful cousin. The struggle in the girl's mind, her anxious wish that the blind man should have his sight, and her certainty that when he recovers it he will give elsewhere the love that she prizes, her passionate appeals to the Virgin to help her, even, as in her despair she prays, to give her beauty, are very pathetically told. With true art, Señor Caldós makes the cousin who unconsciously supplants the first love a very model of kindness and guilelessness. There is some really good work in this sketch, and we gladly welcome it.

We would desire to welcome the appearance of the first number of The Collective Investigation Record, edited by Professor Humphry, M.D., and F. A. Mahomed, M.B. (British Medical Association, 161A Strand.)—Dr. Humphrey prefaces the number with a "History of the Movement." Then follow addresses on the subject delivered before the Metropolitan Counties Branch of the British Medical Association by Sir W. Gull and Sir James Paget. We have some results of the working of the Association. "A Report on the Communicability of Phthisis" is the longest and most important paper in the number. We may quote one sentence from the report:—"One fact these returns seem to establish beyond any question, and that is, that if phthisis is a communicable disease, it is so only under circumstances and conditions of extremely close personal intimacy, such as sharing the same bed or the same room, or shut up together in numbers in close, ill-ventilated apartments." "Preliminary Reports," on acute pneumonia, chorea, acute rheumatism, and diphtheria follow, and "The Treatment of Acute Gout" is proposed as a subject of the next inquiry.

PAMPHLETS AND LECTURES.—Can English Law be Taught at the Universities? By A. V. Dicey, B.C.L. (Macmillan), an inaugural lecture, asking a question which the Vinerian Professor naturally answers in the affirmative. His contention is that the student of English Law wants guidance as he did not want it in earlier days, and a systematic teaching which he cannot get in chambers.—Dr. Frances Elizabeth Hoggan publishes three papers on Medical Women for India (J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol), advocating an excellent cause. There never was a clearer case of a real demand and an adequate supply, if only the two could be brought into relation with each other.—The New Godiva: a Dialogue (W. Isbister), speaks plainly on the subject of purity and standards of morality generally. We cannot bind ourselves to all that is advanced in these pages, but we may say that it is well worth considering. Let us state from our own point of view what we believe to be one cause (and doubtless, also, at the same time, an effect) of a debased morality, and that is the detestable tone of sentiment about the morals of men which is to be seen in many of the novels written by women that it is our painful duty to notice in these columns. That a man is necessarily a profligate in his youth seems to be an article of faith with them.—We have received three additional numbers of Present-day Tracts:—Modern Materialism, by the late Rev. W. F. Wilkinson; The Authenticity of the Gospels, by Henry Wace, B.D.; and The Mosaic Authorship of the Pentateuch, by the Very Rev. R. Payne-Smith. (Religious Tract Society.)—State Socialism and the Nationalisation of the Land, by the Right Hon. Henry Fawcett, M.P. (Macmillan), is a reprint in a cheap and accessible form of an article which appeared in the July number of Macmillan's Magazine, and which was noticed by us at the time.—Mr. W. W. Bean, in his Notices of Various Errors and Omissions, &c (Simpkin and Marshall), appears to make out a very serious case against the "Parliamentary Return of Members of the House of Commons, 1213-1874." More than fifty pages of mistakes is a very serious matter, and Mr. Bean is not more than justified when he says that to issue a document not complete, accurate, and trustworthy "is a scandalous waste of public money."—The Parliamentary Reformer's Manual, by John Noble, is a "revised edition of 'Representation, Population, and Taxation,' based upon the Census of 1881, and the Latest Parliamentary Returns." It is published by the London and Counties Liberal Union, 12 Walbrook. The strange anomalies of our representative system have been stated over and over again, yet it is well to repeat them. A thing has to be repeated a good many times, before it makes its way into the public mind. After all, there is no stronger example than London. The City and the nine Parliamentary boroughs have a population of 3,452,350. This should give them seventy-one Members, instead of twenty-two. A third of the Income-tax, and half the Customs are paid within their borders. What this should entitle them to who can say? Mr. Noble's pamphlet is crowded with significant facts.—A monograph by Dr. Augustus Merriam, The Greek and Latin Inscription on the Obelisk-Crab in the Metropolitan Museum, New York, will repay perusal.

NEW EDITIONS.—The Captives. Translated from Plautus. By H. A. Strong, M.A. (Robertson, Melbourne, Sydney, and Adelaide.)—This second edition, "revised and enlarged," repeats, we perceive, some mistakes which we pointed out in the first. We will repeat one of our remarks. In Act i., Scene 2, occur the two lines,—

"Ego ibo ad fratrem, ad alios captivos meos: Visum no nocte hac quippiam turbaverint," which Professor Strong translates,—

"I'll to my brother, to my other slaves,— I'll see they make no fuss to-night, the knaves!"

That "ne turbaverint" should be even once so rendered is strange in a Professor of Latin; that the mistake should escape a revision is unaccountable.—Mr. J. A. Froude republishes, in the fourth volume of Short Studies on Great Subjects (Longmans), six essays, which have appeared at various times in magazines and reviews. These six are,—"The Life and Times of Thomas Becket," "The Oxford Counter-Reformation," "Origen and Celsus," "A Cagliostro of the Second Century" (an account of Apollonius of Tyana), "Cheneys and the House of Russell" (a kind of article in which Mr. Froude, we take it, always shows at his best), and "A Siding at a Railway Station."—First Steps in Latin, by F. Ritohie, M.A. (Rivingtons.)—A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament. By Frederick Henry Ambrose Scrivener, D.C.L. (Deighton, Bell, and Co.)—This is a third edition (the first and second having been published in 1861 and 1874), and has been "thoroughly revised, enlarged, and brought down to the present date." No one has a better right to be heard than Dr. Scrivener, and as he leans to what may be called the Conservative side, it may be as well to quote what he has to say about the work of the Revisers:—"First, the task of scrutinising the Greek text was one which the Revisers could not have shrunk from, without reducing their labour to a nullity; secondly, the text, as adopted by them, especially in passages of primary importance, is far less one-sided than is generally supposed; thirdly, the various readings recorded in the margin are nothing better than rejected readings, deliberately refused a place in the text, and set in the margin, if sometimes too lightly, yet always in a spirit of fairness to the unlearned reader of Holy Scripture." This is a very different account of the matter from that which Dean Burgon gave of the matter in the Quarterly Review. A postscript to the preface notices a communication from Dr. Burgon to the editor, to the effect that he had ascertained, from replies sent to inquiries made of the chief librarians in Europe, that there are about 300 additional manuscripts of the New Testament, or of parts of it, which have never yet been collated. It is probable that many of these are of little or no value. Still, it is manifest that a fresh field is opened to the labours of Biblical scholars. In the Vatican Library alone there are 179 codices as yet unexamined, and the Vatican is now really open to scholars.—We have received a handsome reprint of The Imitation of Christ, with an introductory essay on the authorship of the work. (Suttaby and Co.)—The work is reprinted in its entirety, without any omissions or alterations to make it suitable for Anglican readers. Of course, from a literary point of view, this is quite right. If we consider, on the other hand, the practical devotional object, the usual course seems preferable. Devotion can scarcely coexist with controversy.—Principles of Mechanics, "rewritten and enlarged," by T. M. Goodeve, M.A. (Longmans.)—A Physical Treatise on Electricity and Magnetism, by J. E. H. Gordon, B.A., 2 vols., appears in a second edition, "revised, rearranged, and enlarged." (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Gordon promises a separate treatise on "Electric Lighting," a subject to which he has devoted special attention.—The Modern Applications of Electricity, by E. Hospitalier, translated and enlarged by Julius Maier, Ph.D. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.), a second edition, "revised, with many additions." The chapter on "Electric Light" is here entirely new.—Talks about Plants; or, Easy Lessons in Botany, by Mrs. Lankester. (Griffith and Farran.)—The Science of Man: a Manual of Anthropology Based on Modern Research, by Charles Bray. (Longmans.)—Whence, When, What? a View of the Origin, Nature, and Destiny of Man, by James R. Nicholls, M.D. (Williams and Co., Boston, U.S.; Trübner and Co., London.)—Outlines of German Literature, by Joseph Gostwick and Robert Harrison (Williams and Norgate), a second edition, "revised, and extended."—The poetical translations have been increased in number, and the work has been brought up to date.—Letters and Social Aims and The Conduct of Life and Society and Solitude, by Ralph Waldo Emerson (Macmillan and Co.); and a republication of the same writer's works in three volumes by Messrs. Bell, Sons, and Co., the first and second volumes coming out some time ago. We have now the third, containing "Essays, Lectures, Poems, and Orations." Here is a fine little poem, which will probably be new to most of our readers:—

"HEROISM.

"Ruby wine is drunk by knaves,
Sugar spends to fatten slaves;
Rose and vine leaves deck buffoons;
Thunder-clouds are Jove's festoons;
Drooping oft in wreaths of dread,
Lightning knotted round his head;
The hero is not fed on sweets,
Daily his own heart he eats.
Chambers of the great are jails,
And head-winds right for royal sails."

—A Journey Round My Room. By Xavier de Maistre. Translated from the French, with a notice of the author's life, by Henry Attwell. (Chatto and Windus.)—We welcome this neat little edition, but Mr. Attwell is, we think, mistaken in supposing that the book is "hardly known in England." It was included, we remember, in one of the earliest series of cheap books.—Knapsack Handbook; or, Pedestrian's Guide, by William White (E. Stanford.)—The Scarlet Letter, by Nathaniel Hawthorne (W. Paterson, Edinburgh.)—Tobacco, by the Author of "Stronbury" (Macniven and Wallace, Edinburgh.)—A third edition of Hindle's Legal Status of Licensed Victuallers and Other Licence-holders (Stevens and Sons).—An author's edition of R. Grant White's Mr. Washington Adams in England (D. Douglas, Edinburgh).

We have received:—The Parthenon, by James Ferguson (Murray),

"an essay on the mode by which light was introduced into Greek and Roman temples."—The Turkish Compassionate Fund: an Account of its Origin, Working, and Results, compiled by H. Mainwaring Dunston, edited by W. Burdett-Connors. (Remington.)—The Sutherland Evictions of 1814, by Thomas Sellar (Longmans); a vindication of the conduct of Mr. Patrick Sellar.—A Ceremonial Guide to Low Mass, by Two Clergymen (Pickering), which somewhat unexpectedly turns out to be a book of ritual for use in the Church of England.—Annals of the Catholic Hierarchy in England and Scotland, A.D. 1585-1876, by W. Mazière Brady. (John Mozley Stark.)—Studies in Architectural Style, by Richard Popplewell Pullan (15 Buckingham Street, Strand), a series of ninety-six plates, of which fifty-five are of ecclesiastical and the remainder of secular subjects.—The Bibliographer, Vol. III., December, 1882, to May, 1883, (Elliot Stock.)—The Factors of Civilisation, Real and Assumed. (J. P. Harrison, Atlanta, Georgia, U.S.)—Bonds of Disunion; or, English Misrule in the Colonies, by C. J. Rowe, M.A. (Longmans.)—Bellamy's Housekeeper's Guide to the Fish Market, edited and revised by his son, Somers Bellamy. (City of London Publishing Company.)—Part 1 of Cartularium Saxonicum, a collection of charters relating to Anglo-Saxon history, edited by W. De Gray Birch, F.S.A. (Whiting and Co.)

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDET writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others,
is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age
right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland,

Highly recommended by the Medical Profession for INDIGESTION.

As Wine, in Bottles, at 3s, 5s, and 9s;
Lozenges, 2s 6d and 4s 6d; Globules, 2s,
3s 6d, and 6s 6d; and Powder, in 1 oz. Bottles, at 4s each.

SOLD BY ALL CHEMISTS.

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name,

DELHI MEDICAL MISSION (S.P.G.)—Established 1867.

—The First Female Medical Mission begun in India.
The Delhi and South Punjab Mission of the S.P.G. carries on its work among over 3,000,000 of people, and besides Delhi and its suburbs, occupies fifty towns and villages. Its work is carried on,—(1) By training native agents. (2) By philanthropic agencies, of which the most important is medical work among women and children. (3) By day and night schools for boys and young men, with 1,535 pupils. (4) By zananah missions, with 792 pupils. (5) By dividing the city and country into districts, giving each a systematic parochial organisation, for both Christians and non-Christians. The Medical Mission attended 12,963 cases, with an average of 121 sick attended daily. Owing to the growth of the work, the Missionaries are responsible for raising £1,500 a year, over and above annual grants from the Society and Government.
Subscriptions for the general work, or for the Medical Mission in particular, will be gladly received and acknowledged by the Rev. Canon CROWFOOT, Minster Yard, Lincoln; by the Rev. R. R. WINTER (Delhi); or by Rev. W.
O. BROMHEAD, Kensington Palace, W.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

AN accident, which might have been most terrible, occurred at Woolwich on Monday. From some unexplained cause, a rocket which was being filled in the war-rocket store exploded, and the flames spreading, some hundreds of war-rockets were fired in succession into Woolwich and Plumstead. The rockets, which have steel heads, passed, in many cases, through solid walls, and in some instances fell in places crowded with people, but in no case was any one hurt, the only victims being a man and boy employed in the Laboratory itself. The long continuance of the explosions, and the abnormal character of the incident—an Arsenal bombarded by itself without human hands—created the wildest excitement, and before the firing had ceased, stories had flown to the far north of Scotland of how Fenians had blown up Woolwich, how the town was on fire, and how ambulances were arriving heaped with dead. Except in its grim suggestiveness, and in the mercy shown by Providence to the innocent, the accident was an ordinary one, the blowing-up, as it were, of a small powder-mill. There is not the slightest trace or any probability of incendiarism having been at work.

It is understood that the more fanatic Irishmen of Ulster are extremely irritated by Mr. Parnell's "invasion" of the Province, and on Friday morning Dublin and London were almost simultaneously disturbed by a rumour that the Home-rule leader had been shot dead. Up to Friday evening no confirmation of the report had been received, and it is believed to be unfounded, the supposition being that Mr. Parnell is somewhere in Leeds. In ordinary cases, the precise truth would, of course, be readily ascertained by a telegram to the supposed victim; but Mr. Parnell habitually shrouds his movements in secrecy, and his address on Friday was not, it is stated, known to his closest friends. Any attempt upon his life would produce something like civil war in Ireland, and might make it impossible to conduct the government through anything but military means. We have, however, little dread of such a catastrophe. The Irish Extremists have escaped the wrath of all the relatives of all the victims of outrage—a fact upon which historians will one day dwell—and are not likely to suffer from the enmity of purely political foes.

Dr. Pankhurst, who is substantially a French Red of the humane type, and not an English Radical at all, is now the sole Liberal candidate for Manchester, and has a fair chance of being seated. He has pledged himself to Home-rule and the repeal of the Crimes Bill, and the Irish have, therefore, accepted him; the moderate Liberals say he is better than a Tory, and the extreme Radicals are attracted by his ideas, which they see to be philanthropic, and do not see to be nonsensical. Mr. Hugh Mason, Member for Ashton, whose influence in Manchester is so great, in a letter to Mr. A. Heywood, Junior, has urged all Liberals to vote for Dr. Pankhurst, because he has brains and pluck, because he will support Mr. Gladstone and the Reform Bill, because he is infinitely to be preferred to any Tory candidate, and because his policy of peace will make for Manchester trade. If those arguments are sufficient, Liberals ought to vote for any human being, whatever his views, if only he would vote against the Tories. The utter discredit which is brought upon the Liberal party by its tolerance of such wild crotchets is forgotten, as well as the revulsion of feeling always caused by the disappointment of impossible hopes. Cannot Mr. Hugh Mason see that upon the most important of all pressing questions, the government of Ireland and the Reform Bill, Dr. Pankhurst will not vote with Mr. Gladstone, but against him? The Premier is for unity and order; Dr. Pankhurst is for Home-rule and the repeal of the Crimes Act. Mr. Gladstone is for household suffrage; Dr. Pankhurst for universal suffrage of both sexes.

The Irish have "heckled" Dr. Pankhurst with advantage to themselves. Could not some of the more sensible English Radicals try the same process? Could they not ask him, late as it is, how he proposes to garrison India without an Army; how much he supposes the Church property he intends to confiscate to be; whether he intends to pay for any "waste" land in private hands taken by the State, and if so, where his millions of profit are to come from; and finally, what he exactly means about the National Debt? Supposing the resources he mentions to prove insufficient, will he levy £28,000,000 by a land-tax, or will he let the national creditor go unpaid? We do not suppose he intends to encourage repudiation, but what does he mean by his language? As all British credit, all British trade, and all British wages would be affected by any questioning of the obligation to pay the Debt, the matter is of importance. Does Dr. Pankhurst think, as he seems to do, that a mortgage is less obligatory because the money raised under it was spent for a bad purpose?

The French are getting themselves into a condition of irritability in which nations, like men, are capable of almost any blunder. The King of Spain is to be the guest of the Republic for three days, but he has accepted the titular Colonelcy of a Regiment of Uhlans now stationed at Strasburg, at the hands of the German Emperor, and the Parisian journalists declare that this is equivalent to taking an oath of allegiance to Germany, and that, therefore, Paris ought either to hiss the King, or turn its back on him. Do they really suppose that the Prince of Wales, who is also a German Colonel, is, therefore, the more bound to obey the German Emperor? It is, of course, most vexatious to Frenchmen to see Spain join, or attempt to join, the Austro-German Alliance; but that is no reason for forgetting all the rules of international courtesy. The consequence of this absurd sensitiveness will be that the Spanish Liberals, who are annoyed by their King's German proclivities, will feel the national dignity affronted, and will support the policy which so bitterly wounds the French. It is a great misfortune for France that of all her citizens, the journalists are the most sensitive and the least prudent.

The Austrian Government has suffered another severe blow in the Balkan. The Servian Ministry, presided over by M. Pirotchanatz, which is pro-Austrian, was considered so safe that King Milano went holiday-making to Vienna, and sought an audience of the Emperor of Germany at Homburg. The elections, however, were held in his absence, and resulted in so large a majority for the Radicals, who are Russian, or rather Slav, in sympathy, that the Ministry, even with the aid of the nominee third of the House, can only hope for a tie. The King has hurried back from his tour, M. Pirotchanatz will, it is assumed, resign, and the wildest reports are current. The King will, it is said, be deposed in favour of Prince Karageorgevitch, and another member of that family will be elected Prince of Bulgaria and Hospodar of East Roumelia. These are dreams, mostly. The Servians want a more Liberal Constitution, a little less subserviency to Austria, and an honest inquiry into the financial jobberies, some of them most discreditable, which produce their chronic deficit. If King Milano grants their demands, there will be no revolution; and if he does not, there will be many combinations tried before either Austria or Russia is invited to interfere. The Servians, like the Bulgarians, want to cook their own dinners at their own fires.

The Emperor of Germany was on Friday to unveil the grand national monument of the War of 1870. It is erected on the edge of the Niederwald, overlooking the Rhine, and its main feature is a colossal bronze statue of Germania, forty feet high, as a beautiful woman resting on a drawn sword and holding out an imperial crown. The figure rests on masses of masonry fifty feet high, and crowning as it does the brow of the Niederwald, is visible for miles. The festival was to be of the grandest character, and has been made the occasion of an outburst of enthusiasm for Germany, which, as the Times points out, has assumed the headship of Europe, yet does not go to war. That is just praise; but it should be added that, because of the ascendancy of Germany, two millions at least of Europeans live three years in barracks, and the Continent spends more than £100,000,000 a year in preparations for the war which does not come. Nor, as we have observed elsewhere, can politicians see that this Germany, though she keeps the peace by garrotting all the suspect, has as yet used her strength either to establish European freedom, or European law, or European ascendancy in the remainder of the world. Like her new statue, she only watches, guarding with naked blade her own property alone.

Nothing new has happened this week in the negotiations between France and China. It is reported and denied that the Chinese reply to the French proposals has been received, and reported and denied that the Chinese have forwarded an ultimatum. What appears to be true is that M. Ferry is at last nearly convinced that China will not give up Tonquin, and that he is doubtful whether to recede, or to protract negotiations till the meeting of the Chambers. The latter will probably be the course adopted. The Ministry cannot hand in an ultimatum to the Marquis Tseng, to be adopted by a definite date under penalty of war, for M. Grévy's consent must be obtained. M. Grévy is constitutional, and under the Constitution the Chambers enjoy the old Royal prerogative of making war or peace. It is true, this proviso was partly ignored in the Tunis case, but a war with China could not be commenced without a very large previous credit for military equipments, and the engagement of transport. France has no store of coal in Asia, and coal is not cheap. We incline to believe, therefore, that M. Ferry will discuss zones and the rest of his rather absurd proposals till the Session commences, and then ask the Deputies, formally or informally, whether they want Tonquin and a war, or Anam without one. That has been the plain issue all along.

There is some apprehension that the hand of the Chinese Government may be forced, but it is probably exaggerated. According to rumour, the mob of Pekin has shown excitement, and the War Party has, therefore, triumphed. The Marquis Tseng denies this, and it is antecedently improbable. That the public opinion of the Chinese is the ultimate force in China, the Government not having the means of sitting upon bayonets, is a truth which Europe is slowly learning, but the Government is not so weak as the rumour would indicate. It has a powerful garrison and a large Tartar mob in Pekin, upon both of which it can reckon, and it could in dangerous circumstances call up cavalry from the desert. It can, moreover, safely assure its people that Tonquin will not be surrendered, or even promise war if it is not evacuated. There is, no doubt, a strong war party among the great officials; but it acts under well-understood rules, and is not likely to incur the deadly enmity of the Court by encouraging mob coercion. In China, in matters of that kind men stake their heads, a fact which helps to explain the extreme caution and slowness with which all serious resolves are taken in Pekin.

Sir Evelyn Baring, the new British Representative at Cairo, has been interviewed by the correspondent of the Standard, and has stated his impression of the position in Egypt. It is not optimistic. Sir Evelyn repudiates all idea of permanent occupation, but affirms that the carrying out of needful reforms must take a very long time. The Courts were not yet ready, and could not be ready till the middle of December, and this is the first grand need. As for other things, he said, it is useless to press so hard, for reforms cost money, and the Egyptian Government, with the indemnities to pay, the Army of Occupation to support, and a war to carry on in the Soudan, has no money to spare. It is evident, therefore, that no remissions of taxation can be granted, and as nothing has been done to restrict the claims of usurers, it is clear that in Egypt we rather increase than reduce the pecuniary burdens on the people. That has been the invariable result of double government in the East, the people having to pay their own burdens and the foreign burdens too, without receiving in return the justice, order, and equality which are all that Europeans can secure to them. If they were governed, they would be content, though poor, for they would not be oppressed; and if they were let alone, they would deal with the oppressors, but at present they are frogs under a flagstone. They cannot lift it, or appeal to it for help.

The Rev. G. A. Shaw, the Missionary arrested at Tamatave, related his case on Thursday to a vast crowd in Exeter Hall. We have said enough of his statement elsewhere, but we wish to notice a statement made by the Rev. G. Cousins, of Antananarivo, of which more will be heard. This gentleman, who has resided nineteen years in the capital of Madagascar, bore emphatic testimony to what he called the "kindness" of the Malagasy to the French after the bombardment of Tamatave. They expelled all the French, but let them get safely to the coast, and drove away all the Roman Catholic priests, but still allowed Roman Catholics to practise their religion. Is not that rather an optimistic version of what happened? It seems to us that a French Foreign Minister, even of less acrid temper than M. Challemlacour, has fair ground for saying that the Malagasy plundered and expelled quiet French residents who had nothing to do with the bombardment, and persecuted Catholicism in the most effective way, by banishing all men competent to perform any offices of religion. That is certainly what he will say, and if Mr. Cousins's statement is true, we hardly wonder that French sailors and French priests are somewhat savage against Protestant teachers of religion. Exeter Hall would have been, if all Protestant teaching had been stopped, and Catholicism alone protected.

Mr. Biggar, who usually keeps himself well within the law, and reserves all violence for Parliament, has this week run an unusual risk. In a speech at Tullow, County Carlow, he is reported to have said:—"Of course, they were bound to speak against outrages; but if a man was a member of an organisation like the Land League, and took land directly or indirectly from which another man had been evicted, he thought that man should be asked to cease to be a member of that organisation; and the best way was to keep him outside of any social arrangements, and perhaps, to some extent, outside business arrangements. He did not make any recommendation; but they should give constant notice to the people who acted in this improper manner." That is unmistakeable advice to boycott any one who takes land vacated by eviction. It is not probable that the Government will honour Mr. Biggar by making him a martyr, but the incident reveals one of the grand perplexities of Irish Administration. If Mr. Biggar is prosecuted, a man of no weight, despised even by his own party, is raised into importance; if he is passed over, Mr. Healy may complain, with justice, that the Government does not execute the law, but picks victims.

Sir Richard Cross made a speech at Penrith, on Thursday, which even his own friends must have regarded as most foolish. Its drift was that the Government were sure to go wrong in all parts of the world, and, therefore, the country must watch them closely. They were in the wrong in Egypt, in promising to retire; in South Africa, in restoring Cetewayo; in Afghanistan, where "Russian emissaries" were again arriving; in Ireland, where their policy had produced anarchy; in India, about the Ilbert Bill; in short, everywhere. He suspected they were in the wrong in China. "They could not but view with alarm the prospects of a war between France and China. It was for the Government to deal with that question, but if it were not settled to the satisfaction of the British nation, comments would be made, in spite of what Lord Hartington might say, and the Government would be called to account." It is difficult to believe that the man who delivers that preposterous sentence was a leading member of the last Tory Cabinet, and has been spoken of for the leadership in the Commons of his great party. There was not in his speech one trace of "light and leading," or even of a thorough comprehension of the problems before the country.

The Royalist party in France, as we expected, has yielded completely to the Comte de Paris. He has signified privately through his friends, and semi-publicly through the Français, that he does not wish, for the present, to take the title of King, or to issue any manifesto. "To forestall a name is not enough to forestall fortune." He will be known, therefore, by the name he has always borne, and will remain quiet to watch events. This course displeases the more ardent Legitimists, and some of them have retired from politics; but the majority adhere to their principles, declare that the "King is King, whatever his ideas," and that, as he has the right to give the mot d'ordre, he has also the right to abstain from giving it. That is the only logical position for the party, unless it renounces the notion that leadership passes by hereditary right. If the King can be deposed because he is selfish and inactive, the Kingship is elective, the precise doctrine against which the Legitimists protest. The Orleanist leaders also have all acceded to the new order of things, which they do not quite approve, as they hold the Parliamentary idea as important as the idea of Royalty, but which adds to their social respectability. They can no longer be taunted as Brummagem Royalists.

The papers of North India cannot get over the idea that Russia and Great Britain are engaged in a duel of intrigue in Central Asia, and Reuter about once a fortnight solemnly informs us that a Russian has been seen in Herat, or Candahar, or Cabul, and that he was believed to be "an Agent of the Russian Government." The report is flashed to St. Petersburg and Simla, and is followed by grave statements that neither the Government of Russia nor that of India knows anything of such an Agent, and the public mind is more or less comforted. All the while, both Governments receive incessantly, though at intervals, reports from all important places in Central Asia, from paid native agents—as a rule, wonderfully accurate and trustworthy—and can, if they please, find any number of "Agents" who will remain unknown to the other side. The Indian Government has Mahomedan servants whom it can trust, and half the Armenians in Asia are, when required, ready to be Russian Mamelukes. It is simply impossible, in the present age of the world, to shut out spies, and quite ridiculous to try. Herat will no more become Russian because the Czar knows what is going on there, and can send a letter thither if he pleases, than Fez will become English because Lord Granville knows or can know exactly what the Sultan recently said to his Finance Minister. Do the Embassies in the different capitals, which are simply recognised organisations for espionage, breed wars, or prevent them?

The managers of the Panama Canal are raising money on debentures, and are circulating statements of the most hopeful kind. They say they have no difficulty as to their supplies of labour, that their people are contented and industrious, and that the work, though larger than was expected, is also lighter. The Company finds that it must remove 100,000,000 mètres of soil, instead of 80,000,000 mètres, but finds also that the increase is due to the enlarged width rendered necessary by the unexpectedly small proportion of hard rock encountered. Its engineers, therefore, believe not only that the work will be finished by 1888, but that, if M. de Lesseps chooses and the money is forthcoming, the opening may be expedited by another year. The debentures have all been taken up, the preposterous dividends of the Suez Canal having convinced Frenchmen that M. de Lesseps is a great financier, as well as a daring engineer. Considering the immense importance of this canal to commerce and to all colonies in the Pacific, it is surprising that "our special correspondent" has not yet made his appearance, to describe the works in detail.

The Biological Section of the British Association is strongly of opinion that a marine laboratory, or rather observatory, should be established upon the coast. The object is the close and continuous observation of the habits of fishes, and especially of the gregarious and edible fish which are essential to our food supply. It is said that we know next to nothing of the habits of the important fishes, and that the information acquired is constantly lost for want of record. Even the fishermen make blunders, and according to the Inspector of Salmon Fisheries constantly complain of things, certain kinds of net, for instance, which are in no way harmful. It is proposed to request the Committee of the Fisheries Exhibition to apply its surplus to the foundation of such an observatory, which might then be assisted in other ways. The project appears to be a thoroughly sensible one, and we recommend it to millionaires in want of an object either for expenditure or for legacies. A sum of £20,000 would fit up an excellent observatory.

On Tuesday, amidst the rather trumpery papers which are often read in the Biological Section, Dr. Stone gave an account of a very curious modification of aphasia which is occasionally observed. The patient who cannot express his thought accurately in words is occasionally unable to do so in writing, and Dr. Stone himself, when recovering from a mental attack produced by overwork, found himself reduplicating words, and even letters, in his correspondence. The "trick of including otiose letters in familiar words lasted for some time." The oddity of this occurrence consists in this, that the usual explanation of aphasia, the inability of the brain to control the nerves which regulate the mouth in speech, does not apply. The brain guides the hand rightly, but occasionally guides it twice over, doing more than its work, instead of less. The only possible explanation is that the two lobes of the brain are doing the same work separately and with an interval, as is believed to happen in that curious mental phenomenon, the existence of an impression that you have been similarly situated before. The separation of the two orders to write the same letter is, however, much more definite, the delay within the brain, as it were, automatically recording itself.

We confess we read with a certain dismay all articles, letters, and reports upon the Congo. They all come to this,—that the Congo, with its affluents, has a waterway of 4,500 miles; that it drains a territory far larger than Bengal—as big as India, some writers say—that the French and Portuguese, as well as ourselves, are making settlements; and that if the natives are to be well treated and British trade made secure, a Protectorate, either British or International, must be established over the huge valley. Mr. Stanley contends for the former solution, and the Times for the latter. Is it not for once possible to let both alone? International Protectorates involve international quarrels, of which there are enough; while the Protectorate of Great Britain alone involves not only the government of another huge slice of the world, but the growth of a feeling among the nations that Great Britain is a grand monopolist. She is everywhere, and leaves no room for anybody else. We might, if it were a duty to acquire the Congo, disregard that feeling, but strained as we are, with no conscription, and whole continents to protect, we think we might leave this new task to other hands. Even if the French undertake it, we shall have the trade, as we have in Anam, and we cannot see why we should stop them. As we pointed out last week, the English with their children, and the people of Spain and Portugal, already own every pleasant land not fully occupied, and there is no place for German, or Frenchman, or Italian. Is it indeed cowardly for the "weary Titan" to look askance at this new burden, and pass on without stooping?

The first number of Messrs. Macmillan's English Illustrated Magazine, at sixpence, has appeared this month, and deserves a word. The letterpress is neither better nor worse, that we see, than the letterpress of most magazines, but the illustrations, more especially those of a paper on Rossetti, are admirable. There is a profusion of them, nearly sixty altogether, executed with a delicate finish and softness to which in this country we have been entirely unaccustomed. "Lilith" alone is worth far more than the money. The single drawback to them is the shiny, over-glazed paper, which is, we suppose, essential to their production, but which, though popular with Americans, is to us detestable. We are not very friendly to illustrations, thinking that they invariably spoil stories, and do not improve essays; but as the public desires them, it is well that they should be the best of their kind procurable. These are the best, and we can only hope, in the interests of art, though the publishers will not agree with us, that the magazine may not have such a sale as will inevitably ruin the last impressions. The magazine marks a decided advance in the popularisation of Art.

DR. PANKHURST.

IT may prove that the managers of the Liberal party in Manchester, in refusing to fight the seat, have done a greater injury to the cause than we suspected. It is more than possible, it is quite probable, that Dr. Pankhurst may be returned as the third Liberal Member. Several Liberals of position, including Mr. Hugh Mason, have announced their intention of supporting him. They think his distinctive ideas will not signify in a Parliament like the present, they believe that, whatever he says, he will vote steadily for the Government, and they are irritated with the triumphant and taunting tone of the local Tories, whose nominee, Mr. Houldsworth, has most injudiciously called them cowards. A great body of the Liberal rank and file think any candidate better than none, if only he will keep the Tory out, and are completely conciliated by the promise to abide at the General Election by a test ballot; while the Parnellite Irish, who for a time hung back, have finally agreed to vote for Dr. Pankhurst. He is ready to vote for the local Government of Ireland "upon the Federal principle," and the difference between that and Home-rule is to them, as also to us, imperceptible. Finally, Dr. Pankhurst has the support of that large body, growing larger, we fear, every day, who do not study politics at all, and who ask only to be made certain that the candidate, whatever his views or his unwisdom, cares heartily for the masses of the people, which we have no reason to doubt Dr. Pankhurst does. If the body of the Liberals, the more extreme Radicals, and the bulk of the Irish finally declare for Dr. Pankhurst, he will have a heavy vote, and possibly a heavier one than Mr. Houldsworth, whose heavy dullness and passionate advocacy of the House of Lords will scarcely please even his own side.

This result, though it will secure two additional votes for Mr. Gladstone, is, in our judgment, a most disastrous one for the Liberal party. Against Dr. Pankhurst himself we have not a word to say. Difficult as it is for sane men to believe that he can honestly hold all his opinions, there is every reason to suppose that he does hold them, and that he is fighting for the seat as a fanatic, and not as an adventurer. If he gives a pledge, he will keep it, if he can; and we do not expect to see him voting on every possible occasion in the Tory ranks. But he is, of all recent candidates, the one who is most distinctively a crotchetier. His ideas are his ideas, not those of any section of the Liberal party. The most determined Radicals are not unanimous for universal suffrage, and are distinctly hostile to the swamping of all male votes in that of the large majority of women. They are opposed to all those projects either for confiscation or for the foolish expenditure of public money which are concealed under the phrase, "Nationalisation of the land." They desire rather to reform than to abolish the House of Lords. They are divided—probably about equally—about the disendowment of the Church, though more than half may be in favour of Disestablishment. They are almost to a man against Home-rule for Ireland. They do not believe that the United Kingdom can be well and wisely governed for £50,000,000 a year, and they utterly reject the notions that the Debt shall be decried, the Army abolished, the Navy attenuated, Church property confiscated, and the expense of administration reduced to its lowest point, simply to save money. Upon all these points Dr. Pankhurst is emphatically and, we may add, honourably distinct and precise. It is impossible to read his speech of Saturday, in Chorlton Town Hall, without seeing that he believes that if the government of England were committed to men of his opinions, £35,000,000 a year could be saved; or, we may add, without suspecting that in his secret heart he holds the taxation of the people to pay the interest of the National Debt to be a colossal injustice. His words, as reported in the Manchester Examiner, not a hostile paper, though its conductors understand politics too well to support him heartily, are as follows:—

"The national expenditure had recently been £85,000,000, and it was not hard to see how they could bring that down to £50,000,000. Such a saving would work a wonderful, sweet, transforming effect upon their lives and upon their destinies. He had £35,000,000. How should he deal with it? ("Divide it.") That was just what he was going to do. The interest on the National Debt stood at £29,000,000. That charge was created by a policy hostile to the men of labour, in exclusive defence of bad pretensions and wrong and unjust privileges. It was chiefly and above all in defence of landlords. Up to 1832 the House of Lords and the House of Commons were the private property of landlords. Suppose a lord with a big estate that was falling to ruin. That nobleman, a member of an assembly having great power of influencing the money grant, would very naturally feel inclined, when all this money was going about, to get some, if possible, for his property. Since this £29,000,000 per annum was a charge due to the defence of a bad system of landholding, let us so arrange the land that it should be better and more wisely held, and out of the money savings of an improved land system let us pay this yearly charge. The change would do far more than that. First of all, there was land that never went out of the ownership of the State—common land; then there was corporate property and Church property. (A voice: "Private property.") How could it be considered private property? As to Church lands, the only question was how far down towards the present ought they to come in interfering with the givers' views about how the State should use the property which he had given to the State. The old endowments ought to be dealt with without regard to the way in which they were now used; the modern endowments ought to be dealt with with reference to their present user, having regard to their being national property. The lands he had spoken of would far more than pay the yearly charge of the National Debt. Then there was the Army, representing an annual expenditure of about £16,000,000. He believed that the country would have all it needed, if it kept up a small body of trained troops to train others, and the bulk of the soldiers were volunteers. In this way an enormous saving would be effected. Then there was the expenditure upon the Navy, about £10,000,000 a year, and, though he would not reduce this so much as he would reduce the other items, he thought that it was capable of a great diminution in the public interest. In this way, he would bring down the expenditure of the country to £50,000,000 a year."

We suppose we need not point out the absurdity of all that, or argue that a Volunteer Army, even if it could defend us from invasion, could not protect the Empire; or point out that the Debt was incurred with the passionate, though, we admit, informal consent of the people; or even calculate that £3,000,000 taken from the Church, and £12,000,000 saved upon the Army, and £5,000,000, say, taken from the Navy, do not represent £35,000,000, which, even if we throw in corporate property and waste land, could not be made up without an attack upon the Debt, or the starvation of the Civil Administration. We may admit that the figures given are only evidences of ignorance which experience would correct, and still we may ask if Dr. Pankhurst is deserving of Radical support. Is a man with these opinions a fitting representative of the third city in the kingdom? His friends may say that in electing him they elect a "general supporter of Mr. Gladstone's Government," but they also elect a man whose election the enemies of that Government can quote with reason as proof that Radicals detest, though they submit to, the payment of the Debt, that they do not respect property if there is any pretext for calling it national, that they understand nothing of the real utility of Army and Navy, and that they are prepared for the maddest experiments, if only by trying them they may temporarily reduce taxation. They are, in fact, driving all Whigs, all Moderates, and all cool Democrats into that huge Party of Common-sense which never dies in England, and which, if Radicals do not show a little more judgment, may, before long, overwhelm them.

We claim to be Radicals of the most sincere type, earnestly desirous that the State should be governed not only for the people, but by the people,—that all privilege should be abolished, that all should be legally equal, all educated, and all protected and aided to the limit of possibility by the corporate strength of the Commonwealth; and we warn Radicals in deep sadness that it is here we see their most immediate and pressing danger. They are far too ready to tolerate any opinion, even one which is demonstrably nonsensical, if only they are convinced that the man who puts it forward cares for the body of the people. Nothing offends them but hardness. They endure and even like every kind of crotchetier. No matter what the proposal—the abolition of the Army, which would mean the loss of all dominion outside Britain; or Home-rule for Ireland, which means the separation of the Islands; or the reduction of the Navy, which means the blockade of an island unable to grow its own food; or universal female suffrage, which means female government; or the nationalisation of the land, which means either gigantic confiscation or the purchase of the soil at the price of three National Debts and the crushing of all but peasants with new taxes—there are thousands who will, to support it, postpone all reasonable and attainable political ends. The best candidate is nothing to them, if he will not support their nostrum; and the worst is palatable to them, if he will. They will not look beyond the idea, and will vote for a man certain to propose excessive or even irrational expense, if only he will resist a twopenny-halfpenny outlay—which, we may add, we dislike in principle as much as they do—upon hereditary pensions. It is not that they are foolish. If they were, if they were merely misled by ignorance, we could trust to argument, or, at worst, to gradual enlightenment; but the evil lies deeper than this. It is a strange and a melancholy truth that one-half of those who support crotchets do not believe them, see the folly of them, and only like their authors because they see even in those crotchets proof of a feeling which they approve. Suppose five thousand voters in Manchester—English voters, we mean—heartily on Dr. Pankhurst's side. Four thousand of them will know perfectly well that the Army cannot be abolished, that the Debt cannot be paid except out of taxes, that a third of the national expenditure cannot be saved by any practicable economy. Two thousand at least would not abolish the Army if they could, would consider any kind of tampering with the Debt monstrous, and are desirous of civil expenditures such as would largely increase taxation; and yet the whole five thousand will vote for Dr. Pankhurst, because they say he wants to make the people happier. The idea that hard sense, rigid arithmetic, adherence to facts, is as necessary to the good as to the bad, to philanthropists as to monopolists, to Radicals as to Tories, seems wholly absent from their minds. They want a millennium of peace and prosperity, and believe that anybody who also wants it will bring it nearer, irrespectively of his mental powers. He may talk nonsense, but he is "of the right sort." Some of them would perhaps like acres, though that is not a general wish, and will support the man who wishes to give them ten apiece, even if they know, and are conscious that they know, that the acres have no existence. That makes no difference; he wishes well to them and to the world, and the man who says all acres are appropriated, and if they were not, are only two for each person, does not. So deeply do we feel the growth of this tendency, which is in its essence unreasoning pity for others as well as for themselves, that but for the hard sense of the majority we should seriously dread a currency craze in this country, an issue of paper money being advocated as the most plausible mode of relieving suffering, which in five years would produce a huge catastrophe. It seems to us that the first duty of reasoning Liberals, however Radical, is to fight this tendency, to admit that the great laws which impose upon mankind labour, suffering, and self-sacrifice are irreversible, and to insist that whoever leads, crotcheteers shall not. We admit that Dr. Pankhurst is honestly dreaming, and not pretending to dream; and therefore we prefer, if we are forced to make the choice, a sensible Tory to Dr. Pankhurst.

THE GREAT SENTINEL.

IT is very good of Germany, being, as she is, so much stronger than anybody else, not to use her strength in conquering everybody around. That is, we suppose, the true meaning of the hymns to Germany now pouring from the English newspapers, hymns which not only ascribe to her the leading place in Europe, but bless her for taking such a place and making such a use of it. Upon that supposition, there is, we heartily admit, reason for praise. In the regular historical course of events, Germany, after organising herself, and ascertaining that her Army was the strongest in the world, and defeating her bitterest rival, ought to have devoted herself to conquest, to have annexed Bohemia, and swallowed Holland, and driven Russia across the Vistula; to have subdued Italy, and have planted Viceroy in the Balkan; to have built up in outline a European Monarchy, and finally, to have attacked England, and after years of wasteful warfare to have been beaten back within her ancient limits. That is the proper historic sequence, which has happened once a century since the discovery of America. Spain rose to the headship, founded the mightiest organisation for war seen in Europe up to that time, conquered wherever she listed, attacked England, and in a great storm off the Orkneys lost her leadership. Louis XIV. raised 400,000 men, previously considered an impossible number, disciplined them under a caste of warlike though profligate nobles, conquered or defeated all he encountered, roused the patriotism of England, and, after years of defeat, was rattled to his grave like a pauper, to escape the curses of his own subjects. Napoleon raised a million of men, organised them under a caste of picked experts in war, mastered Europe State by State, attacked England, and died a prisoner in a waterless African island. Germany, since 1870, has been wiser and, even if keen calculation has entered into her action, better than any predecessor. The Emperor William attained in 1870 just the position which tempts potentates to dream of universal sway, and has withheld his hand, and pronounced definitely for peace in his own time. The world, therefore, though restless, suspicious, and armed to the teeth, is preserved from the grand calamity of European war. Such a war cannot be waged without Germany's permission. Prince Bismarck, as Mr. Tenniel, with that rare instinct of genius which penetrates much deeper than ability, this week depicts him, instead of riding forth on the pale horse to scatter death, stands armed and burly as the Great Sentinel at the door of the Temple of Janus, to see that no one uncloses it. Let that attitude be honoured, even though there be more strain in it than Mr. Tenniel paints—what can he have been thinking of, to let Prince Bismarck lo!—and though its motive be not the love of peace, but a clear perception of the interests of Germany. The sentry's first duty is to his post, even though he has duties to himself and to the world.

But, nevertheless, we see no good in this adulation of Germany, or in concealing that while her headship is indefinitely more moral and less oppressive than it might have been, it is far lower in character than it should be, and than, from the high German standard of thought, it might have been expected to become. In the first place, it is not headship at all, unless it be headship of the kind which Austria once possessed in Germany. The King at best is but a King Veto. Prince Bismarck, accepting him, as we fairly may, as incarnate Germany, leads Europe no-whither, neither to peace, nor to freedom, nor to prosperity, nor even to an organised and regulated control of the world in the world's interest. If he did, and did it successfully; if, for instance, he issued and enforced, as mouthpiece of Federated Europe, an International Code, under which the nations might rest, confident that sudden or piratical injustice could not be perpetrated, or would be punished, there could, we admit, be no hymn so loud that it would exceed the deserving of Germany and its chief. Prince Bismarck has neither done nor attempted to do anything of the kind. It is the very speciality of his greatness or of Germany's that, though no one is attacked, all remain suspicious; and that, under the terror of what he or Germany may do, the bonds which had begun to unite Europe are melting visibly away. There is no "Europe," no irresistible tribunal to which all can appeal. Prince Bismarck has so treated France and Russia, so bid them keep apart, so scolded and menaced them, that even a temporary unity of Europe is impossible. There is no tribunal left to which a wronged nation—say, little Denmark—can appeal; no Council which has at once the strength and the justice to make an award too final to be appealed against, too irresistible to be ignored. To appeal to Europe is to appeal to a Committee in which each Judge wears revolvers, each is thinking how best to secure advantage by his vote, and each would be at the other's throat, but that the great and gloomy Sentinel keeps fast the door. There is peace, but can Europe agree that it shall be peaceful peace, or release her young men from their sterile life of drill and barrack, or settle any boundary past attack, or assign any territory fallen in the course of events out of guardianship or order? Not only is the beneficial influence of Europe not increased by the hegemony of Germany, but it is positively decreased, and that for reasons almost openly cynical. The great Sentinel dreads no attack, but he watches for attack; and to diminish the possibility of attack, he openly tells all who are piratically inclined to plunder as they will elsewhere. England would like Egypt. "Right," shouts the Sentinel, "let England have Egypt," not as Englishmen think, because that is best for the world, but because, if England and France are at loggerheads, the Temple of Janus, which to its Sentinel is a German Temple, must keep shut. France wants Tunis, Tonquin, Madagascar. "Good!" cries the Sentinel, for then Italy is against France, and China also, and perhaps the owner of continental South Africa. Austria wants the western half of the Balkan peninsula. "Glorious!" cries the Sentinel, "for without me Austria cannot keep it, and I may pace here with the Hapsburg to guard my side." Any Power may take anything outside the charmed beat whereon the Sentinel paces, and there is no appeal, save to the sword, which he, in the vision of his eulogists, has ordered to be sheathed. Mr. Tenniel is right, and the Times wrong. Germany, under the Prince, is not using her gigantic power,—a power which grows day by day, till one dreads to think what future wielders of the magic sword may do with it—in order to enforce Law in the world, but only to ensure that the lawless shall not enter the sacred precincts of a single armoury, which also is her own. We do not condemn that selfishness, though throughout all Europe it heaps toil on man, and though in Eastern Europe it crushes freedom, for no nation can fairly be expected to rise beyond the morality of its age, and as yet the distinction between patriotism and selfishness is not drawn; but then, neither do we feel tempted to sing hymns to the burly and formidable Sentinel. He does his work well, without fearing, without faltering, without demanding perquisites, but earth has had in it nobler figures than a Sentinel can be. Charles Martel played the part once, and he was great; but who reckons him with Charlemagne?

We say nothing of the result of this headship, so maintained, to Germany herself. The historian of the future may be able to decide that if Germany had, by a few wise concessions, soothed away foreign suspicion, and if she had insisted that her own people should be left free, she would have been far happier; but that is not now a just comment. Germany has a right to rule her own life, and if she prefers the organisation of the barrack to the organisation of the free Commonwealth, her preference is outside any but speculative criticism. She may be wise, for only she can know what her true danger from the Eastward is, or what she might suffer from the West; and if she is not right, she, at all events, bears her own burden. Save in a corner here and there, she has enchained no nation, and takes no help from unwilling slaves. It is for her to judge of her own action, to express her own aspirations, to settle her own destiny. It is only when she claims a European rôle that she is justly liable to European criticism, and must be told that while in her magnificent position she has, since 1870, conquered no one, and taxed no one, and injured no one, while she has shown neither fear, nor greed, nor over-much vanity, she has cynically thrust aside the greatest duties her position has entailed, and must expect from the critics who welcomed her deliverance from bondage no warmer praise than this,—that she has misused a limitless strength far less than any predecessor. She has guarded her house well, and stayed within it; but she has freed no people, prevented no outrage, established no law under the shelter of which free men may live in peace. All those things she may do, but they are not done, and we reserve applause until the nobler work has been performed.

MR. SHAW'S STATEMENT.

THE tone of the Meeting at Exeter Hall which welcomed the returned Missionaries from Madagascar on Thursday night was all that could be desired, and Mr. Shaw's account of his sufferings was straightforward, simple, and temperate. The narrative which he had to tell was, indeed, from first to last, of such an astounding kind, that no rhetorical artifice was needed to secure attention for its details and to enhance its painful interest. The source of Admiral Pierre's hostility to Mr. Shaw is still involved in mystery, and the most plausible explanation of it appears to be that, being a Missionary, and also President of the Committee of Safety of British Subjects at Tamatave, he appeared to the Admiral to be the most conspicuous and typical representative of England in the place. He was accordingly singled out for special punishment, to prove to his compatriots that France was not to be trifled with. Of any actual or contemplated breach of neutrality on the part of Mr. Shaw there does not seem to be the slightest evidence. The charges which were successively trumped up against him were obviously the merest pretexts. The accusation of harbouring the enemy, by retaining Hova servants in his employ, was disproved within a few hours of its being made by the evidence of the servants themselves, who belonged to a different tribe. No intimidation, however, was given to Mr. Shaw that the charge had been abandoned, or that another had been substituted for it, and during the first fourteen days of his imprisonment he was kept absolutely in the dark as to the cause of his detention. On the fifteenth day, the Captain of the 'Nièvre' informed him for the first time that he was accused of attempting to poison the French picket which had been stationed at his house. It was, of course, notorious that Mr. Shaw's premises had been broken open, that the contents of his cellar and his dispensary had been thrown together by the thieves, and that if the French Marines had been decently disciplined and officered, the misadventure from which they suffered would never have occurred. The second charge was, therefore, transparently ridiculous, as even Admiral Pierre seems after a time to have recognised. Accordingly, on the twenty-second day, it was abandoned, and Mr. Shaw was given to understand that he was to be tried for his "imprudence" in not informing the French Commander that some of the bottles in the garden contained poisonous compounds. One would be glad to know in what part of the law of nations the duty of a neutral to give information to a belligerent is laid down, and his "imprudence" in omitting to do so declared to be a crime. At last, this flimsy pretext having served its turn, and the Admiral being, no doubt, at last aware of the disapproval of his Government, Mr. Shaw was told that there was not "sufficient evidence" to justify his trial by a court-martial, and he was set at liberty. There is no need to dwell on the privations he suffered during his captivity,—the stifling cabin, the solitary confinement, the bad and insufficient food, the brutality which denied him even the sight of his wife. Mr. Shaw, doubtless, exaggerates none of these incidents, and they will all be legitimate items in his claim for compensation, but as between the two Governments concerned nothing can add to the gravity of the question which is raised by the simple facts which we have already stated. There has been, it must be remembered, abundant time for the French authorities to sift the case. Mr. Shaw's imprisonment terminated as long ago as the 7th August. If there were any evidence to refute or modify his version of the circumstances, it would have been forthcoming before now; and as no such evidence has been or apparently can be produced, we are justified in inferring that we now know all that is to be known about the case.

For our own part, the fuller statement of Mr. Shaw confirms us in the opinion which we at first expressed. The proceedings of Admiral Pierre appear to us to be only explicable on one hypothesis,—that they were the acts of one who had been reduced by disease to the condition of a dangerous and irresponsible madman. If any credit is to be attached to M. Challemeil-Lacour's solemn official utterances, the Admiral had been expressly instructed to avoid any measure which could wound British susceptibilities. Allowing him the widest discretion in the interpretation of his orders, it is incredible that any sane man could have fancied that he was carrying them out by insulting the British Consul, quarrelling with the British Commander, and imprisoning a British subject for the best part of two months on a succession of improvised charges of the most farcical absurdity. We know that Admiral Pierre was suffering, and soon afterwards died, from a disease one of whose specific marks is the inroad which it makes on the mental powers. If it is true, as is asserted, that he was recalled at his own request, it would seem probable that in time he himself became conscious that he was disabled for his work. Everything that we know of his conduct at Tamatave falls so far short of even the lowest estimate that the most hostile critics have ever formed of a French officer's judgment, tact, and courtesy, that this explanation, being as it is otherwise probable, appears to us to be the one which the public should at least provisionally adopt. It is quite true that it in no way diminishes the responsibility of the French Republic for what has occurred. Great States ought not to employ mad officers, and if they do, they must take the consequences, one of which is the liability to make atonement for insults that they never contemplated, and would have done all in their power to prevent. But a recognition on both sides that what has happened was due to the regrettable decay of a gallant officer's faculties will make the task of repairing the injury a far smoother one than it would otherwise have been, and to those who value the good relations of the two countries this is no small advantage. England may then anticipate, without demanding it, that regret will be expressed and compensation offered for an unintended wrong. France, which has already paid due honour to the fine qualities of the deceased Admiral, cannot hesitate to disavow acts which were committed in defiance of her explicit orders, and which can be explained without any reflection on the loyalty and obedience of her officer. No one here can have the least desire to exaggerate, and no one in France the least disposition to justify, an incident which, fortunately, is almost without a precedent. There ought, therefore, to be no difficulty in arranging a settlement which will satisfy English honour, without wounding French self-respect.

THE INVASION OF ULSTER.

IS Ulster converted, or likely to be converted, to Nationalism? The Parnellite invasion of Tyrone and the adjoining counties ought to supply the answer to this, the most important, and perhaps the most difficult, of the problems which obscure the future of Irish politics. Notwithstanding that it includes the poor and sparsely-peopled county of Donegal, Ulster contains a third of the population, and probably at least the same proportion of the wealth of Ireland. Unless, therefore, Ulster can be won, Mr. Parnell is very well aware that the Nationalist movement will be national only in name. A mere numerical majority, recruited, as his antagonists can plausibly assert, from the poverty and ignorance of the more backward Provinces, is altogether insufficient for his purpose. The demand for a repeal of the Union, whether it aims at the substitution of a Federal tie, or at the creation of an independent State, will neither impress the imagination nor convince the judgment of onlookers, until it can be clearly shown that Ireland is substantially at one in making it. The severance of Ulster from the rest of Ireland is a geographical, and, therefore, a political impossibility; and if the English people were as eager as they are reluctant to abandon the sister-country to a Native Parliament, the opposition of Ulster would be an insuperable moral obstacle to the accomplishment of their wish. We are not going to create a new Hungary, which will reproduce the Croatian difficulty on a larger scale, and with all the additional risks of bitterness involved in the chronic disaffection of the wealthiest, most intelligent, and most progressive Province in the country. All this we may take it that Mr. Parnell, the coolest and shrewdest of Irish agitators, knows as well as any of his critics; he is determined accordingly, at all costs, to overcome the recalcitrance of Ulster; and he is not likely to underrate the magnitude of the task which he has set himself. Out of the twenty-nine Members returned by Ulster to Parliament, no less than twenty-seven were, at the commencement of the present year, declared opponents of Home-rule. At the general election of 1880, the small border county of Cavan, which has long enjoyed the privilege of being represented by Mr. Biggar, was the only place in the Province in which the Nationalists effected a lodgment. In 1881, they made a determined but futile attack upon Tyrone. Last year they renewed the attempt in Londonderry, and were again signally defeated. The return of Mr. Healy for Monaghan encouraged them to fresh efforts. Ulster was marked out as the chief battle-ground of the autumn campaign, and this week operations have been formally commenced by the invasion of Tyrone.

The data for forming a correct opinion as to the probable results of Mr. Parnell's latest move are singularly meagre. If we were to judge exclusively by the general election of 1880, and the bye-elections of the two following years, we should predict with confidence a disastrous rebuff. If we were to judge exclusively by Mr. Healy's easy victory in Monaghan last spring, we should be led to an exactly opposite forecast. But the truth is that none of these events throw much light upon the issue of the new campaign. The agrarian agitation and the proceedings of the Irish Party during the four Sessions of the present Parliament have been factors of such importance in the formation of Irish opinion, that they upset all reckonings which date back to the contest of 1880. The victory of Mr. Dickson, one of the apostles of tenant-right, in Tyrone, and that of Mr. Porter in Londonderry, which must in any case be one of the last counties to abandon the Union, may be explained by local and personal causes, and in neither instance was the Nationalist issue brought into prominence. Still less significance attaches to Mr. Healy's triumph, which was little more than the grateful tribute of the farmers of Monaghan to the author of the celebrated Healy Clause. In the absence of positive evidence one way or the other, we are left to conjecture, and we must endeavour, therefore, to imagine the kind of considerations which are likely to influence the mind of a average Ulster elector at the present moment in favour of the establishment of a Native Parliament. "The English," he might reflect, "have held our country for seven centuries; for more than three out of the seven they have been actively meddling with her affairs; during the last fifty years they have been honestly trying to govern her well. And what is the result? Wherever the eye turns, it is confronted with the evidence of failure. It sees natural resources undeveloped, local business mismanaged by a privileged class, public spirit extinguished, and individual initiative stifled, under the weight of an artificial system which forbids us to give effect in our own way to our own ideas of civic and national life. Over three-fourths of the country rebellion is only prevented by force or the fear of force, and even those of us who are loyal are normally subjected to irritating espionage and semi-despotic laws. The Imperial Parliament is so far away, and so busy with other matters, that we can only attract its notice by noisy and demoralising agitation, and as soon as it has satisfied us for the moment, it turns aside to more engrossing duties, and banishes all thought of us and our concerns. Even when we have wrung from it some valuable concession, the boon is frittered away by the grudging and unsympathetic spirit in which it is administered. We know by the admissions of the Duke of Argyll and Mr. Chamberlain, that but for the Land League the Land Act would never have been carried, or even conceived. The real authors of the Land Act are Mr. Parnell and Mr. Healy; the one made it possible, the other rendered it effective. The Irish Parliamentary party have, for the first time, compelled England to give continuous attention to Irish grievances, and the useful Irish legislation of the last three Sessions is all due to them, and would in an Irish Parliament have been trebled in quantity. England means well, but she does not and cannot understand us; and if she could, she has not time to spare for our affairs. The old Irish Parliament was not a great success; the new one may be a failure. But it can hardly be a greater failure than the system which it replaces. If there is any truth in the doctrines of democracy, the presumptions are all in its favour; and if it turns out to be unworkable or incompetent—if the dream that we are fit to make our own laws and guide our own destiny proves to be an illusion—it is at any rate an illusion which we had a right to test; and when we are disenchanted, we shall be ready with a good grace to submit our necks again to the yoke."

It is in the persuasive force of arguments like these, and not in the unintelligent hatred for England to which the Parnellite orators habitually appeal, and which in many of them is beyond doubt a genuine and consuming passion, that the real strength of the Nationalist cause in Ulster will be found. And if they are to be forced to a choice between Home-rule and the continuance of the existing system of discredited and irritating centralisation, the English confidence in the traditional loyalty of Ulstermen may before long be rudely disappointed. But we see little reason to fear serious results from the campaign which has just begun. There is abundant evidence that Ulster has not succumbed to the moral paralysis which has crept over the rest of Ireland during the last three years, and so long as the equivocal relations of Mr. Parnell and his colleagues with the outrage-mongers of the Land League remain unexplained, he has little chance of obtaining a foothold in the Northern Province. Nor are his chief lieutenants, able and eloquent though several of them are, fitted either by nature or by training for the propaganda which they have now taken in hand. The blind hostility to England which lies at the root of their faith, the reckless vituperation of English statesmen which forms the staple of their rhetoric, the conventional hysterics in which they express their devotion to down-trodden Ireland, will find no echo in an ordinary Ulster audience. The simple truth is that in Ulster England is not hated, and that, once given control over their own local business, the vast majority of Ulstermen would recognise that they have far more to lose than to gain by the substitution of an Irish for an Imperial Parliament. In any possible revival of the Native Legislature, the voice of Ulster, the most separate and, at the same time, the richest and most intelligent of the Four Provinces, would habitually be overborne by the combined votes of the other three. The stronghold of Irish Protestantism, she would lie at the mercy of an Ultramontane majority. The one corner of the country in which manufactures flourish, she would be taxed in support of fantastic schemes for the introduction of impossible industries, and (in an independent Ireland) would see her wealth slowly dwindle away under a Protective tariff. What inducement is there for Ulster to relinquish the prerogative place which she has for centuries held as the British outpost in Ireland, and voluntarily to subject herself to neighbours whose interests and sympathies are so widely different from her own? Why should she abandon her right to a direct voice in the affairs of a whole kingdom, and to a distinctive place in the most ancient and famous of Parliaments, in order to furnish a despised minority to an obscure provincial Diet? The very same sentiment which gives so much of its seeming strength to the general Irish demand for Home-rule—the desire for a separate and conspicuous position in the world—in Ulster makes altogether for the maintenance of the Union. The Union is safe so long as Ulster is loyal, and the loyalty of Ulster is in far greater danger from the short-sighted indifference of English statesmanship, than from the most strenuous efforts of the Parnellite propaganda.

THE FUTURE SUEZ CANAL.

THERE are some aspects of the Suez-Canal Question which have not been sufficiently studied. In the heated discussion which followed the announcement of the Government scheme, it was, perhaps, natural that the practical sides of the matter should be forgotten. Some Englishmen had persuaded themselves that we ought to have a Canal of our own, made with English money and managed by English brains. To such people, anything approaching to an acknowledgment of the vested rights of the French Company was abhorrent, and in the storm which followed, the economic advantages of the proposed loan scarcely received consideration. The idea that there was anything which omnipotent English capital had not a right to carry out was a heresy so profound, that burning, not reasoning, was clearly the proper course to pursue.

It may, of course, be very annoying, but England has to thank herself alone for the exceptional position occupied by M. de Lesseps. He has carried out his great project in spite of English opposition, and his Company have at least undisputed ownership of the only existing waterway across the Isthmus. To make a parallel independent Canal, and underbid the Company, would simply mean the ruin of the latter. A new Canal, to be worked in conjunction with the existing Canal, must be subject to the same Direction, and could not be managed by an independent English Company on principles of its own. Fancy the Great Northern Railway working its own up-line between Edinburgh and London, and leaving its down-line to be worked by the London and North-Western. Let us grant then, if only for the purpose of argument, that M. de Lesseps has a monopoly of water transport across the Isthmus, and endeavour to see what it is that the requirements of English commerce demand. The complaints of shipowners are practically two,—first, that the transit dues are excessive; and, secondly, that the Canal is insufficient for its traffic. As to the first point, it is to be observed that, desirable as it may be for the general interest that the dues should be reduced as much as possible, still, it can hardly be maintained that they are so high as to operate as a check on British commerce. The concentration of the Eastern trade on the Suez route, and the large number of ships built specially for the Canal passage, prove the contrary; while, until recently, no great complaint on this score was raised. On the other hand, the inadequacy of the Canal is a great and growing evil, while there is also an increasing amount of irritation at its management,—a management conducted entirely on French principles. The Englishman abroad is apt to resent some of the railway regulations he has to put up with, but these regulations are at least framed by men who presumably know their own business. The Suez Canal, however, has been managed by civil engineers and financiers guiltless of any knowledge of naval matters, and the British skipper feels aggrieved at having to take on board an expensive French pilot, who is of no earthly use, except to interpret a few perfectly simple signals. On August 20th, last year, a great fleet of transports navigated the Canal without pilots and without a hitch of any kind; and during the few days in which Englishmen held and worked the Canal, everything went well, in spite of the crowding. The affair was managed by able Naval officers, who knew perfectly well what they were about. It is, nevertheless, certain that the Canal is now insufficient for its work, if indeed it were ever otherwise. This is not so much the result of an increase in the number of vessels, which only reaches an average of nine per day, as of the great increase of length and tonnage. It is not difficult to understand that the section of a canal should bear some minimum ratio to the section of the vessels which navigate it, and six to one has been the ratio usually prescribed. The Suez Canal has a section of about 3,500 square feet, and ships with 1,000 feet of immersed section use it. In comparison, therefore, the Regent's Park Canal is probably a more capacious waterway, while the North Sea Canal is much better adapted to its requirements. The result at Suez is continual grounding, causing delay, annoyance, and uncertainty. The time occupied in the Canal passage is, in fact, a matter of pure luck. Even setting grounding aside, under the present block system, the time does not depend on the number of ships to be passed in the Canal, but merely on the way in which these ships chance to present themselves. Moreover, if a ship sticks fast—a very ordinary occurrence—it is not the Company's interest to get her off rapidly, and their rules even prohibit a following ship from rendering any assistance. Among such trivial regulations as that if a passenger drops an "objet" overboard (say his hat), he must not take any steps to recover it, but must report the matter to the officials of the Company, there is no regulation as to the rudder-power of ships. Some of our great lines provide supplementary rudders to be fitted to their ships for the Canal passage, but such vessels may be preceded by any ill-found "ditcher," which, for want of this simple provision, may take the ground and detain them for a couple of days.

The placing of the control of the navigation in the hands of an English Naval officer, as proposed by the Government and most inadequately appreciated, together with a revision of the pilotage regulations, would probably do much to allay irritation; but the fact remains that the present Canal is far too small for its work, and must be very considerably widened, whether a new Canal is constructed or not. Moreover, the new Canal must have a much larger section than the present. Failing this, there will be no advantage whatever in an up and down line for traffic. Ships do not stick fast by jamming in passing each other, but by individually running on shore simply because the channel is not wide enough for navigation. Two Canals each as liable to be blocked as the existing waterway, entailing either a stoppage of all ships proceeding in one direction, or the disorganisation of the working of the clear Canal by temporarily using it as a double line, would give no advantages at all. The alternative is, therefore, either to give a substantial addition to the present channel, and to construct a new Canal of equal dimensions to the present Canal enlarged, or to convert the existing Canal into a really magnificent waterway. If we can reconcile ourselves to the abandonment of the idea of having a separate Canal all to ourselves, there can be little doubt that the latter of these projects is by far the best. The cost will be considerably less; the advantages will begin to be felt at once. The difficulties of navigation will disappear, and the speed can be increased, while the working expenses will hardly be greater than at present. It is worth noticing that, according to the Parliamentary papers, the project of the second Canal was first proposed by the English Directors at a meeting of the Works Committee, and that it was opposed by MM. de Rouville and Dauzats, who were probably better able to form an opinion on the subject than any one present. Should the Government reconsider the Suez-Canal Question, it is to be hoped that they will give full weight to the many arguments which can be brought forward in favour of a single broad Canal, and that they will take the opinion of men who, like the captains of our Indian troopships, are well acquainted with the navigation of the Canal. Their advice, as well as that of the great hydraulic engineers of this country, should be consulted, as a healthy corrective to the views of the English Directors, now that England is again free to act. It is of vast importance that the settlement of this question shall be framed with such sagacity and foresight as to command the adhesion and respect of both present and future interests. And it is of some importance that the plan adopted should have the support of the best engineers, as well as of the shipowners, who have had hitherto a monopoly of the discussion.

CHILDREN AND THEIR DINNERS.

WE wonder whether it is quite impossible to feed one generation properly. We are no seekers after Utopia, and have little faith that man, with all his efforts, will ever escape his grey destiny of toil for bare food; but it is difficult to read papers like those laid before the British Association on the British people without speculating once more on the possibility, by some great effort, of giving a dead-heave to the race. The whole drift of the Report prepared by Sir Rawson Rawson and his confrères, summarised in the Times of Monday, is to indicate that while man is nearly powerless to modify "racial tendencies,"—those family peculiarities which, as we see in the Jews, survive all ages and all circumstances, and which can be effaced, if at all, only by crossings—he, nevertheless, has the power to modify for good some primary conditions. He cannot by taking thought add a cubit to his stature, but he can, by self-sacrifice, add inches to the stature of his children. It may be taken as proved that, subject always to the permanent tendencies of a special race, man gains height and weight, that is, permanent capacity for work and permanent ease in living, from judicious and plentiful food. The hereditary poor are not, as is so often fancied, stronger or healthier than the hereditary rich. The latter popular impression has long since been dissipated by the evidence of doctors, who know well how disease conquers the hereditary poor, and how low is their vitality; and the latter illusion is only maintained, as Mr. Hughes once pointed out in "Tom Brown at Oxford," by the strength which the poor acquire from doing hard work every day. The well-fed Guardsman, if he worked every day, would throw the navvy in a wrestle, if fed like a common labourer. The higher class of Englishmen, characterised by Sir R. Rawson as the "upper and professional classes," are found to be in physique the first of civilised races; indeed, excepting a few Polynesians and, we may add, some negro races on the Upper Nile (vide Dr. Werne's measurements, given in his two books of travel there), the first among mankind. As the upper class include men of all the British races, and, perhaps, a majority of the under-sized races, for the little, dark men of Keltic strain tend to the vigorous life of towns, they can owe this advantage and its correlative, health—which could be even more conclusively proved—only to good nourishment continued for generations. They are fed properly, and fed enough,—that is, they are able to buy what they want, and have arrived by the empiricism of ages at a clear perception of what suits them best to eat. What suits them is a diet in childhood more or less of milk and flour; in boyhood, of bread, meat, and vegetables; in manhood, of meat, bread, and vegetables in proportions which, though they vary with every individual, vary, we suspect, with every thousand very little indeed. We have, therefore, if not a perfect scientific law, a rule for diet based on a vast body of successful experiment, which it is fairly safe to obey. If we could feed our entire race as gentlefolks are fed, it would develop much higher corporeal vigour, and habitually tend to confirmed health,—an enormous gain, both to its energy and, what is much more important in the present stage of Western civilisation, to its happiness.

Is that possible? We believe that substantially it is impossible, as regards the present generation of adults. We cannot give them all, including the vast masses of the unskilled and the half-skilled, more incomes than clerks earn; and the volumes of letters now publishing in the Daily News, letters full at once of sordid detail and dreary pathos, show how impossible it is for clerks and their wives to be fully fed. They do not write about their wives, being intent on an out-door grievance; but from our present point of view, the raising of the whole race in the scale of physique, the woman as well as the man ought to have one large chop a day, or its equivalent in good, well-cooked meat, and bread. That is, in practice, as the whole body of Clerks groaningly admit, 9d. apiece for dinner only, or 10s. 6d. a week for the pair for dinner alone. Even if this is reduced, by careful combination on some co-operative principle, to 1s. a day for two, which all the clerks with one accord report to be impossible, it is 7s. a week, or nearly half the wages of inferior clerks, of agricultural labourers, and of unskilled artisans. As the English cannot live on one meal a day, two-thirds of the income would go in food alone. This, however, is not all. To raise the race, the growing boys and girls must be fed too, and the total expense of feeding them "like gentlefolk's children" as regards essentials, and especially of giving milk freely, would raise the total to two shillings a day per household, a dreamy sum, which for the majority of the population is, for such a purpose, hopelessly out of reach. Of course, in practice a compromise is adopted; the bread-winner is fairly fed, though even he has not half his "scientific" supply of meat, and is tempted to make up with alcohol; and the wife and children drag out anæmic lives on insufficient food. Let any one who doubts this compare the little children of his neighbourhood, especially in the country, with the boys and girls of the parish and the national schools. The little children are beautiful, chubby, rosy, and healthy; but half the boys and girls, who, remember, were once these children, are stunted, light of weight, sallow, and bloodless. If a fever breaks out they die like flies, and throughout the school career the teachers notice their liability to exhaustion, and to a sort of chronic stupidity. When they begin to earn they pull up again, for their diet improves, but to the end of life they retain the inability to resist disease and the want of tireless energy which are the signs of insufficient nurture in early years. There is, that we know of, no practical remedy for adults. We suppose, if the poor would live like Prussian soldiers, on strict rations, with meat-sausage as its basis, and abstain from liquor altogether, there might be a partial one; but no population has ever done it; and of any other cure we see little chance. The minimum of wages does rise, thank God—the price of unskilled but laborious digging in the neighbourhood of London, for example, has exactly doubled in thirty years—but it rises very slowly, there is no chance of rapid movement, and if any sudden increase came, meat would speedily be 2s. a pound. The real cause of its advance is an increase of demand for the new multitudes among whom the grown men are fairly fed, which already surpasses supply, and threatens our flocks in particular with the danger which recently attracted the attention of the Queen. If the whole people were properly fed—fed, that is, so as to secure to them the fullest steam-power potentially inherent in their bodies—the demand would beat the supply altogether, and fresh meat would become for classes which now obtain it an impossibility.

Still, we are not clear that something could not be done. We cannot feed adults, but is the full feeding of children from ten to fourteen utterly beyond our means? Perhaps it is, for all figures expanded over such vast surfaces become formidable; but we believe that consideration will reduce the work to at least imaginable dimensions. There are, speaking roughly, but with sufficient accuracy, 2,400,000 children between ten and fourteen to be fed, and of these not more than a million, perhaps, require extraneous help. At all events, the figure of a million is near enough to the truth to make calculation possible. It is allowed on all hands that one solid and full meal a day, with meat or its equivalents, would completely alter the dietary of poor children, would, in fact, make it sufficient to produce robust health. Well, it is alleged by persons of competent knowledge that this meal could be given, often hot, in a fully satisfactory way, for threepence a day a head. The meat must be given three times a week, in the shape either of soup with meat in it, or, which is infinitely better, of thoroughly cooked meat dumplings, it being necessary to cook the meat in the form which admits of the use of so-called inferior pieces, of scraps, and of Australian and Canadian meat. On the other three days the dinner would be porridge with milk, the most nourishing and bone-making of all known food, suet dumpling, or thickened lentil soup, Revalenta Arabica in its commonest and equally healthy form. That the meat can be given is certain, for meat dumplings at the price named are sold at a profit to the poor in North London, under an inspection which secures to the buyers good meat and fair cooking, always the first of difficulties, the English prejudice against sufficient cooking being of the liveliest kind. The saving on the porridge and the lentil soup provides fire, and the necessary work on a large scale. Now, though threepence a day is not a large sum, threepence multiplied by a million is; but it is said that, with rare exceptions, the parents would, for "filling food," strain every nerve to provide one penny. There remain two million of pennies daily to be found, more than £8,300 a day, or, taking only working days, £2,600,000 a year altogether. Two millions and a half a year would, if properly and carefully spent, make it next to certain that the whole population of Great Britain—and, of course, the figures can be extended to Ireland—should, through the most difficult time of their lives, the time when nurture is needed, but wages are hardly obtainable, be fully and heartily fed, so fed that through life they would feel an additional gain of at least 20 per cent. to their working power. It is a great sum, a very great sum, with so much to be spent in other ways, and so strong a necessity for cultivating self-help; but it does not seem, when distributed among municipalities and parishes, hopelessly unmanageable. Children, at all events, would not be pauperised by getting a little too much dinner for their penny, nor do we quite see how the parents would be. Perhaps the idea of a part-free dinner is too Socialist—we quite acknowledge that Scotchmen worked and saved best when they had no poor-law—but still, it is well to look at the figures straight. It is as certain as anything can well be, that with good organisation a sum of less than £3,000,000 a year would secure to the children of the poorer half of our people food as healthy as that on which the best grown males reach an average of 5 ft. 9 in., and an average weight of 185 pounds. That is something to ponder on.

SPACE FANCIES.

IN the most brilliant of his poems, the late Professor Clerk Maxwell described Professor Cayley as one,—

" Whose soul, too large for vulgar space,
In n dimensions flourished unrestricted."

As President of the British Association, Professor Cayley has justified this description to the world. By his Inaugural Address he has introduced the British public—or rather, to the few of them as we said last week, who dare attempt to comprehend him—to one of the most fascinating of the speculative regions of Pure Mathematics; the region which, to the true mathematician, has the special charm that its beauties can never be of any possible use to anybody. Nevertheless, the manifold and marvellous changes which would result to every-day life from the realisation of its suggestions may well tempt even the practically severe and non-mathematical imagination to roam, and in Professor Cayley's loving words, "to ramble through this tract of beautiful country, and study it in every detail of hill-side and valley, stream, rock, wood, and flower."

The theory of Space is one of those matters that it takes a good deal of knowledge to have any doubts about. The unsophisticated person considers that he is free to move in every possible way. He can move his hand forwards, sideways, and upwards. With these three motions, or their opposites, separate or combined, he is satisfied. But it occurs to the philosopher to seek a fourth direction in which to move, a direction not compounded of forward, sideways, and upward motions, but differing from all these as forward differs from sideways, or sideways from upwards. Hitherto, the effort has been vain. Professor Cayley frankly admits that he cannot conceive of a space in which such a movement should be possible. The only person who has been suspected of such a power is Mr. Maskelyne. It has been suggested that he manages to escape from his sealed box not by any artful trick or sliding panel, but by a simple movement in the fourth dimension. This hypothesis, though it may not be regarded as probable, has, at all events, the merit of being a vera causa. A person able to move in the fourth dimension could get out of a closed box without passing through the top, or the bottom, or the sides. In fact, such a method of confinement would be as futile as the wall which the wise men built round the tree on which the nightingale was singing. He would be in the position of one acquainted with the secret of the backstairs which the Fairy Bedonebyasyoudid declined to reveal to Tom. He would resemble the popular idea of a disembodied spirit. No knots could hold him, nor chains bind him. The depths of the earth would lie exposed to him, as its surface does to ordinary mortals. He might even find, if the world should turn out to be curled into a spiral in the fourth dimension, that he could in a step pass from London, through Japan, to Sydney. The mathematician has long sighed for a state in which the pages of his book should contain not mere diagrams and plans of solids, but the solid figures themselves. With this view, Gauss in his old age laid aside divers problems at which he had worked analytically with partial success, saying that he hoped after death, in the fuller command of Space that would ensue, to succeed in solving them geometrically. It is impossible to say if Space is in reality thus extended. It may be that these are the baseless dreams of irresponsible analysis. It may, on the other hand, prove that the Space which surrounds us is of many dimensions, to a poor three of which we are limited by a necessity so necessary that it appears freedom. This only is certain, that if a fourth dimension does, in fact, exist, the power of perceiving it is wholly wanting in man, and the effort to conceive it as vain as a blind man's attempts to imagine the power of sight. But though unable to conceive a Fourth Dimension, we can, as Professor Cayley points out, conceive a space which is only two-dimensional, and by observing the limitations of beings inhabiting such a space, can by analogy imagine the extended powers which the art of moving in a fourth direction would introduce into human life.

Watch the shadows thrown on the ground by the sun, how they slide and change, continually varying in shape and size, and constant in nothing but in this,—that they never leave some surface or other. Endow your shadow with life, according to the fancy of the old story. Make him independent of yourself and of the sun, and imagine the existence he would spend, gliding over the surface of the world, never lifting his head into the air, not feeling fettered, because not able to conceive the motion of which he is incapable. Give him a quasi-substance, so that other shadows may be as impenetrable by him as ordinary matter by our own bodies. Fix and define his shape, if you like; or if you prefer it, imagine a state of existence in which no shapes are fixed or permanent. Imagine a world in which existence is shut in on the right hand and the left by illimitable walls of nothingness, where the only way of passing a man in the street would be to jump over his head, where books could only have one line in each page, and where the Morse Alphabet would be the only admissible form of writing, for even to cross a t would make a projection from the page like that of a book printed in raised type. Imagine a universe with suns, and stars, and worlds of its own, which could be rolled up like a scroll, and put away in a corner, without its inhabitants perceiving a change! Or again, suppose the shadow to have rigidity as well as substance, so as not to be unaffected by changes of curvature in the surface in which he moved. He would no longer be able to glide indifferently over surfaces of every shape. If he came to a sudden bend or a sharp crease in the surface to which he was confined, he would be brought to a stand. It is curious to speculate what his sensations would be. It might be that he would find himself mysteriously, and without perceptible cause, unable to move forward. It might be that the crease would have the effect to him of a solid wall of matter, perceptible by his senses as is what we call matter by ours. A small isolated wrinkle in the surface might appear to him a detached piece of matter. Nay, he might himself be merely a moving wrinkle, a wave, in the surface which is his space. Hence the bold suggestion of Clifford that in our own world also the difference between space where matter is and space where matter is not may be only a difference of curvature. Thus it would follow that men themselves are just wrinkles of a similar description, and that we differ from nothingness only by jutting out indefinitely little into the Fourth Dimension of Space.

Such are some of the speculations with which geometers have amused themselves, and the flowers they have sought to cull on the heights which the Philistine world thinks barren and uninteresting.

THE GENEVAN CHURCH AND ITS APOLOGISTS.

OUR remarks on the anti-Christian Church of Geneva seem to have attracted some attention in Switzerland, and have evoked there, as might be expected, several diverse judgments. The Allgemeine-Schweitzer Zeitung, of Basel, a Liberal-Protestant paper, reproduced our article in German, with the significant comment:—"We would, if we could, refute the Spectator, but we are unfortunately unable to do so." From Basel the article travelled to Geneva, where it was introduced, in a French dress, with a few words of approval, by the Courier, a Catholic paper, and has since given rise to a warm controversy, in which the leading parts have been taken by La Semaine Religieuse, organ of Evangelical Protestantism, and L'Alliance Libérale, organ of Liberal Christianity, the representatives of the two parties of orthodoxy and free-thought into which the Church of Geneva is divided. The former was the first to take up the cudgels, and in an article six columns long, meant to be an answer to our strictures, virtually admitted the truth of nearly all we wrote, and drew from the Alliance Libérale (which was less concerned to defend the Church than to dam-up a rival) this sarcastic remark, "Let us hope that the Spectator, when it cites authorities for the enormities imputed to it, will not have the audacity to include among its witnesses and inspirers La Semaine Religieuse." The protests of the organ of Evangelical Christianity, in fact, impliedly prove almost as much as its admissions, and its admissions alone are sufficient to establish the major part of our conclusions. We said that the pastors of the Church of Geneva are chosen by universal suffrage, every nominal Protestant, though he may never have entered a church in his life, having the right to vote; that the object of the local Legislature, in passing the law of 1874, whereby creeds and tests were abolished, was the suppression of orthodoxy and the triumph of free-thought; that the Church has become a chaos of conflicting doctrines, that some of its pastors preach a diluted Gospel, while others denounce religion as a superstition, one man pulling down that which another builds up. "All this," says the Semaine Religieuse, "is, unfortunately, exact." True also is our judgment that, having regard to the drift of public opinion, it is probable that the triumph of the Free-thinkers is final, "if the English review means thereby that the Protestant Church of Geneva is not likely to receive from political authority and universal suffrage a less latitudinarian Constitution than that of 1874," which is exactly what we did mean.

Having gone thus far with us, the Semaine Religieuse refuses to go any further, and impugns the accuracy of several of our statements. The rite of ordination, it says, has not been abolished. All that the Legislature has done is to take away from the Company of Pastors the power of conferring it officially; but as a matter of fact, candidates for the Ministry receive the rite voluntarily. In other words, ordination is optional, and the practice, as often happens in analogous cases, survives the law. We never suggested that pastors, if it so please them, may not submit to this or any other rite any more than that they may not, if they think fit, have a belief; but as the law now requires from candidates no other qualification than the possession of a university degree, whereas it formerly insisted on ordination and acceptance of the Christian verities, creeds and ordination, so far as the law is concerned, are in effect abolished. The Semaine Religieuse demurs also to our statement that nearly every minister elected since 1874 is either an avowed agnostic or an open opponent of Christianity. Since the date in question, it says, "There have been elected eleven new pastors, of whom seven were Evangelicals and four Liberals. Some of the former belong without doubt to an orthodoxy less Conservative than that of previous pastors; but the latter do not represent a Rationalism more Radical than that of the Liberal ministers elected before 1874." This is a virtual admission of our contention. The Evangelists are becoming less orthodox, and if the Liberals are not becoming more heterodox, it is because they have no more beliefs to lose. When professed teachers of Christianity define religion as being nothing more than a vague sentiment, it is doing them no injustice to affirm that they have reached the utmost limits of rationalism, and that this is the opinion of the Liberals of the Genevan Church they would probably be the last to deny. In a recent article in the Alliance Liberal (September 15th), a writer, who signs himself "Jean L., Docteur en Théologie," thus sums up the matter:—"Religion in effect presupposes no doctrine; it is outside doctrine, because its essence is a sentiment, an impulsion, a state inherent to the inmost essence of the human soul. All other objects of theology and of worship to which religion gives rise, and about which men and Christians so desperately and incessantly contend, are only of trifling importance." In the pulpit, Liberal pastors, descending from the abstract to the concrete, stigmatise as fables the verities that form the basis of Christianity, and without which it would become even less than the shadowy thing which Dr. Jean says it ought to be. Not long ago, one of the most able and influential of the Liberal Ministers, after reading as his text St. Matthew's account of the Annunciation, shut up the Bible with a bang, folded his arms, and spoke somewhat as follows:—"I ask every person here, every person possessing the least vestige of sense, education, or intelligence, if the history I have just read is not to the last degree improbable, a tissue of absurdities, and a palpable fiction;" and this thesis, in a long and elaborate sermon, he essayed to prove.

What does it matter, in the face of facts like these, that seven mildly orthodox ministers have been elected since 1874, that ministers are "installed" by the Consistory "in a solemn ceremony, and in default of dogmatic engagements enter into religious and moral engagements which are not without value," and that for certain offences the Consistory has power, with the consent of the State, to suspend a rebellious pastor? It is in the very nature of things that the bane should surely, if slowly, prevail over the antidote, and that orthodox ministers should be unable to check the evils which they admit and deplore. While objecting to some of our conclusions, the Semaine Religieuse is constrained, "with humiliation," to acknowledge the general truth of our verdict. "Yes," it says, "it is true that during the last twenty or thirty years indifferentism and incredulity have made in our little country frightful progress. It is equally true that the dogmatic anarchy which prevails in our national Protestant Church has contributed in part to hasten and support this spiritual decay." And then our contemporary goes on to say, what we should be the last to dispute, that other causes are making for this end, and that in the "Huguenot Sion there are thousands of men and women who have not bowed the knee to Baal." Yet, while confessing all this, while acknowledging in so many words that the National Establishment is a chaotic and creedless institution, some of whose ministers openly flout the faith which their brethren defend, an institution which has contributed, and is still contributing, to the decay of religion and the increase of nationalism, the organ of Evangelical Protestantism and the party whom it represents continue to support the system they condemn. They recognise the malady and refuse the cure,—emancipation of the Church from the control of the State. The expediency of an Establishment is an open question, but there can be no question that a State Church should be what it purports to be, and not a sham. It should not, while calling itself National and Protestant, be converted into a platform for the propagation of views destructive not alone of Protestantism, but of Christianity itself,—views for which none of its ministers, however orthodox they may be, can divest themselves of responsibility; and which, while they remain in the Church, they cannot effectually combat. This responsibility is all the greater, inasmuch as the Church (if Church it can be called) exists only by virtue of an alliance between the dominant political party, who maintain it for political purposes, and the Evangelical party, whose reverence for an Establishment founded by Calvin (and reformed by Carteret) seems to blind them alike to the demands of duty and the meaning of facts. When this alliance comes to an end, as come to an end it must, the National Church of Geneva will be a thing of the past.

THE MISLEADING CHARACTER OF LAW AS AN INDEX TO MORALS.

THE interesting treatise on Natural Religion to which we have recently adverted, in taking its start from the assumption that the most important subjects of human contemplation are not matters of controversy, affords an illustration of a strong and increasing tendency of our day,—a tendency to take refuge from the avowed diversities of belief as to all that is ultimate on the nature and destiny of man, in that agreement as to the duties of this present world which the course of ordinary life, it is supposed, shows to be an unquestionable fact. When we come to practical matters, it is said every day, by believers in every creed and believers in none, we find no difficulty in agreeing as to our bad men and our good men, whatever our difference of view as to everything beyond. No opinion equally common seems to us so erroneous. The world of aspiration is surely as various as the world of conviction, and men's sympathies are not less divergent in their influence than their creeds are. But it is easy to see how such an opinion arises, and very instructive to trace to its origin the element of truth which it contains. Morals, so far as they are reflected in Laws, do really possess that objectiveness, that simplicity which is so often attributed to all morals. When men are employed in the construction of a penal code, they never ask what actions are wrong, in the same way that, if truth were their aim, they would ask what opinions are false. Nothing bears a stronger witness to this virtual agreement than the minute portion of our law which appears to ignore it,—we do still punish insults to religion, but what we punish is an offence against decency, not against truth. A blasphemy law must now be defended by arguments that an Atheist can use. And wherever a difference of theory seems to emerge as to the business of the legislator, it will in like manner be discovered that this difference only brings out more distinctly the substantial agreement among educated men (using that epithet in a very broad sense) as to that part of his work which is penal. The Legislature, no doubt, reflects a great and probably a growing difference of opinion as to the rights of property; but this difference touches only the relation of the State towards property, the relation of the only persons of whom a penal code takes cognizance towards it is a matter concerning which everybody is of one mind. And the questions which are thus answered cannot be dismissed as self-evident. A country solicitor was asked by a village schoolmistress—quite as intelligent as most village schoolmistresses were some years ago—whether, as A. B. spent his money chiefly for immoral purposes, "some part of it might not be taken away from him, and given to his brother." If this person availed himself of that admirable opportunity for enlightening the infant minds of a country village, through the medium of their instructress, as to the first principles of legislation, and tried to convince the good woman that it was a wise as well as an unchangeable arrangement which ordained that we should all spend our money as badly as ever we chose, we may be sure that he found himself embarked in a set of statements which were by no means obvious. The fact that they never have to be repeated in Parliament shows that there are important moral problems, which the common-sense of mankind has settled once for all,—in other words, that there is a part of morality which belongs as much to the region of ascertained fact, which is as little dependent on any of the questions as to which thinking men are divided, as the Copernican astronomy is. These are the problems which form the basis of corporate national action, and the corporate action of a nation is something so impressive, so resonant, that it seems almost as impossible to remember as to deny that its moral limits are rigidly fixed, and, with regard to the vast and varied differences of human conduct, may even be called narrow.

Not that its relation to morality is a slight thing, not that it might be regarded merely as a guardian of public safety and comfort, and the aspect under which it condemns what is wrong be left out of account. At the most important moment of its exercise, the Law bears emphatic testimony to its own moral character. The distinction between murder and manslaughter is wholly a moral question. When a State in preparing to deprive its subject of life inquires not only concerning what has been done, but what has been intended, it enters on ground as spiritual as that of the Confessional. And perhaps its other aims would be better attained, if its moral aims were sometimes more prominent. "We do not enough consider," said once an experienced lawyer, when discussing the faulty state of our law of homicide, "that the business of the law is to protect people under strong temptation." That elevated and spiritual definition of the function of law has always dwelt in the mind of the present writer as a protest against some of the tendencies of modern thought which law, perhaps, is most apt to foster. The speaker did not mean that we thought too much of innocent people, and too little of guilty people. He meant that we thought too much of one actual criminal, and too little of many possible criminals; that the law would guard public safety better, if it bore in mind that it was also guarding something that is more precious than even public safety. It is one of the many cases in which the lesser object would be achieved more successfully, if the greater object were always kept in view. But the actual decision of legislators, the actual pleadings of lawyers, are quite enough to testify that what the law undertakes to punish is, on the whole, wrong, and not injury. When the State refuses to hang a homicide because he is also a furious maniac, it does not deny that the best thing for him, possibly, and for everybody connected with him, might be that he should be put out of this world. But it proclaims that unless he can be proved to have done wrong, a number of people acting together have no more right to put him out of their way than one person has,—that the ideal being we call the State does not, any more than any one of the individuals whose conduct it undertakes to regulate, stand above Morality, that it acknowledges moral obligations just as absolute as those which bind every one of its subjects. It vindicates, with unmistakeable distinctness, its position on moral ground.

But the State abdicates with equal distinctness its jurisdiction over the larger portion of the region it enters. The relation of Law to Morality is doubly incomplete. It is an expression of only a part of the national disapproval, and it is not an expression of any part of the national approval. The antithesis between what is right and wrong is quite unlike the antithesis between what is legal and illegal. Right actions, everybody would agree, must have some positive quality, whether we call that absolute rightness, or something else; they do not include all the actions that are not wrong. But any random group of legal actions shows us that they have no quality in common, except that of not leading the agent towards the gaol or the gallows. It is legal to save the life of one's enemy, to eat one's dinner, to slander one's benefactor. Both the heroic and the hateful action are found in the same category with that which has no moral quality whatever. The actions which the legislator decides to leave unpunished may be as dishonest as a burglary, more cruel than a murder. It is legal for a wealthy heir to dismiss without a penny the worn-out servant whose devotion has prolonged his father's life, or the young protégé whose luxurious nurture has been an implicit promise of life-long support. The law does not suppose that either of these actions is less wrong than for the father of a starving child to steal a loaf of bread. It abdicates all pretension to follow the gradation of wrong. Its sphere is not concentric with that of the moralist; their common segment is marked out by considerations that for the moralist are quite arbitrary. The experience of generations has taught us that of all the wrong actions which men commit, there are a few, and only a few, which their fellow-men can interfere to prevent in their corporate capacity (or, indeed, in any other, for that matter), without doing more harm than good. It is not any moral reflection which teaches us this lesson, except so far as the duty of following the dictates of good-sense may be called moral. Penal legislation stops not where indignation slackens, but where it is silenced by a sense that, in this form, its expression is useless. In other words, Law can be regarded as not only an incomplete index to morality, but, if its incompleteness be forgotten, even a misleading one.

This is sometimes forgotten. The principle we are urging does not appear to us too obvious to dwell upon. It was, it is true, put into vivid and telling words nearly half a century ago, by a writer whose popularity depends on the fact that he expressed in brilliant language, and illustrated from the resources of a knowledge as accurate as it was extensive, ideas that had no originality whatever. Macaulay's review of Mr. Gladstone's treatise on Church and State seems to us, in some ways, the most interesting, though the least characteristic of his writings; we think it the only one which will possess any interest for the historian of thought. The great man whose early theories supplied his arguments with an aim is still the most prominent figure in public life, but the only person to whom, as arguments, they could now be addressed would be some such disputant as the ignorant woman to whom we have taken the liberty of introducing the reader, in recalling an incident from humble life, and we pay a great compliment to a man of letters in saying that the reasoning which he employed against a great statesman would, in a slightly different dialect, have been the very best answer to a village schoolmistress. But a theory does not become unimportant when it ceases to be denied. No legislator needs to be warned off the moral region which law disclaims, but the moralist needs sometimes to be reminded that he is bound to enter upon it,—nay, that it is just here that his most important business lies. Ethics is a doctrine of right and wrong; Law is founded on a doctrine of wrong exclusively. It ignores not only a part of one hemisphere of the moral world, but all the other. The word "merit" has no legal meaning; the national approval leaves no trace on the national code. This man has taken a life; the State declares his own to be forfeit to the law. That man has saved a dozen lives; the State has nothing whatever to say to him. Here is a thief whose dishonesty has deprived a rich man of a few pounds; we proceed to shut him up in prison. Here is a giver whose judicious and self-denying generosity has rescued many poor men from misery; we let him alone. We do not, on the one hand, give any legal expression to the whole of our opinion about wrong actions; to our opinion about right actions, we give no expression at all. That, it may be said, is no exclusive characteristic of law, and we allow that it is only more true of Law than it is of all action that expresses moral judgment. We cannot, in this world, express our approval either as often, or as forcibly, as we express our disapproval. If a wise parent will seldom punish his children, he will still more seldom reward them; and in any other relation of life, almost every practical expression of a moral judgment has to be of a penal nature, because there is hardly anything else that it can be. But still it remains true that approbation is a real influence in practical life. We surely look upon the failings of some one whom we discover to be slippery in money matters with a very different eye if we also discover him to be very generous. Now, within the scope of Law there is no compensation of this kind. We recall an instance which brought out this fact very curiously. It appeared, in the case we refer to, that the money gained by fraud had been spent, in great part, in relieving the needs of the deserving poor, often without their knowledge of the quarter from which their relief came, so that the money seems to have exercised the best qualities which money can exercise, in everything but its mode of acquirement. The fact was noted at the time as worthy of remark, but we do not remember that the faintest reference was made to it in mitigation of punishment. It surely must have had some effect in softening disapproval, but it would have been felt by every one as out of place in any plea for a lenient sentence. The object of Law being merely to prevent some actions, no one could demand that a judicial investigation should take cognisance of those which we all wish to encourage. Law has done its work when it has finished its threats; those actions which it never wishes to hinder, remain for ever beyond the bounds of its cognisance.

We have said that the Law never refuses so distinctly to take cognisance of religious truth as when it steps in to protect religion, and we may add another illustration of the same principle, in asserting that its negative attitude with regard to Virtue is made most clear by observing the circumstances under which it insists that men shall be virtuous. The law of bribery seems to us to occupy just this exceptional position. There are a hundred ways in which men may do harm with their money, vast and deplorable harm; but as long as it is their money, the law lets them alone. To investigate any monetary transaction between sane beings, the State, as a rule, requires that there should be an aggrieved party. It may be the aggrieved party itself, but it must appear, in ordinary cases, in the concrete form of some officer of its own, whose just claim has been defrauded. Only in one single case does it step in and say that what one man is willing to give, and another anxious to take, shall not pass from giver to receiver; that a poor man, who knows quite well what he is selling, shall not sell his vote; that a rich man, who knows quite well what he is buying, shall not buy it. The legitimacy of the claim is as unquestionable as its peculiarity; to many persons, it would appear much more unquestionable. The State is here insisting on the conditions of its own existence, the Law is guarding the fountains of law from pollution, a representative body is insisting that what it represents shall be the nation it is to govern. Law must keep pure the source of law, at any cost; it must hold before men's eyes the ideal of this purity, even if it can do little more; it must keep the aim as an aspiration, even if it continually fail to punish its infringement as a misdemeanour. But the difficulties which beset its course in this direction are a sufficient proof that it is doing something exceptional in trying to prevent any transaction which satisfies both parties. Parliament does not really want to stop bribery, we hear it said again and again. Rich men do not really want to cut down the list of things that may be bought. Poor men do not really want to cut down the list of things that may be sold. In dealing with an offence in which agent and patient conspire to break the law, law is in an exceptional position. When robbery, murder, or theft takes place, it is not only the sense of duty which is enlisted on the side of the law, but the sense of injury. The victim is not anxious to give the pickpocket or the burglar a chance of repeating his offence; he may be trusted to give the law all the help he can in making it impossible. The solitary case in which the Law aims at carrying out a prohibition in which it has no help of this kind, surely exhibits very clearly the wisdom of the rule which it infringes. The importance of the exception is great. But what we would now point out is that it is not its importance which forms its justification. If political honour is the only thing the Law guards from traffic, it is not because even political honour is the thing most sacred, in the eyes of righteous men. The very specialisation of the term "immoral" (however mistaken be its exclusiveness of appellation), is a protest against the notion that moral purity is less of an object than electoral purity. Nor, in our opinion, would the attempt to prevent advances as to which both parties are agreed, be attended with greater difficulty in the last case than in the first. But the one wrong is illegal, and not the other, because the State is properly a teacher of political virtue, and is not properly a teacher of any other.

How far, then, does an agreement as to a penal code take us towards an agreement as to a moral standard? How far does our common consent as to the actions which it is desirable to prevent take us towards a common aspiration towards those actions which it is desirable to imitate? Only so far as the knowledge that two people have got into the express from Euston Square helps us towards a knowledge of their destination. We know that they must both wish to leave London. We know that they must both wish to go towards the north-west. But which of them may get out at the first stoppage and return to London in a few days, and which of them may take ship for America, never more to revisit his native land, we cannot do more than guess. And a common starting-point no more implies a common goal in the invisible world than it does in the visible. Law refuses to incorporate in its prohibitions any moral aim in which all sane and educated beings fail to unite. Therefore, it provides a common ground for action, and therefore it fails to provide a common ground for aspiration. Emphatic disapproval, we are apt to think, implies emphatic approval. In truth, this is just what it never can do. You can never admire the opposite of what we strongly condemn, you can never condemn the opposite of what we strongly admire. You can no more praise a man for not being a criminal, than you can condemn him for not being a hero. As a rule of practice this is often forgotten, but as a principle of judgment it cannot be questioned. The inversion of our blame would often result, not in admiration, but in blame of a different kind. It is wrong to take another person's money, unless he wishes to give it us; and very often it is wrong to give another person our money, because he wishes us to give it him. It is wrong to tell a lie, and very often it is wrong also to tell the truth. The least valuable legacy that a great intellect ever bequeathed to its kind was that ethical framework (we do not mean the treatise containing it) which sets the virtues as means between two opposed vices. But an arrangement which should exhibit the virtues as a set of antitheses to the vices would be, we believe, even less durable than that odd Aristotelian system which always sandwiches a virtue between two vices. Nor is it only to the philosopher that such a theory would be dangerous, there seems to us no moral truth more important for the ordinary human being who is trying to do right, than that right is not the opposite of wrong. We can hardly make the statement without cumbersome explanations, because the very influence of law on morals has given a double meaning to the word "right," has suggested, in fact, that everything we have a right to do is right. But in every concrete illustration, it would be seen that the contrary is nearer the truth. The things we have a right to do are the last things which find place in the aspirations after perfect rightness.

Whenever men interfere with each other, whether in that corporate form which we call Law, or in any other, they have to base their action on a theory of wrong. But character is moulded not by disapproval, but by aspiration. On a penal code, aspiration never leaves any trace; it would be a fatal objection to any law that it implied a high ideal. It would mean the appearance of the armed belligerent on neutral territory. But the moral influences by which character is formed, though they belong to both hemispheres of the moral world, yet find their centre in that of admiration and reverence. We may be absolutely convinced of the wrong, even of the despicableness of some hidden resentment, we may refuse to give it an outlet in word or deed, and struggle against it with the whole moral energy of our nature, and at the end of the struggle find our efforts as futile as if we had been trying to move a rock. And then, perhaps, some glimpse into the recesses of a generous, self-forgetting character, some new perception of the beauty of that spirit which rises above memories of slight and wrong, suddenly comes upon us like a tidal wave of moral impulse, and lifts us into a region where all that is poor and self-centred seems below us. It need not be anything colossal which leaves this impression. It rarely is so, not only because heroism is rare, but because large and brilliant action is commonly capable of many interpretations. A sentence of hearty praise or discriminating justice given to an enemy, or it may be even a magnanimous silence, where we know what might have been said, may do more to deliver the spirit from the galling bondage of resentment than all that sense of its evil which is reflected from all the regulations of civilised society, and finds its focus in the law against murder. "The little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love" are building up in every heart sensible to their influence, a temple where, as in the Temple of Solomon, no sound of building is heard, but where the aspirations of our moral nature turn with an increasing intensity as to their permanent goal. Those who believe in the moral growth of humanity, and its final perfection, whether they place that second Eden in this world or in some other, believe that this goal will in the end be common to all, for they believe that the aspirations which are highest will be shared by all. But to say that it is so already,—to say that in turning from our speculations about what is true in the divine world to our theories about what is best in the human world, we leave doubt for certainty, is just as false as if any one were to say that while animal life exhibited a vast number of species, plant life was absolutely simple and uniform. It would be impossible to ignore divergence so obvious, if it were not that we are obliged by the constitution of this world to unite in a common attempt to defend interests that are absolutely common; and led by the perversion of Logic to forget that the decisions necessary in the world of evil are applicable to that domain alone, and involve no inference for that world whose eternity, we hope, the world of evil does not share.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

PROFESSOR RAY LANKESTER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Should you have the courtesy to insert this letter in your journal, your readers will perceive that your facetious note of this date, relative to my address to the British Association, fails in application. Discoveries in science are not, as a rule, made by hungry, rather than by well-paid men. I took some pains to show that they are made either by the possessors of private fortunes, or by the holders of salaried posts specially designed for the production of such results. Accordingly, your reference to experiments on starving dogs—imaginary experiments, which it is not my business either to condemn or to justify—is altogether beside the mark.—I am, Sir, &c.,

SCOTCH PROFESSORSHIPS AND ENDOWMENTS FOR RESEARCH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your article in last week's Spectator upon Scotch Professors ought to provide matter for reflection for those who, like Mr. Ray Lankester, deplore the lack of endowments for original research. The endowments may be too few in number, but in some instances they are much too large for the work done. In fact, it appears to me as if the very prosperity of such places as Edinburgh University would cause its ultimate decline. Hitherto, it has possessed men, as Professors, devoted to science, who have worked hard and earned for their University a world-wide fame. But now, no sooner does a young and enthusiastic savant find himself in possession of a Professorial chair, than he succumbs to the enervating influence of his large emoluments and neglects original research. Men acquainted with such universities as that of Edinburgh will find no difficulty in recognising Professors who, in their impecunious days, displayed great ability and striking originality, but as Professors have done little or nothing for the advancement of Science. Formerly, the Symes, the Simpsons, and the Christisons were in the front rank of scientific observers; now, our Professors are content with a back seat,—albeit, a luxuriantly cushioned one.

Of late years, the Professors have hit upon a simple and unique plan for adding to their already large emoluments. Their own work simply consists in reading for one hour daily a lecture, in which but few alterations are made from year to year. They have started as supplementary classes what are called "practical classes," for attending which the students are mulcted in the further sum of £3 3s., thus adding £400-£600 a year to the professorial income. The onerous work connected with these classes is delegated to assistants, who receive from £100 to £150 per annum, and the Professors seldom trouble themselves about the work. These Assistants are generally able and well qualified to undertake original research, but are so overburdened with work that they cannot find time. There are other Professors who make their position a stepping-stone to a consulting practice, the very fact of being a Professor at once giving them a standing. The lucrative practices are cultivated to the disadvantage of the students, for the Professors have no time to keep pace even with the advancement made by others in the subjects they teach.

Graduates of Scotch Universities have been implored by the University authorities to agitate against the coming legislation. I, for one, will not stir a step in defence of the present system, for no change can possibly retard original research more, and at the same time damage the true interests of our Universities, than the continuation of overpaid indolence and underpaid drudgery.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"REVELATION AND MODERN THEOLOGY CONTRASTED."

* [TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The review of my work in your number of the 15th inst. contains an error respecting a matter of fact, which I shall be much obliged by your allowing me to correct. I should not ask this, if it involved a matter of opinion; for every reviewer is entitled to form his own on the soundness of the positions which are laid down in a work which he undertakes to review. The point in question is the view which I have taken in my work as to the function of theology. As I read the review, it represents me to have reduced it to the narrowest possible limits. It is true that my object has been to prove that Christianity, as a revelation, does not embrace a wide range of abstract subject-matter; but I have several times affirmed that Christian theology is a science, and stands to Christianity, as a revelation, precisely in the same relation as other sciences stand to the facts and phenomena of the Universe; and whether it is received as a science or a philosophy, it must be dealt with by precisely the same methods as other sciences and philosophies. But on this point the last chapter in the work, which consists of twenty clearly reasoned pages, is conclusive. Its title is "Theology—its Function in Reference to Christianity as a Revelation." I have read it through, and the conclusion which I have arrived at is, that the function which I have assigned to theology scarcely, if at all, differs from that of your reviewer. It is certain that in this chapter, in which my position is laid down with great care, I have assigned to theology an extent of subject-matter which ought to satisfy any rational theologian.

Will you kindly allow me to express an opinion on another point? If the views against which a considerable portion of the work is directed are passing away from modern theology, I should be most thankful to think so; but it is certain that they are embodied in the confessions of nearly every Church and community of Christians in Christendom, and that they form the foundation of what I have designated "Popular Theology."—I am, Sir, &c.,

FRANCE, ITALY, AND SAVOY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As one intimately acquainted with Savoy, may I ask space for a few remarks on the very bitter and hostile article in your number for September 15th?

1. The history of Savoy and its Princes extends over 800 years, why, then, select instances of oppression and cruelty from the last 300 only?

2. Is there any ground for believing that Savoy stood alone in its treatment of the Protestants, &c.? Was it not the usual state of things in Europe before the French Revolution? It is odd that so few persons realise the fact that Protestantism was a great political danger in lands where the Princes had not given up the old faith, and was put down from political motives, as well as religious.

3. Is the intolerance of Savoy as marked and fierce as the intolerance of Geneva (the model "Protestant" community), in the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries?

4. Would it not have been well to have mentioned the fact that the annexation of Savoy to France by a forced plébiscite was a gross breach of the neutralisation of Savoy south of the Lake of Geneva, secured (if I remember rightly) by the Treaty of Vienna in 1815?

5. It is true that the inhabitants of Savoy are not of the same race as those of Piedmont; but the same is the case with the dwellers in the Val d'Aosta (where French is the language of the country), and no one proposes to give them to France or Switzerland.

6. Is it not a fact that the Maurienne and the Tarentaise have far more to do with Piedmont at the present moment than with the rest of France (this I can state positively from my own observations, extending over many years), and that Chablais and Faucigny are similarly connected with France? The Savoyard and Piedmontese patois are commonly understood on both sides of the Alps, and Piedmontese labourers swarm in every part of Savoy. This latter is the burning question just now in local politics. I venture to send these remarks, for I should be very sorry to believe that the Spectator wishes to excuse in any way the shameful abandonment of the earliest possessions of his House by Victor Emmanuel II., or the treacherous conduct of Louis Napoleon in taking advantage of his necessities.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE SITUATION IN ZULULAND.

SIR,—Will you allow me to draw your attention to an important consideration which is not adverted to in the remarks on the situation in Zululand, in your last week's number? The restoration of Cetewayo was resolved on by the Secretary of State, because experience had shown that the division of Zululand amongst petty chiefs had resulted in civil wars and wars leading towards anarchy. Cetewayo had proved that he could govern, and Lord Kimberley's policy was in itself wise, but it was never carried into effect. It was unpopular in Natal, and not only the local officials, but the Governor, who represented the Colonial Office, did all that well could be done to thwart it. In this they so entirely succeeded that Cetewayo, instead of replacing the petty chiefs, became himself one of them, and as events seem to show, not the most powerful one. Civil war, consequently, instead of being repressed, became more general and sanguinary. There is evidence, too, that after Cetewayo's return white men from the colony began to take part in these wars, and that they materially contributed to Cetewayo's defeat by Usibepu.

Now, it is certainly neither from love of Usibepu, nor even from mere hatred of Cetewayo, that Natal officials or Natal fighting adventurers have played the part they have done in these transactions. The plain truth appears to be that the Natal colonists do not want order and settled rule in Zululand, whether under Cetewayo or anybody else. Annexationists and land-grabbers are powerful in the colony. They know very well that England does not love annexations, and abhors the concomitant land-thievery and native-apprenticing, but they think that after our national conscience has been shocked by a few years of carnage and anarchy in Zululand, opinion will come round, and annexation, with all its drawbacks, will begin to appear the lesser evil. This state of opinion in Natal it is, and the power which Natal must always have of influencing the course of events in Zululand, which I would suggest is scarcely sufficiently taken into account, when you anticipate the establishment of order and settled rule amongst the Zulus. Though myself believing that Cetewayo has been most unfairly dealt with, I fully grant that the fortunes of one man are of no account, as against the welfare of a nation. If order and settled rule can be re-established in Zululand, it matters comparatively nothing under what ruler. What is to be feared is that the influences which are paramount in Natal will prevent the thing being done under any ruler, that if Usibepu, for instance, seems in the way of establishing his ascendancy, other Zulu chiefs will be incited to resist him, and will even, if needful, receive filibusterous help in their resistance. And all experience seems to show that the Colonial Office, even if it be heartily willing, is wholly unable to repress or control local action of this nature.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE IMPROVEMENT OF EGYPT.

SIR,—In your last issue, Mr. Hilary Skinner says "that the native fears the reformer almost as much as he hates the usurer." Very true, but why? Because what we are pleased to call "reform" has not eased the burdens of the people, but intensified their miseries, by legalising judicial evictions. What does the Fellah care for constitutional rights and mixed tribunals, if they leave him at the mercy of rapacious creditors? I seek in vain for any example of a nation ground to death, and yet honourably discharging public and private liabilities under difficulties as overwhelming as those Egypt has to face; but there is a limit, and whether we like it or not, the future Assembly will have to prevent the Fellah from being driven from his own.

It is a great pity that our reformers did not take the initiative in this matter, or else allow the Khedive to do so by decree. No English bayonets would be required for the support of Anglo-Egyptians, had the Fellah found a helping hand, instead of only wise counsels, in his present distress. Orientals worship power and equity, and both we have denied the Khedive and his people. One stroke of the pen might put an end to the fears of the population, and re-establish confidence, for England is strong enough to endow the Khedive with powers to that effect.

No one in Egypt talks of repudiating just debts, but common-sense and justice alike demand that the improved Government machinery Europe has been forcing upon Egypt should not be misused for the sole purpose of bailiff's work. If creditors have a right to claim payment, a Government has the duty to protect a nation "under age" against ruinous extortion. Having paid taxes out of borrowed capital, the Fellah stands at the verge of ruin; the Private Debt has increased in four years from £1,400,000 to nine—well-informed natives say fifteen—millions sterling, and a financial down-break is inevitable, unless legislation steps in.

The formation of the new Council of State will give reformers a last opportunity for remedying a grievous wrong, though I doubt that the Fellah has much to expect from that quarter; and I fear we shall shut our eyes to the heartrending appeals of the taxpayer until a new disturbance teaches us that reform means not a paper Constitution, but a practical study of the welfare of the masses, a tangible bettering of the condition of the people, not high-flying promises of useless rights.

The day the Fellah pays 5 per cent. on private loans, and can no longer be driven from his soil, we may begin to talk of reform; until then, our best intentions will be misinterpreted by people who see themselves sacrificed to foreign harpies and international jealousies.—I am, Sir, &c.,

LONGEVITY.

SIR,—You are mistaken in supposing that "at present the highest age known capable of absolute proof is 106, at which Lady Smith died a few years since."

My grand-aunt, Elizabeth Gray, daughter of William Gray, of Newholm, was born at Newholm, in the parish of Dolphinton, county of Lanark, on May 11th, 1748, and died in this house (86 Great King Street, Edinburgh) on 2nd April, 1858. On the day of her death she therefore only wanted twenty-two days to complete her 108th year. She was buried in the Grey Friars Churchyard, Edinburgh, and I have in my possession two portraits of the old lady, one in oils, painted by Sir John Watson Gordon, president of the Royal Scottish Academy; the other in coloured crayons, by Archer. A woodcut from a photograph of this drawing was published in the Illustrated London News shortly after Miss Gray's death. As regards the proof that the Elizabeth Gray who died on April 2nd, 1858, is the same person whose birth is registered in the parish of Dolphinton on May 11th, 1748, there is, first, the payment to her of a rent-charge on the property of Newholm; and, second, the testimony of her brothers and sisters? Her mother, who died on May 8th, 1808, aged 96, had 20 children. Four were born dead. Of the remaining 16, 5 died young. The other eleven were,—John, born 1731, died 1811, aged 80; Anne, born 1733, died 1825, aged 92; Grizzle, born 1734, died 1821, aged 87; William, born 1735, died 1805, aged 70; Magdalene, born 1739, died 1826, aged 87; Janet, born 1742, died 1833, aged 91; Isabella, born 1745, died 1830, aged 85; Elizabeth, born 1748, died 1858, aged 107; Jane, born 1752, died 1829, aged 77; Fordyce, born 1754, died 1840, aged 86; Susan, born 1755, died 1841, aged 86. The average age of Elizabeth Gray and of these ten brothers and sisters was, therefore, 86.

I may mention that Sir George Cornwall Lewis had a correspondence with Elizabeth Gray's nephew and executor, the late W. A. Cunningham, wine merchant, Edinburgh, respecting the proofs of Miss Gray's age, and that Sir George considered these proofs satisfactory.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

MEWSLADE.

STRANGE powers are they that work 'twixt sea and land;
Where winds and waves, the rivals of the shore,
In tempest or in calm, for evermore,
Beat on the cliff, or sport upon the sand,
And love the haunts of Mewslade's storm-wash'd strand.
At ebbing tide, the winding glen explore,
Descend and enter, wonder and adore,
Mid temples never made by human hand.
These solemn towers, white-shafted, tapering spires,
Arch, buttress, corridor, and pinnacle,
That from their fretted basements rise sublime,—
He who commands waves, winds, and lightning fires,
The wild and wayward agents of His will,
Wrought, through the ages of unmeasur'd time.

HERBERT NEW.

A SAINT'S CORRESPONDENCE.*

AN excellent preface by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Menevia and Newport introduces this first volume of the translated works of St. Francis de Sales, last of the Bishops of Geneva, to English readers with well deserved praise. Father Mackay has done his work with loyal skill, and as far as is possible he has given some idea of the antique, delightful style of the Savoyard noble who has recently been enrolled as a Doctor of the Church by a Roman decree. And the writer of the preface and the translator show alike appreciation of the special value of St. Francis de Sales' influence, by their choice of his "Letters to Persons in the World," as the opening volume of a complete translation of his works.

We do not propose in our notice of this book to enter on the large question of how far "direction," as understood by Catholics, helps men and women on the upward path, though, no doubt, it is by his learned skill and trained sympathy as director of human souls that St. Francis holds his place in the procession of the world's eminent men. Nor do these letters suggest any of the points in dispute between his detractors and his admirers, except as they prove his loving craft and the wise humanity by which he rescued and protected his flock from by-paths of heresy during the troubled times of his episcopate. But the growing demand in our own day for his help in mastering the art of devout living is noticeable, and the application of the science of theology to social progress, in which St. Francis is so skilful, is worth the consideration even of those indifferent to that theology. Born with the dawn of the new order of European life, of which the dangers are its private antagonisms, its cruel egotism, and unsocial repudiation of the laws of brotherhood—from which we have seen so many abortive reactions—Francis de Sales devoted himself with a prescience that might well be deemed supernatural to find a remedy for these besetting evils of the new civilisation. He is the apostle of those virtues by which modern society can be best disinfected of its covert criminality. He enforces the interior but not the less heroic austerity by which the evils which mine the smooth surface of "respectable" existence can be counteracted. He teaches how we can acquire that amenity which is desired by the most advanced sociologists among us. Gentleness, in its highest sense, is the quality most insisted on by the Savoyard noble in our dealings with each other; he bids his spiritual children not fear the faithful use of life, wherever circumstances place them, if they be armed with charity. Indeed, sweet reasonableness is the key-note of his writings, and he preaches that affectionate sociableness maintained by self-abnegation, which is singularly fitted to meet the requirements of our complex and fermenting, though well-policed existence.

Bridging, as St. Francis did, the widening and dangerous rift between those who believed that piety could only exist by withdrawal from the ordinary social life and by clinging to the discipline of the dying "ages of faith," and the men and women of the actual world, there were many to complain that his plan of life was too easy. It was said, even before Jansenism was the fashion among the unco' pious, that he forgot how narrow is the path of perfection. The grace of his style, influenced by his training among the Humanists of Padua, and inspired by his own broad sympathies, offended some strait sectarians; and the infinite capacity for loving, ensuring his own loveableness, which characterised him, was disagreeable to lesser dogmatists, who are nothing, if not condemnatory. But no man as he did required from his disciples the heroism of what he calls the little virtues. While he taught the lightness of the Christian burden and the easiness of its yoke, he insisted on "patience, bearing with our neighbour, submission, humility, sweetness of temper, affability, toleration of our imperfections," and called all his children to that brotherhood of duty and self-sacrifice which is, perhaps, more necessary to modern society, and hardly less difficult, than the martyrdoms and penances of the earlier Christians.

The increasing popularity of his manuals among persons who desire guidance amid the perplexities of modern life witnesses to the practical foresight of his advice. He anticipates our revolutions and our emancipation from mediæval formulas. No one would have his followers aim at more perfect liberty and equality than he does, but he would teach men to attain it through conformity to the Divine idea, as manifested in the natural order of duties and affections approved by conscience. To his disciples, existence remains externally the same as to other men; but they have the key of its riddles. He rises to as great heights of mysticism as any of the saints, but his words are so intelligible and sober, he is so steeped in humility and treads so firmly the dusty highway of life, that his mysticism seems quite natural and ordinary sunshine. He does not hide from us that he was himself often weary and foot-sore, and with the authority of experience he shows us how to invest the commonest actions of every day with the wonder and beauty of sanctity. In these familiar "letters," we perceive his skill as a physician of souls who suffer from the moral epidemics that obtain in our time, and they show us the loveableness of the man, while they explain his way of working, which may be said to be exhortation to that fructifying love of God which can be to us not only a motive and an end, but also a method and a means towards our right action. His correspondence gives us glimpses of the society of the day and of those antique French manners which were probably the noblest yet seen in the world, and which maintained the traditions of St. Louis even in the reigns of the Valois. The solid and devout virtue, polished to a grace of which there are so many examples during the century of Fénelon, and practised in the circle of "Persons in the World" to whom these letters were written, is as evident as is the Saint's delight in it. He vindicates human society, and, armed alike against the rampant Calvinism and latent Jansenism of which the atmosphere was full, he set himself to heal the breach between the ideal and the real life of Christians, between our imperfection and the Divine standard. "Do not desire," he says, "not to be what you are, but to be very well what you are." We are to accept the limits of our actual circumstances as expressions of God's will, but our devotion to him will prevent contentment from becoming apathy. Love will be the spur to action, and the remedy for discouragement in apparent failure. The pupil of St. Francis becomes an untiring labourer in the advance of humanity. Throughout these letters, be they grave or playful, there are lessons of the truest altruism coincident with the highest individualisation of which only mystics have the key. Of their literary value, the reader of however good a translation can hardly judge. He must be content to take Sainte-Beuve's estimate, who places St. Francis in the foremost rank of letter-writers, and, indeed, it is easy to trace much of Madame de Sévigny's charm and of the wit and wisdom of her contemporaries to the knot of friends who gathered round her grandmother St. Jeanne de Chantal, and St. Francis, twin lights of the dawning century. Before his age, as he was, in the science of social Christianity, he was also before it in the easy grace and simple directness of his style. Gems of wisdom sparkle throughout his affectionate fatherliness. To a lady who was vexed because he dissuaded her from a law-suit, by which she expected to gain a sum sufficient to found a religious house, he writes:—"I knew very well that your piety was making a plank for your self-love, so piteously human is it. In fact, we do not love crosses, unless they are in gold, with pearls and enamel." He warns another young lady, who indulged in repartee, "It is not good to walk on tip-toe, either in mind or body." It has been said, in his disparagement, that St. Francis is the apostle of the upper classes. In truth, he preaches a spiritual refinement which creates the truest upper class, whether its members be poor or rich, and which is the radical cure for Philistinism.

Much of his advice to persons in the world is summed up in a letter to "a gentleman who was going to live at Court," and in 1610 it was not easy to live well at any European Court:—

"At last," he writes, "you are going to make sail, and take the open sea of the world at Court. I am not so fearful as many others, and I do not think that profession one of the most dangerous for those of noble souls and manly hearts, for there are but two principal rocks in this gulf,—vanity, which ruins spirits that are soft, slothful, feminine, and weak; and ambition, which ruins audacious and presumptuous hearts."

Warning his correspondent of many varieties of these "principal rocks," he recommends,—

"The gentle and sincere courtesy which offends no one and obliges all; which seeks love rather than honour; which never rallies any one so as to hurt him, nor stingingly; which repels no one, and is itself never repelled." "Imagine that you were a courtier of St. Louis," he continues, as a summary of his advice; "this holy King loved that every one should be brave, courageous, generous, good-humoured, courteous, affable, free, polite; and still, he loved above all that every one should be a good Christian. And if you had been with him, you would have seen him kindly laughing on occasion, speaking boldly at proper time, taking care that all was in splendour about him, like another Solomon, to maintain the royal dignity, and a moment afterwards serving the poor in the hospitals, and in a word, marrying civil with Christian virtue, and majesty with humility. In a word, this is what we must try after; to be no less brave for being Christian, and no less Christian for being brave; and for this, we must be very good Christians,—that is, very devout, pious, and, if possible, spiritual, for as St. Paul says, the spiritual man discerneth all things; he knows at what time, in what order, by what method, each virtue must be practised."

St. Francis appraises the incalculable force of gentleness in the issues of life, and in our isolated struggle with the pressure of social facts, immediate relief is gained by our recognition of patience and humility as not only negative, but most active factors towards our well-being. "When shall we all be steeped in gentleness and sweetness towards our neighbour?" St. Francis exclaims. He only asks of us goodwill towards men and towards ourselves in the common affairs of life. He is never tired of preaching that the Kingdom of Heaven is within us. "To be dissatisfied and fret about the world, while we must of necessity be in it, is a great temptation," he says. "We fancy that by changing our ships, we shall get on better; yes, if we change ourselves." Yet no man impressed more urgently than he did on his correspondents that they must prepare for difficulties. "If the violence of the tempest sometimes disturbs our stomach, and makes our head swim a little, let us not be surprised, but as soon as we can, let us take breath again, and encourage ourselves to do better true virtue does not thrive in exterior repose, any more than good fish in the stagnant waters of a marsh."

The very humility of the Saint makes him sometimes choose the homeliest similitudes, and it is clear that he did not trouble himself about the exactness of his physical science when he spoke in parables of his friends the bees, and hares, and doves; but his suavity is essentially so dignified that our smile is never contemptuous when we read his zoological heresies. No doubt, his extraordinary familiarity with Holy Writ, nearly every sentence of which finds a place in his works, adds to their durable influence over all, of whatever creed, who aspire to the higher life, and who seek a solution of the riddle of pain elsewhere than in blank pessimism. We have not disclaimed for St. Francis the cruelties of which he is accused during his mission in the Chablais, or tried to show how poisoned at the source are the authorities who have been quoted by writers eager to throw a stone at the persuasive apostle of sweetness and light. It is not strange that those who condemn the doctrines and system he upheld should try to counteract his charm. But it must remain potent, in our generation of latent hatreds; and we do wisely, even on the lowest ground, in welcoming the Doctor who teaches that devotion must be made "amiable, useful, and agreeable to every one." He, to use his own words, "always said that he who preaches with love preaches sufficiently against heretics, though he say not a single word of controversy against them." And this is a method of proselytism efficacious now, as three hundred years ago, emphasised as it is by the history of the Saint's own self-conquest, and by his marvellous success, both in reconciling his enemies, and in attaching the friends to whom these charming letters were written.

READING FOR MRS. WITTITTERLY.*

AMONG the minor humorous characters created by Dickens, there is one which, however its features may vary with the changing social aspects of the time, remains permanent as a type. Mrs. Wittitterly always exists, and everybody knows her. The lady who is "excited" by the nobility, who is enraptured by the slightest acquaintance with the possessor of a title, who adores "the Army" (but not so fervently as her prototype adored that body before the introduction of competitive examinations and the abolition of Purchase), who is "all nerves," and lives, figuratively, upon three volumes a day of vulgar fustian about lords and ladies, gilded saloons, trailing laces, rose-tinted boudoirs, and tall footmen "in bas de soie,—silk stockings," is as much an actuality as she was when Alphonse the doubtful, with plain "Bill" written on his countenance, answered her bell, and Kate Nickleby read aloud to her that description of the Lady Flabella's lover, "the young, the slim, the low-voiced, her own Belflaire," which she pronounced to be "so soft, so deliciously soft." Mrs. Wittitterly is in luck, at present; she may feed full upon her favourite viands. There was an epoch, since Dickens put a name to her, when the supply was scanty, when her dainty tastes were neglected for the sake of those coarser persons who craved stronger food, and had it provided for them by strong men and big-brained women. Thackeray, Charles Kingsley, Trollope, Currer Bell, George Eliot, these great names are but a few of those which might be enumerated—mention of Dickens is, of course, superfluous—as the writers who, taking hold of the public, put Mrs. Wittitterly on comparatively short-commons for a term of years that ought to be held in grateful remembrance. With Guy Livingstone, and the imitations of that work in which vulgarity was added to their prototype's vice, the downward course of the English novel, which has hardly known a check, may be said to have begun, and Mrs. Wittitterly to have been once more stuffed to repletion, with the addition of any amount of pepper to the cream-tarts. Belflaire and the bad French, Chérizette and the eau de Cologne, the silver salver and the bas de soie, all, in a word, that the great humourist harmlessly quizzed in the "society" trash of Lady Blessington and Mrs. Gore, now flourishes in incredible luxuriance, with congenial surroundings of racing, betting, the jargon of every kind of dissipation, every form of folly, the successive affectations of an epoch in which affectation is a social disease, and a vulgar wealth-worship nowhere else displayed so shamelessly. Moreover, it has been reserved for our later day to do away entirely with the necessity for a novelist's knowing how to write the English language, or any other. What does Mrs. Wittitterly care for grammar or style? Let her have plenty of lords and ladies, fine furniture, fine clothes, all duly described in milliner's phraseology, and with a dexterous advertising touch; an atmosphere of reckless pleasure and unflagging excitement; not too much sentiment, and that of the falsest; some deadly sins treated as things of course; with all this, and a pleasant reek of money and good dinners, let her be made to fancy that she is not only reading a novel, but getting a peep into that enchanted land of "Society" where practical jokes pass for wit, intrigue takes the place once accorded to romance, and "life" is the late nineteenth-century equivalent of "gas and gaiters," and Mrs. Wittitterly is excited, soothed, content. She reads about plunging and Monte Carlo; she peruses stable-talk with the ignorant pleasure with which, in former days, we followed Fenimore Cooper's sea-talk, and liked it all the better the less comprehensible it was; she follows the white-plastroned, one-studded creatures whose brains never gave shelter to an idea, nor their hearts to an unselfish or worthy affection, but who are Lord Arthur This and Sir Reginald That, and she is "excited by the nobility, the Army, the drama," as depicted for her by the "ungrammatical twaddlers" of to-day. How much more excited, when one of those ungrammatical twaddlers happens to be "born in the purple," as Mrs. Wittitterly would express it, without the least notion of what "the purple" means; when a real live sprig of aristocracy, with a courtesy title, as regardless of grammar as Ingoldsby's "spectators," who "all cried, 'That's him!'" takes it in hand to reveal to her the arcana of that world whose dragon-guarded portals Mrs. Wittitterly regards with ardent curiosity and poignant longing! Sir Carnaby Jenks to tell one all about the Blues, my Lord Tom Noddy to reveal the grandeurs of "the purple"—how very charming! What does it signify, though Sir Carnaby's or my Lord Tom Noddy's style should be on a level with that of the penny dreadfuls, and his notions of the becoming resemble those of the company with whom Martin Chuzzlewit consorted on board the Mississippi steamboat, and whom he describes as having departed from the natural instincts of the savage? Mrs. Wittitterly is excited by the nobility, and Prince Hal is the sweetest, rascaliest young prince.

The trivial and insignificant production which has awakened these reflections is not in itself deserving of serious attention from a literary point of view. In composition it is schoolboyish, in construction it is feeble, its sentiment is flatly common-place, and its taste is execrable. As a specimen of the latter quality, we may mention that the hero (save the mark!) declares his love to the heroine immediately after a terrible accident to the phaeton which the lady is driving, and the following is a description of the latter occurrence:—

"Another second and the two chestnuts had charged straight at the massive gates, killing themselves on the spot, and with fearful force turning the mail phaeton completely over. 'Are you hurt, Viola?' asked Willie, anxiously.—'I don't know. What has happened?' asked the girl, in utter bewilderment. 'What is the matter, Willie?'—'The horses bolted, don't you remember, darling?' replied her companion, softly. 'But, if you are not hurt, Viola, we are well out of it.'—'I remember now. But oh, Willie, look at the horses!' exclaimed Viola, as the two chestnuts, lying twisted and distorted in a pool of blood, met her gaze. 'Willie, are they dead?'—'Thank God, yes, the brutes!' vindictively returned Eskdale. 'But, so long as you are not hurt, dearest, what does anything matter? So long as you are all right, I don't care twopence about the horses—ill-conditioned brutes, they might have killed us both! But come, Viola, we must walk at once to the nearest hotel. I shall have to send people to clear all this mess away.'"

* Estcourt. A Novel. By Lord James Douglas. London: Bentley and Son.

Lord James Douglas's "people" reminds us of "Ouida's" recent hero, who, in the dead of night, harnesses "some horses" to take him away from the imperious Wanda; and also of the same gifted novelist's early heroine, who was in the habit of ordering her maid to envelop her in "some cashmeres." Here is a sentence which might be set to a student of English as a sample of what to avoid:—"The vices of a rich man are regarded as simple exuberance of spirits; while nothing more is required of a rich woman, if she have any pretence to good looks." The first chapter opens with a breach of one of the easiest rules of English grammar, and the crudity of the whole is almost childish. But Mrs. Wittitlerly will be delighted with it; for the real, live lord who has written it treats her to dukes, marquises, Guardsmen, racecourses, stable-talk, marvelously successful actresses, heiresses of untold wealth, in short, all the privileges and properties of high life. Let nobody say that Mrs. Wittitlerly cannot get morality, as well as manners, out of the novels of her predilection; in this one at least we find the hero haranguing his bride on their common duties to their "people," and boldly declaring:—"A man, in my opinion, although as rich as Croesus, has no right to throw away his wealth and leave his fellow-beings in want." He has previously uttered this remarkable sentiment:—"I do not believe that it lies in the power of any man, no matter who, to command complete happiness." The author tears some of his characters ruthlessly away from racecourses and gilded saloons, and brings them to Paris during the siege and the Commune. It is, probably, rather simplicity than presumption that incites him to treat of those events; but the result is ludicrous. He would do well to stick to the battle-fields of Epsom, Doncaster, and Newmarket, and the colours carried by the combatants there; for by so doing he would give Mrs. Wittitlerly less to "skip," and better accomplish his mission of "exciting" her.

DR. BRENTANO ON THE ENGLISH CHRISTIAN-SOCIALIST MOVEMENT.*

To his studies on the English Trade Unions, on the Chartist movement—both of them works which have no equivalents in our own language, and which would well have deserved translation—Dr. Brentano has now added a study on the English Christian-Socialist movement, which will certainly rank among the best that we owe to his accomplished pen. It gives by far the fullest and most correct account that has yet appeared of a movement which has perhaps exercised a greater influence than is supposed on the social history of England in the nineteenth century, and the forthcoming publication of Mr. Maurice's letters, could it have preceded that of Dr. Brentano's work, would probably have only added to it greater fullness, without altering the lines on which it is written. The sympathetic insight into the views of the English Christian Socialists which Dr. Brentano has shown is indeed all the more remarkable, that he does not profess to share these views.

Starting with the position that the two factors of progress which especially distinguish the present from all other epochs in the history of human culture are, on the one hand, scientific investigation, which, in pressing after truth, draws all things in earth and above the earth within the sphere of its inquiries; and on the other, the claim that every man should be recognised as an object to himself, even in political life, Dr. Brentano observes that in the vehement opposition which both these factors had to meet, no influence was more conspicuous than that of the ruling Churches in each country. Yet soon within those Churches a new tendency began to appear. Schools arose which in the sphere of knowledge proclaimed the harmony of the results of science with the essential teachings of faith, and in the sphere of political and social life sought to evolve out of the teachings of Christianity on the rights and duties of man all liberal doctrines and all demands for the raising of the lower classes. Such were in France the school of Lamennais, aided by Montalembert, Gerbet, and Lacordaire; in Germany, that of Hermes and Günther. Both had sprung up within the Church of Rome; both were crushed by Rome. If in England a similar movement headed by Frederick Denison Maurice had a different fate, it was because he and his friends were Englishmen and Protestants.

Dr. Brentano's character-portrait of Mr. Maurice is the finest which has yet been drawn. Speaking from personal recollection, he says:—

"The leading feature of the man which impressed itself upon me was an imposing combination of inexorable earnestness, with a goodness that was irresistible. And these two essential qualities were at the same time the cause and the result of a life penetrated through and through with Christianity. It is necessary to understand quite clearly what this means. Nothing is commoner than to meet people who emphatically designate themselves as Christians, and speak of Christianity; nothing is rarer than those men who, in all their judgments and dealings, are led only by the Christian spirit. One believes in Christianity in general, but in particulars one believes in one's own self, with all its interests, its inclinations, and dislikes, its prejudices and caprices. Not only were Maurice's views of the world determined by Christian teaching, but it was impossible for him to consider any phenomenon of nature or of society otherwise than from the point of view of Christianity, or to enter into any kind of contact with men without giving expression, through the simplicity and gentleness which were bound up with his earnestness, through his loving sympathy, free from every trace of assumption or self-seeking, to a Christianity that had worked into his very flesh and blood. Such a man was plainly destined beforehand, through the whole nature of his being, to exercise an apostle's influence."

In one point only does this admirable sketch diverge from the truth. Dr. Brentano conceives of Mr. Maurice as of a man believing in Christianity. He believed not in Christianity, but in Christ. Faith in a Person, not devotion to an idea, was the main-spring of his life. A letter from Colonel Maurice, which Dr. Brentano has printed as a postscript to his pamphlet, points out this misconception. To the bulk of readers, indeed, it will, no doubt, seem a distinction without a difference; those who can feel the difference at all will feel also that the gap between the two conceptions is well nigh world-wide.

Dr. Brentano's history of the beginnings of the Christian-Socialist movement corrects its chronology, which in Mr. Hughes's otherwise admirable preface to Alton Locke is somewhat misstated. He traces the movement down into the Working-Men's College on the one hand, and the spread of co-operation, with its congresses, on the other, paying a just tribute to the self-devotion of Mr. Vansittart Neale, and recognising in his Manual for Co-operators the "old spirit of the Christian Socialists of 1848-54, the old, wide-hearted conception of Christianity." Still, he observes in his conclusion, the two essential points of the Christian-Socialist programme have not been realised. Productive associations barely exist; the world is as far as it ever was from subjecting agriculture, industry, trade, to the principle of association. And the working population is scarcely better disposed than it was before towards Christianity, let alone the State Church. But although these ideals have not been fulfilled, the whole demeanour of the upper classes towards the working-men is changed. To judge of this, let any one compare Kingsley's description of University students in Alton Locke with the description of the relations between students and working-men at the Oxford Congress in 1882. The educated generation which has grown up has taken to heart the teaching of the Christian Socialists, that it is their duty to take the lead of the working-classes in all their just efforts for advancement. The tone of the clergy towards the working-men has altered in like manner. And the corresponding results are seen among the working-men. Labour contests may still continue, the bulk of the working-men may still be Radicals; but there is no more Chartism, no social-democratic party, at enmity with the very order of society, striving for the domination of the working-class in the State, in order to recast society by law. The working-men belong to the great Liberal party, whose leaders are in the most cultivated circle. None are more enthusiastically devoted to Mr. Gladstone than the working-men. The great Volunteer movement rests mainly on the working-class. In point of fact, the abyss which formerly in England separated the higher from the lower class is now bridged over. Assuredly there is still much to do, and there always will be much. But what has been done is immense. And almost in everything have the Christian Socialists taken the initiative, gone before with teaching and example. Whatever may be the stand-point of the individual observer towards the various theories and proceedings of the Christian Socialists, the judgment of all upon the Christian-Socialist movement will be, "Pertransivit benefaciendo."

* Die Christlich-soziale Bewegung in Eng'land. Von Lujo Brentano. Separatabzug aus Jahrbuch für Gesetzgebung, Verwaltung, und Volkswirtschaft im Deutschen Reich. Herausgegeben von G. Schmoller. Leipzig: Dunkler und Humblot. 1883.

The writer of these lines was too closely connected with that movement to feel entitled as a critic to say whether or not Dr. Brentano's judgment upon it be a too favourable one. To some extent he would be disposed to say that Dr. Brentano paints in too roseate colours the improved relations between class and class, and the improved temper of the working-class. Although, in his opinion, every extension of the field of self-government in the associations of the working-class—every development of their friendly societies, their trade unions, their co-operative societies—affords a new bulwark against the rise of a party of anarchy like that of the Russian terrorists and a portion at least of the German Social Democrats, one must not forget that there are strata in the labour-world beyond the reach of association, unless, it may be, in the rudimentary and often noxious form of the burial society. In London, for instance, there are many trades in which Trades Unions only exist among the West End workers, all attempts at forming such at the East End failing miserably. In London, in Liverpool, in Manchester, Co-operation scarcely exists but for the artisan or factory worker, as distinguished from the mere labourer. The agricultural labourer it has scarcely touched here and there. Out of, say, five millions of members of registered Friendly Societies, two millions, probably, are insured for burial expenses only, the great bulk of them getting not more, or little more, than a halfpenny for every penny they subscribe, since the "loading" for management purposes is too often 50 per cent. It would be too much to say that there is not room in this dark, struggling, seething under-world of English society for a party of anarchy.

Yet not less than ever is the writer of these lines convinced that the spirit of that movement to which Frederick Denison Maurice gave the name of Christian Socialist is the one in which the dangers of the future, as of the past, have to be met. The name (though of late it has been revived in a new quarter) may have served its time. But the principle that fellowship in work is the only force which can overcome anarchy in all its forms,—that this force must sooner or later, by howsoever slow degrees, penetrate society through all its strata, human life in all its manifestations and energies,—that the only unfailing source from which such force can be derived, is the sense of Christian brotherhood which springs from faith in a Father of all, a God who is no idle abstraction, no logical Absolute, but one who "worketh hitherto" in almighty power and love,—this is a principle not for 1850 any more than for 1883, or any other year in the future of the earth's calendar. So far as the world can ever be set right, it can only be by making it more social, more partnerly; and the one social faith is that whose highest prayer is "That they all may be one."

VOLCANOES.*

THIS volume forms one of the International Scientific Series, and as such might be supposed to be written only for readers of a particular class, but it is really one that should claim the attention of a wider circle, and will well repay the perusal of those who might be inclined to turn from a subject of which they knew absolutely nothing. The author is a pupil and a warm admirer of the late Mr. Poulett Scrope, whose Considerations on Volcanoes and The Extinct Volcanoes of Central France have passed through several editions, and who committed to him the task of preparing a popular work on the present condition of our knowledge of volcanoes.

His first care has been to inform the unenlightened that volcanoes are not burning mountains, and that smoke and flame do not issue from their summit. To many these will be startling assertions, not only upsetting the impressions of their childhood, but obliging them to unlearn what was taught in the school manuals of their day. However, the statements are so clearly sustained that they must be accepted as facts:—

"In the first place," Mr. Judd says, "the action which takes place at volcanoes is not 'burning,' or combustion, and bears, indeed, no relation whatever to that well-known process. Nor are volcanoes necessarily 'mountains' at all; essentially, they are just the reverse, namely, holes in the earth's crust, or outer portion, by means of which a communication is kept up between the surface and the interior of our globe. When mountains do exist at centres of volcanic activity, they are simply the heaps of materials thrown out of these holes, and must, therefore, be regarded not as the causes, but as the consequences of volcanic action. Neither does this action always take place at the 'summits' of volcanic mountains, when such exist, for eruptions occur quite as frequently on their sides or at their base. That, too, which popular fancy regards as 'smoke' is really condensing steam or watery vapour, and the supposed raging 'flames' are nothing more than the glowing light of a mass of molten material reflected from the vapour clouds."

Another point on which Mr. Judd is anxious to set people right is that sulphur found in volcanic regions is the result, and not the cause of volcanic action. In school-books of comparatively modern date and use, it is stated that by burying certain quantities of sulphur, iron pyrites, and charcoal in a hole in the ground, a miniature volcano may be formed, producing all the essential phenomena of a volcanic eruption. No greater mistake, says Mr. Judd, could be made, for the chemical reactions which take place when sulphur and other substances are made to act upon each other differ entirely from the phenomena of volcanic action. A fact that always astonishes the uninitiated is that the great volcanic mountains, of which there are from 300 to 350, did not grow like ordinary mountains, but have been formed by the materials ejected from volcanic vents in the crust of the earth. One such, known as the Monte Nuovo, on the Bay of Naples, was formed only three and a half centuries ago. It stands 440 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and covers an area of more than half a mile in diameter. For two years the country round had been affected by earthquakes, which gradually increased in intensity, and attained their climax in September, 1538. On the 27th and 28th of that month these earthquake-shocks were felt almost continually day and night. On the 29th a depression of the ground was noticed, and from this depression, water, which was at first cold and afterwards tepid, began to issue. Four hours later the ground was seen to swell up and open, forming a gaping fissure, within which incandescent matter was visible. From this fissure numerous masses of stone, some of them "as large as an ox," with vast quantities of pumice and mud, were thrown up to a great height, and these, falling upon the sides of the vent, formed a great mound. This continued for two days and nights, and on the third day a considerable hill had been built up by the falling fragments; the ejections continued for a few more days; but the bulk of the hill had been formed by the ejections of the first two days, and it is found to be entirely composed of volcanic scorix, lapilli, and dust, and is now covered with thickets of stone pine.

There are three distinct kinds of action to be met with in all volcanic eruptions,—the formation of cracks or fissures in the earth's surface; the escape of steam with explosive violence from these openings, often propelling rock-fragments into the atmosphere; and the out-welling, under the influence of this compressed steam, of masses of molten materials." As a steam-engine can be best examined and understood when working at low pressure, so, thinks Mr. Judd, can the character of a volcano be best determined by selecting one of comparatively uniform low activity, like Stromboli, and there watching at leisure the symptoms that characterise all volcanoes. What is witnessed there is to be seen, in a more or less degree, and with more or less risk to the spectator, in all volcanic displays, the active cause in every instance being the escape of steam from the midst of incandescent, liquefied rock, and the grandeur of an eruption depending on the abundance and tension of the escaping steam. The black, slaggy bottom of the crater of Stromboli is traversed by numerous cracks, from which curling jets of vapour issue quietly, mingle with the atmosphere, and disappear. There are also larger apertures, which vary in number and position; sometimes only one is visible, sometimes six or seven. These larger apertures are divided into three classes. From those of the first, steam is emitted with loud, snorting puffs, like those produced by a locomotive engine; from those of the second, masses of molten material are seen welling out, and perhaps flowing outside the crater; and within those of the third may be seen a semi-liquid substance slowly heaving up and down; the agitation of this seething mass increases gradually, a gigantic bubble is formed, which violently bursts, and then follows a great rush of steam, carrying high into the atmosphere fragments of the liquid surface. At night it will be readily imagined that these appearances are even more striking. All the openings glow with a ruddy light, and the liquid matter is red or white-hot, while the crust that forms upon it is of a dull red. When a bubble bursts, and the crust is broken up by the escape of steam, a fresh-glowing surface of the incandescent material is exposed. At such moments, the vapour-cloud overhanging the mountain is lit up with a vivid light, not unlike that seen on the stream of vapour from the funnel of a locomotive when the engine-driver opens the furnace door. Such, abbreviated, is Mr. Judd's clear and interesting description of the interior of an active volcano; and seen, as he saw it, from a close and safe point of view, the effect must have been intensely absorbing. In contrast to the sluggish action of Stromboli, Mr. Judd gives a graphic account of the terrible eruption of Vesuvius in 1872, the conditions of both being similar. By means of instantaneous photography a permanent record of this outburst was obtained, and a calculation thereby made possible of its enormous power of ejection. Vesuvius, as is well known, rises nearly 4,000 ft. above the level of the sea. By this knowledge, and an examination of the photograph, it is seen that the vapours and rock-fragments were thrown nearly four miles into the atmosphere. During the eruption, the bottom of the crater was entirely broken up, and the sides of the mountain were rent by fissures in all directions, from which liquid matter oozed, until, as Professor Palmieri observed, "Vesuvius sweated fire." At three points, molten rock issued in such quantities as to form great fiery floods, which rushed down the sides of the mountain, and the watery vapour from which actually blistered the rock so as to give rise to innumerable miniature volcanoes, some of which remained in a state of independent activity for a considerable time. There are, we learn, varying degrees of liquidity in the flow of lavas, some, like rivers, filling every channel and deluging the surrounding country, whilst others creep along so slowly that their movement, a few inches in a day, can only be detected by most careful observation; even when falling over a precipice, these latter form but heavy, pendent masses, like grease guttering down a candle.

Although it is no longer doubted that volcanic outbursts are governed by natural laws, and although the causes and conditions that regulate them are so well known, it is not yet possible to predict the periods of their coming. It is something to have divested volcanic phenomena of their superstitious character, and to have shown that they are operations of nature obeying definite laws, the grandest or the feeblest outburst being alike caused by the escape of imprisoned steam or water-gas from the midst of masses of molten materials. Mr. Judd considers there is no doubt as to the close connection between earthquakes and volcanoes, and that the former, when very violent, usually precede and accompany volcanic outbursts. The recent earthquake in the Island of Ischia has not, however, as yet been followed by an eruption of the neighbouring Vesuvius, nor was the still more recent eruption of the Krakatoa Volcano in Java preceded by any warning earthquake. But the study of the laws of volcanic action is yet in its infancy, though the establishment of observatories on Vesuvius and Etna and the record of exact and continuous observations will, it is hoped, lead to important results, especially if we consider the advances made during the last hundred years, when the observations were so scanty and intermittent. It is quite probable our natural philosophers may be as successful in determining the times of volcanic outbursts as astronomers have been in fixing the exact moment of eclipses. At one time, they were equally portentous and inexplicable; and long before astronomers were acquainted with the causes of eclipses, they were aware that they succeeded one another at regular intervals.

There is so much interesting matter in this volume incident to volcanoes, their structure, causes, and effects, which would not be suspected, that we feel sure no one will regret having read Mr. Judd's book. He expresses himself very clearly, and takes such pains to enlighten his readers thoroughly on every branch of his subject, that great credit is due to him for this contribution to the Scientific Series. Apart from a mastery of natural science and of existing volcanic lore, he shows a personal acquaintance with several of the phenomena he describes; and whilst his own theories, many of them necessarily tentative, indicate extensive knowledge and zealous research, his views on the theories of others disclose judgment and discernment. Aided by the investigations of Spallanzani, Dolomieu, and other vulcanologists, and the recent teachings of the chemist, mineralogist, and microscopist, Mr. Judd's work contains in brief and concise language all that is yet known concerning volcanoes.

THE COMPLETE MACLISE GALLERY.*

MACLISE's portraits, and what publishers now-a-days term "the accompanying descriptive letter-press" of Maginn, are so well known, that it is well to state at once what Mr. William Bates, the editor of both, has done. He describes his volume as "a reproduction, on a slightly reduced scale, but with no impairment of their effect and truth, of the eighty-one portraits and groups, originally published in Fraser's Magazine, 1830-1838, under the title of "A Gallery of Illustrious Literary Characters." To these have been added portraits of Henry Hallam, Thackeray, "Father Prout," and Maclise himself. The book is in essence very much the same as the costly "Gallery," published in 1874, and the edition of which has been exhausted. But Mr. Bates has considerably reduced the Maginn matter, much of which, in spite of its liveliness, undoubtedly looked like the dregs of brandy-punch, and enlarged and brought up to date his own biographical sketches, while "Father Prout" for the first time appears in the "Gallery." We should say, therefore, that this stout and closely-printed volume is the final edition of the "Gallery,"—so far as the present generation, at all events, is concerned. But one of the original eighty-five hommes éminents remains—the Rev. G. R. Gleig, late Chaplain-General to the Forces, and Carlyle's junior by one year only—and the reproductions of the original pictures have now a faded appearance. But this volume, full of lively narrative and anecdote, is, apart from the sketches, one that can be taken up at odd times and read with pleasure. Mr. Bates's style has the freedom, and, it must be added, the prolixity of the old school. Ten years hence, how many public writers will there be who will weight their pages with classical quotations, and talk about "the humble obsecration of the Latin poet"? How many will write thus even about an ultimus Romanorum?—"Well, Human Life is a 'Reign of Terror,' and Time a tyrant more ruthless than Robespierre. To have simply lived through a century—exemplum vitæ a cornice secundæ—is an achievement in itself, and might well justify a tantum boast." Mr. Bates might further have weeded his memoirs, after writing them, of a few of his anecdotes. Not that he has any liking for what he would be certain to style the chronique scandaleuse—witness how he deals with Dr. Lardner's amours, the Lytton domestic infelicities, and the Blessington-D'Orsay history—but that many of his stories, being dependent for their vitality on circumstances, have lost their charm, now that these circumstances have passed into the limbo of oblivion. Mr. Bates has, however, shown much good sense in refraining from saying things of the dead calculated to pain the living—provided always the living are not hypersensitive—and some of his literary criticisms, if not particularly profound, are sounder than much that passes for profundity. Take, for example, what he has to say on the mission of Wordsworth, and his incidental observations on that too little known Scotch poet, Thomas Aird, the biographer of "Delta," who figures in the "Gallery" as the author of "Mansie Wauch." Above all things, Mr. Bates loves his subjects; that being so, much more would freely have been forgiven him than actually needs to be forgiven. He has presented his readers with such a host of anecdotes, that it would not have been at all surprising if he had fallen into blunders as to the causes or paternity of some of them. But he has made remarkably few mistakes. It will occur at once, however, to the reader that the "Déjà!" attributed to Talleyrand on hearing a dying friend say he felt "the tortures of the damned," has, lately and apparently with good reason, been maintained to be much older than either Talleyrand or Louis Philippe, who has also been credited—or rather discredited—with it. There was probably as much cynical make-believe about Talleyrand's improvised wit, as about his general character and career. He had no love of truth, but he had something very like a passion for social and intellectual tenue.

The time has passed for falling into ecstasies over Maclise's portraits; the time has probably not yet come for measuring him by artists in his own line. No one would think of placing him in the same category as Hogarth, or Gilray, or Rowlandson; he was, at least essentially, neither a moralist nor a caricaturist, though he was a satirist in virtue of his realism. Nor does his work at once suggest that of Mr. Tenniel, or of the more sarcastic artists of Vanity Fair. Of living men who make a business of photographing fools, rather than of shooting follies, as they fly, Mr. Sambourne, barring "outline," most resembles him. Of dead artists whose portraits are familiar, he seems most to remind one of Kay, of the almost forgotten "Edinburgh Worthies." The leading idea of all three is the putting of the strong—or, failing that, the weak—points of character into the face. But the portrait-painter who is a man of genius is assured of immortality, however styles in art, as in all things else, may change. It is Maclise's Talleyrand, and Godwin, and Scott, and Coleridge, and Beaconsfield, and Rogers (the Rogers that made Goethe shudder and turn away in disgust), and no other man's, that will in the future resuscitate old memories and serve as texts or excuses for moralisation. His Talleyrand alone would, as the late Mr. Rossetti says, show him to be "a great master of tragic satire." But for our part, we like some of Maclise's minor or less-known portraits at least as much as those which have gained him celebrity. Such are his James Morier, and Thomas Hill, and William Roscoe, and Leigh Hunt. It would be difficult to say whether the sensitiveness or "childishness" of Hunt—which was not quite understood either by the Carlyles or by Dickens—or the simple fortitude, untinged with bitterness, which enabled Roscoe to face and conquer misfortune, is the better because the more quietly brought out.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The contents of the fourth number of that new and energetic quarterly, the Scottish Review, are even more varied than those of its predecessors. Theology, for a wonder, has no papers devoted to it, whereas pure literature has two, dealing with Walt Whitman, and, under the title of "Three Representative Poets," with Tennyson, Browning, and Swinburne. Two others, the one giving a useful summary of Zola's "Natural and Social History of a Family under the Second Empire," and the other treating of "Emerson's Social Philosophy," may be described as socio-literary. All four papers are excellent and suggestive in their way, especially those on Walt Whitman and Emerson. The writer on Whitman certainly makes the most of a somewhat difficult subject, and shows considerable ingenuity in corking-down the extraordinary new wine of American democracy in the old bottles of Christian morality and spirituality. The author of "The Educational Wrongs of the Middle-Classes" has a firm grip of facts, and establishes the truth of his dictum that under the present School-Board system, the upper and middle-class ratepayers in Scotland get practically no benefit from the new national schools, although they contribute between a half and two-thirds of the total cost of their maintenance. But why should not the members of the Scotch middle-class send their children to these schools? Was it not the glory of the old parochial school that in it there existed no class distinctions, which, indeed, Presbyterian parity considers to be altogether artificial? Under the title of "The Mean in Politics," we have a defence of Whiggery. The author is a quarter of a century behind in his politics, but his style is lively and his language moderate. The defunct Scotch Local Government Board Bill forms the text for a paper on "Patriotism and Politics North of the Tweed." The author contends against "playing with Home-rule or dallying with separatism," and maintains that an Under-Secretary is all that Scotland needs to satisfy her administrative wants, the "ideal Home Office or Ministry of the Interior being one presided over by a Minister responsible to Parliament, and having under him three Under-Secretaries, one for each of the Three Kingdoms." The writer's political opinions are very decided, and are to the effect that Scotland's proper position is that of the close ally of England and the advance-guard of British progress, which he looks at from the democratic point of view. Perhaps the most interesting paper in the number is one on "Scotland in the Eighteenth Century." It contains a large amount of very interesting and out-of-the-way information, well condensed. The summaries of foreign reviews, which we have already commented on as a good feature in the Scottish Review, are even better and fuller than usual.

Ten Great Religions, Part II. A Comparison of All Religions. By James Freeman Clarke. (Houghton, Mifflin, and Co., Boston, U.S.) The plan and purpose of this book are thus described in the preface:—"Instead of describing and discussing each of the great faiths of mankind separately, it attempts to show what they all teach on the different points of human belief. We ask what each declares concerning God, the soul, the future life, sin and salvation, human duty, prayer and worship, inspiration and art." The carrying-out of this purpose has naturally led to a new development of the subject. The beliefs of man in his more primitive condition could not be neglected, in the pursuit of such an inquiry. Hence, there has been added to the discussion of the ten religions which have sprung up in more or less advanced states of society a description of what Mr. Clarke calls "tribal" religions. The book shows, as will easily be believed by those who have read the earlier volume, great research and a truly candid and equitable spirit. Some of its speculations are not wanting in boldness. Here is an example:—

"The modern doctrine of the evolution of bodily organisms is not complete, unless we unite with it the idea of a corresponding evolution of the spiritual mind, from which every organic force derives its unity. Evolution has a satisfactory meaning only when we admit that the soul is educated and developed by passing through many bodies, and not only accept the theory that our ancestors may have been apes or fishes, but the larger doctrine that we ourselves were probably once apes or fishes, and that we learned much in these conditions which is useful to us in our present forms."

Here is the conclusion of the whole matter:—

"There remains then to be considered only the possibility that the world will outgrow the teaching and example of Jesus, and leave him behind. But in what respect will the world outgrow him? Not in his teaching concerning God, of whom he declares that he is a Spirit, and that those who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. Higher than this, worship cannot go. With this Jesus connected the doctrine of the unity and supreme goodness of God. 'Hear, O Israel! the Lord our God is one Lord.' 'There is none good but one, that is God.' When you have reached the unity of all things in one supreme being of perfect goodness, it would seem impossible to go higher. In the same way Jesus has posited the highest possible law of ethics when he teaches us to love God and love man. These ideas may be infinitely developed and unfolded, as Christ himself foresaw and foretold. He avoided limiting truth by the letter of his own statements, but declared that the Spirit of Truth would lead his followers into all truth. He himself thus opened the way for indefinite progress; but these foundation-truths, when once seen, must remain as foundations always. A truth once recognised continues always true. These are,—

'Truths which wake
To perish never.'

We may build a multitude of additions on such a basis, but 'other foundation can no man lay than that is laid.' The foundation of faith once laid, that work is done. Christianity in the past has gone through a long cycle of change; it has altered its type from age to age; taken up and dropped again many beliefs and many practices. It will probably continue to do so, developing more and more into the character of which the life of Jesus is the type. As it does this, it will become better able to convert the world to him. It will not offer to mankind a creed and a ritual, but the life of the Master himself,—

'Most human and yet most divine,
The flower of man and God.'

The Colthorpe Cousins, and other Stories. By Annie Thomas. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—It is always somewhat of an annoyance to find what one had expected to be a novel of the customary length disintegrated, so to speak, into some twenty fragments. These little stories are, for the most part, tiresome. A writer with any sense of prudence will not waste a really good idea upon them. The motive, therefore, is commonly inadequate, and there is not opportunity to show much skill in the working-out. Of course, love is mostly the theme of The Colthorpe Cousins and its fellows. The young women are, we observe, pretty, and for the most part, headstrong,—that is to say, when they are not deceitful. The men are feeble. But it is impossible to criticise this multitude of stories. Let it suffice to say that they have not merit enough to do away the first unfavourable impression produced by finding that the book is not what it seems.

Lives of the Princesses of Wales. By Barbara Clay Finch. (Remington.)—We have here three closely-printed volumes, giving the lives of Joan of Kent, Anne of Warwick, Katharine of Arragon, Caroline of Anspach, Augusta of Saxe-Gotha, and Caroline of Brunswick. The preparation of them has been essentially a piece of book-making, but it is conscientious, of its kind. It is, indeed, too conscientious. Miss Finch has loaded her volumes, especially the two last, with quotations from all sorts of authorities, historical, poetical, and gossip. She would have done better if she had spared her readers at least nine-tenths of them, and her biographies would have been very much more readable. The misery, so long-drawn-out, of poor Queen Caroline's story especially might have been kept within narrower limits. Miss Finch's style is rather Hepworth-Dixonian. But she quotes so much from other writers, that she scarcely does her own powers justice.

Scrap from My Sabretasche. By George Carter Stent. (W. H. Allen.)—Mr. Stent, who is known as the author of a Chinese dictionary, here presents us with a book of a very different and much livelier kind. It consists of his personal adventures while in the 14th Dragoons, beginning with barrack life in Canterbury and Maidstone, and ending with the capture of Jhansi and Gwalior. Mr. Stent, who seems to have a large fund of animal spirits and a happy turn for theatricals, managed to get a good deal of pleasure out of his soldier life. Having a quick eye for character, he made many observations on the social characteristics of the countries his regiment visited, many of which, as here published, strike us as new.

A Daughter of the Philistines. (David Douglas, Edinburgh.)—The "Philistines" are a family of the name of Hampton, who, having made money in the Far West (of the United States), naturally come to spend it in the East. There is a father, who is a vulgar, unscrupulous speculator, not altogether unkindly; a mother who has her social ambitions, and a son who contrives, thanks to an extravagant expenditure and a certain languid insolence of manner, to make himself one of the leaders of fashion. There is no little skill displayed in the way in which Alma Hampton's character is developed in the midst of such surroundings. She is not perfect by any means, she has not even courage and steadfastness, but she is true and has fine instincts, which keep her right in the end. The doings of the "Philistines" themselves do not make pleasant reading. The young dandy, Walter, in particular, is made more odious than he need be, but the "daughter" is a gracious and attractive figure. We feel an interest in her throughout the story, as in a real person, and are glad to leave her, all storms safely weathered, in the harbour of domestic content.

Two Friends in Holland and Belgium. By M. A. W. (Remington.)—This is a pleasant little volume, which any who may be thinking of visiting the two countries mentioned should add to their "Murray." It does not, of course, pretend to fulfil the function of a guide-book, but it takes some twenty or so interesting spots, and gives a lively description of them. The writer intersperses his account with some interesting historical episodes. Notable among these is the strange story of the death of Florence de Montmorency, Seigneur de Montigny. Montigny was sent by the Regent Margaret of Parma to Philip II. on a secret mission, and the story of how Philip murdered him in prison is one of the strangest stories on record. Never did the King prove more unscrupulous, more cruel, and more accomplished in the art of deceiving. Here, to turn to another subject, is a hint to Colonel Henderson:—"Most of the Amsterdam police speak either English or French, and are always politely ready to put you on your way." Our police are ready enough to help, but it would be very difficult to find even one who speaks any other language than his own.

Politics and Life in Mars. (Sampson Low and Co.)—This is a very dull satire, as unlike as possible to what should be the model of such attempts, Swift's "Brobdingnag" and "Lilliput." Thousands have read these books without a suspicion of their meaning; yet how full of meaning are they, to those who understand! There is no chance of misunderstanding what the gentleman who tells us about the people in Mars and their ways intends. Indeed, that there may be no mistake, he sometimes stops to explain himself, and to point out the resemblances which he wishes his readers to observe. Surely it is not the skilful painter who thinks it necessary to write under his picture, "This a horse." The writer's chief purpose is to show how the people of Sadgreen obtained their legislative independence from the Ourwandars (these names seem to indicate but a feeble power of invention). But he has other views, which he seeks to commend in this fashion of his own to his readers. This wise and happy Martial people nationalised the land, or rather the water, for they lived in the water, a fancy which might have been expanded, if only there had been the power, with something really effective and amusing; they abolished monarchy in favour of republicanism, and they contracted marriages for a limited number of years. We confess ourselves unable to see wit or wisdom in Politics and Life in Mars.

Once More. By Lady Margaret Majendie. (Richard Bentley and Son.)—A pretty volume of pleasant tales, by a writer who possesses an excellent gift of humour, and an easy and refined style. "Uncle George's Will," originally published in Temple Bar, is the best of these stories. The idea is not novel, but the treatment is quite original. A capital drawing-room comedietta might be made out of the ingenious plot and racy dialogue.

A Fallen Foe. By Katharine King. (Hurst and Blackett.)—We have always liked Miss King's novels, for their healthy and happy tone, the breezy, open-air life, and the ready sympathy and common-sense there are in them. They are perfectly moral, but never preachy, and the knowledge of animals and sport which the author possesses lends them an additional attraction. A Fallen Foe is no exception to the rule. The story is interesting, well constructed, well written, and conveys an impression of its being a true tale.

Imperatoris Justiniani Institutionum Libri IV. With Introduction, Commentary, Excursus, and Translation. By J. C. Moyle, B.C.L. (The Clarendon Press.)—Though Mr. Moyle's volumes are, of course, intended as a text-book for students of law, his general introduction will repay perusal to all who desire to complete their acquaintance with the history of Rome. Law was so important an element in the city's inner development, and in its relations to the world which it conquered, that the student of its history must needs know something about it. Here he will find what will be most useful to him, even though he do not intend to pursue the study with a professional purpose. Not a few interesting questions connected with Roman life, and some perplexing problems—the singular phenomenon, e.g., of an annually elected legislator, the praetor urbanus (for the praetor was more than a judge)—are explained. The latter part of the introduction gives a clear and compendious sketch of the legal schools which arose when law became a science. Each book is furnished with a special introduction. There is a copious running commentary on the text. The second volume contains a translation.

The SPECTATOR can be had on Sunday mornings at Mr. K. Nilsson's, 212 Rue de Rivoli, Paris.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE event of the week is a lamentable one. King Alfonso, of Spain, arrived in Paris on Saturday, and was received by President Grévy, who accompanied him in another carriage to the Spanish Embassy. The escort was small, though sufficient for honour, and could only just penetrate the vast crowds—over 200,000, it is said—which overwhelmed the procession with insult, hissing and hooting at the King, crying, "Down with the Uhlan!" and yelling at the eminent Spaniards who had gone out to welcome their Sovereign. No actual violence was offered, but the temper of the crowd was unmistakable, and no attempt has been made to soften the accounts of the demonstration. Indeed, President Grévy, though not till the following day, pronounced, in the name of the Government, a formal apology, begging the King not "to confound France with the misérables who have compromised her old renown by demonstrations I repudiate. Unfortunately, our laws are powerless to repress such things." The King replied, in stately phrase, that "as chief of a proud and noble nation he could not remain any longer without compromising its dignity," but "desirous of giving a special proof of his regard and consideration for France," he would meet the Ministers at the Élysée. He did so, and was hooted again in going and returning, the police offering no interference and making no arrests.

The following is the King's official opinion upon the whole affair as reported by the correspondent of the Times. It is dignified and Spanish:—"I have no resentment against the French nation, and I am touched by M. Grévy's visit, but there is at the bottom of my heart a profound sadness, a sadness not due to anything affecting myself individually; but to the misunderstanding which henceforth exists between two nations of the same race, having to a great extent the same interests, and who ought to be attached to each other. The step taken by M. Grévy may make me forget the bitterness of my entry, but Spain will long remember the hisses of the Parisian population, who would not see that behind the King it was the nation they were hissing." The King left for Madrid on Monday early, where he received an enthusiastic welcome. The whole population, from nobles to water-carriers, turned out to do him honour; all classes were admitted to the Palace, and throughout the night a stream of 30,000 visitors passed in to pay him homage. He has, in fact, in consequence of the outrage, received an informal plébiscite from the Spanish people.

The demonstration was, in part, spontaneous, and in part due to the incitements of the journals, many of them respectable, as, for instance, M. Clémenceau's organ, La Justice, which declared that the King in accepting a Colonelcy of Uhlans—which he could not refuse—had insulted France. It is difficult to credit that responsible Ministers approved the action of the populace; but it is believed that General Thibaudin refused either to receive the King, to dine with the King, or to apologise to the King, and the refusal has helped on a serious Ministerial crisis. M. Jules Ferry has insisted that General Thibaudin shall resign, but M. Grévy demurs, holding the General to be a protection against the Orleanists. The dispute is not yet settled, for behind it is one far more formidable. M. Ferry, it is stated, insists that the President's son-in-law, M. Wilson, shall quit the Élysée, declaring that he has constantly thwarted the Ministry, to which he is opposed. M. Grévy, it is publicly stated, replies to this that M. Wilson is only a Deputy, and that he neither can nor will turn his daughter out of his house. If the Chamber insists upon such a step, or even discusses it, he will at once resign. The truth of this story may be questionable, but it is certain that an acute crisis exists, that M. Wilson's influence is bitterly resented by large parties, and that M. Grévy is losing much of his popularity. His personal action is dignified, but he is too much in the hands of a clique who are far less constitutional than he is.

Our total impression of the affair is that it may prove a disaster for France. Germany has been insulted without cause, and Spain in the teeth of reason, the President has lost prestige, and the Ministry is breaking up. Moreover, the Parisian mob has once more proved itself an important factor in great affairs. All these things alarm the respectable classes, and increase their permanent impression that the Republic has entered on a downward course. That is, of course, an exaggeration; but the decline of M. Grévy is, we fear, real, and the Chamber will have a most difficult task in apportioning blame and regulating a reconstruction of the Government. Fortunately, all classes appear disposed to await the reassembling of the Chamber, and the Deputies will return fresh from contact with constituents who neither fear nor reverence Paris. They may find a new Ministry not afraid of M. Wilson, and, by adopting M. Grévy's policy of abstention from "spirited" foreign policy, replace him in accord with his Ministers. The grand difficulty, however, will be General Thibaudin, whom M. Grévy will not dismiss by fiat, and whom a large party in the Chamber wish to retain. They know he cannot strike coups d'état, and they believe that he could prevent any movement among the higher officers of the Army. Unfortunately, the known Generals who are also convinced Republicans are now few.

The Paris correspondent of the Times had a long interview on Tuesday with the Marquis de la Vega de Armijo, the Foreign Minister of Spain. The statements made were rather curious than interesting, but one or two points may be noted. The King made no alliance with Germany, though German and Spanish interests were discussed in such a way that the question of colonies came up, and the German Ministers said they did not wish for any. That looks as if Spain had, at all events, hinted at a transfer of the Philippines, or of her claims on islands further south. Moreover—and this is really important—the Minister decidedly shirked the question of Morocco. He only said France should not have it, or any European Power other than Spain, and did not deny that Spain would be glad to make Morocco safe by an occupation. Of all the possible Spanish requests to Germany, that is the most probable. If France could be kept from interfering, King Alfonso might personally command in an invasion of Morocco, conquer it, as O'Donnell nearly did, and refound his dynasty through the gratified pride of his subjects, who have for centuries regarded Morocco as their heritage in reversion.

The Tories are all alive. Sir S. Northcote is speaking at Belfast, and on Monday Lord Cranbrook delivered in Birmingham a speech characterised elsewhere; while on Tuesday Mr. Gibson delighted the Conservatives of Glasgow. His speech was of the usual kind. The Government had spent "millions" more than the Conservatives; had "convulsed India from end to end" with the Ilbert Bill; in their language had, as regarding Egypt, "elevated hedging into a science;" and had only "scotched the Irish snake." Mr. Gibson, however, did not deny that elements of hope are now appearing in Ireland, spoke of increased quiet and "returning prosperity," and thought that in the creation of a peasant-proprietary a vast field might be found for beneficent legislation. As it is upon Ireland that Mr. Gibson is thoroughly instructed, Liberals may accept Mr. Gibson's declamation as, upon the whole, favourable to the Ministry.

There is common-sense left in Manchester. Dr. Pankhurst obtained only 6,216 votes out of the 52,000 upon the new Register, while Mr. Houldsworth, polling the full strength of his party as it now stands, received 18,188. As the votes given to Dr. Pankhurst are far less than the number of Irish electors, it is probable that very few English Radicals voted, the majority feeling, with us, that wild views are as great a disqualification in a philanthropic Red as in the haughtiest Tory. That conviction is what we want to see. There is no better representative than the man whose motive power in politics is feeling for the people, but he must have sense, and knowledge of facts, and experience enough to be aware that this planet will never become a world where all are at ease, all cultivated, and all good. If Dr. Pankhurst had been elected, every Radical candidate at the general election would have been told that universal female suffrage, the abolition of the Army, the payment of the Debt out of the land, and the confiscation of corporate property were within the accepted programme of his party. We can fight heartily for Mr. Smith, of Liverpool, though we think he occasionally dreams; but any candidate whatever, to call forth our sympathy, must be a reasoning human being, who will admit that the truths of arithmetic are absolute, and that the Eighth Commandment is above any theory whatever. The State has a perfect right to tax its subjects twenty shillings in the pound, but if it taxes only men above six feet in height, it robs.

The speech of M. Tisza to the Hungarian Chamber on October 3rd shows clearly the policy adopted by the Government in Croatia. It will yield upon every point except the right of the Magyars to rule. The Government of Buda-Pesth will enforce order, said M. Tisza, will restore the escutcheons pulled down, and will, if the power of the State is denied, enforce its will by military measures. But upon every other subject it will listen to the Croats, and "reject all idea of driving things to an extreme." This means that agrarian grievances and grievances as to taxation will be redressed, and is the regular policy of the House of Hapsburg. We do not know, if the dual system of the monarchy is to be maintained, that a better could be adopted; but it will hardly satisfy the Slavs. Their radical complaint is that they are subjected to a dominant caste apart from them in language and aspirations, and not even justice will extinguish the sense of this grievance. It cannot, however, be removed without a contest with the armed Magyars, secretly aided by all Germans, to which the Austrian Court is as yet unequal. The oddity of the position is that the reigning House is not quite sure which nationality it means ultimately to adopt.

The French Foreign Office is said to have sent an ultimatum to Pekin. M. Ferry, emboldened by a report from M. Tricou stating that China is not preparing for war, and that the southern provinces deprecate hostilities, has demanded that southern Tonquin shall become French, and that northern Tonquin shall be placed under a mixed administration of Anamite and Chinese Mandarins. The statement is curiously definite, though it comes from the Figaro, which is always wrong; and if it is true, it implies war. It is, in fact, only a veiled demand for the surrender of the whole of Tonquin. The Government of Pekin cannot make the concession, under penalty of the overthrow of the dynasty; nor, if any of its declarations can be trusted, would it if it could. To give up Tonquin is to give up the possibility of governing the rich South without a garrison, which would consume all the revenue. We give the statement, because it is treated as important; but, for ourselves, we believe that M. Ferry has agreed with the President to await the decision of the Chamber, and that the Chamber will not permit any serious distant expedition. Note in this connection that M. Tricou is said to have reported his opinion that Chinese resistance to the cession is entirely inspired by the English, who dread competition. That is absurd, but it is like all that is reported of M. Tricou.

The Treasury has pulled up the Metropolitan Board very sharply. In a letter from the Secretary, Mr. Leonard Courtney, my Lords inform the Chairman that the coal and wine duties, which expire in 1889, cannot be regranted without urgent necessity, the former duty amounting to 7 per cent. ad valorem at the place of sale on an article of the first necessity. The Treasury observe that the Metropolitan Board now owe £19,000,000, involving a total charge of £1,000,000 a year, and that they are increasing this debt at the rate of £8,000,000 in five years, without ever defining the limit within which they think indebtedness safe, or the proportion debt should bear to the property charged with it. The Treasury perceive clearly that a Board like the Metropolitan will be inclined to spend to justify its own existence, but hold that it should use its powers of borrowing with discretion, and with some consideration for the wants of the next generation. My Lords, therefore, decline to sanction the new expenditure proposed, amounting to £13,000,000, until their requirements, essential to sound finance, have been complied with. The warning—for it is only a warning—is a wise one; but it is difficult to imagine how London is to be improved without money, or what is to be the substitute for the coal duties. Rates on houses are too high already, and we cannot tax incomes for municipal purposes, while a special liquor duty of adequate amount would impede all traffic.

The Parnellite invasion of Ulster came to a speedy and happily bloodless end, and the rumour that Mr. Parnell himself had been murdered by an Ulster Orangeman proved to be only an imaginative prevision of what might possibly have happened, if Mr. Parnell had tempted fate by attempting to stump the actual "Black North." As a matter of fact, he was more wisely advised, and had remained on this side of the Channel; while Mr. T. P. O'Connor, with two or three lesser Leaguers, made a rapid raid into and still more rapid retreat from Tyrone. Mr. O'Connor seems to have had a narrow escape from the Ulster equivalent for tar and feathers at Portadown, the locality of the famous Orange ballad of '48 beginning,—

"I am a loyal Orangeman, From Portadown, ayont the Bann," and in which the indiscriminating truculence of the Orange mind is finely displayed by the couplet,—

"The first of them, I'll shoot, by Gog, Is Redington, that Popish dog."

Sir T. Redington being Lord Clarendon's Under-Secretary at the time.

The Australian mails received this week supply abundant evidence that the movement in favour of confederation and annexation is spreading steadily. The conduct of the Melbourne Government in refusing the Irish informers leave to land, and sending them on board the nearest man-of-war, must be regarded as earnest of what they will do with convicts of other nationalities; and at this moment the despatch of a few transports loaded with Bécidivistes from Toulon, or the arrival of a few boatloads of "escapees" from New Caledonia on Australian soil, might have sudden and far-reaching consequences. It will be interesting to watch the attitude of the Colonies of New South Wales and Tasmania towards the new movement. With their peculiar history, it is difficult to expect that they should be so grimly in earnest as Victoria, New Zealand, and Queensland evidently are; but, on the other hand, this very reflection may goad them to an even more perfervid zeal. Apparently, none of the Colonies would gain more both by annexation and confederation.

Professor Dicey has attacked in the Times the conduct of the Victorian Government in refusing to allow the Irish informers to land at Melbourne, and the Agent-General for the Colony, Mr. Murray Smith, has replied, defending Mr. Service's action. The defence is complex, but on the whole conclusive. We now know on official authority that these men were sent to Melbourne by the Irish Executive in spite of a formal protest of the Victorian Government, communicated through the Colonial Office in ample time. No Government with any sense of self-respect could allow them to land after that. When the men themselves became aware of the state of feeling in Australia, they wrote requesting not to be landed. On the question of technical legal right, of which Professor Dicey naturally makes much, there is a good deal said and to be said. During the furious agitation against transportation which nearly lost Australia to the Empire thirty years ago, it was seriously proposed, as a measure of retaliation, to charter a ship at Melbourne, fill it with colonial convicts and jail-birds, and debark them in England. Does Professor Dicey hold that the English Government would be justified, from any regard for strict legal right, in allowing these men to land? Surely there are rights of quarantine against crime, as well as against cholera.

There is peace, but the nations are growing more suspicious than ever. France and Italy are now "taking precautions" against each other. The Italian Government, having a large fleet, is beginning to fortify the island of Madalena, which it regards, for reasons not given, as the "key" of its maritime position. Thereupon the French Government appoints a military Commandant of Corsica, and the Italian papers see in that evidence that France intends to seize Sardinia and to paralyse the Italian fleet. All that is surely very melancholy. Italy, with her northern frontier exposed as it is, is not going to strike at France by sea; nor is France, if she means mischief, likely to waste time and men in Sardinia, where a corps d'armée would be about as dangerous to Rome as if it were in Marseilles. The littérateurs of France seem all to have gone crazy with suspicion and anger, and to be ready to fight Germany, England, Spain, and Italy all at once,—and all for nothing. Imagine Italy risking its existence in order to get back Corsica, instead of Nice!

In the meeting of the Social Science Congress on Thursday, Dr. T. Clifford Allbutt, senior physician of the Leeds Infirmary, made a furious assault on competitive examination. He believes that the children of much examined men show traces of nervous disease, and that if mothers are educated in the same way, the result will be degeneracy of race. We are by no means devotees of competitive examination, holding that if men were honest, patronage and pass examinations would be better; but is not this statement an exaggeration? Is it really true that the children of high wranglers and "double-firsts" are rickety, under-sized, or nervous? The facts can readily be ascertained, and meanwhile, is it foolish to take comfort from one well-known instance? Lord Hartington is the son of the Duke of Devonshire, a man who received a double-first, and who could, past all question, have won an Indian Civil-Service commission. Does he look one whit weaker than the son of any peasant or trooper? And will Dr. Allbutt just tell us why, if physical injuries are not inherited, which is certain, mental injuries should be? The examinee may be hurt, and we are certain often is, but his children are not. If mental culture destroys physique, it is a bad look-out for the world; but is there a group of peasants who, apart from effects of years, could thrash the present Cabinet?

The Social Science Congress was opened on Wednesday with a speech by Sir R. Temple, which is in itself a splendid example of the first of Indian difficulties. Everything in India is on too vast a scale,—classes are nations, cesspools are great ravines filled with the accumulation of ages, drainage covers spaces with which only Governments can deal. Sir R. Temple's address has just this defect. He evidently intended to begin with a list of the work to be done, but such is the multitude of objects to be sought that the list swamped the address, and is almost the whole of it. The work to be attacked would make a philanthropic Stephenson gasp, and for ourselves, we disbelieve in its ever being done, except through mental training. We may teach all Indians sanitary principles, and so improve the health of a continent; but to cleanse the cesspools of two hundred millions is beyond the power of any Government whatever, much less a foreign one. It is not only the number, but the depth of the cesspools. Sir Richard Temple treats the idea of sanitation having produced typhoid as a prejudice, but it is undoubtedly true. So it would in London, if it were necessary to begin by cleaning out a dozen Regent Canals, choked to a depth of twenty feet with the filth of centuries.

We wonder why Railway servants, of all mankind, are so powerless to obtain decent treatment. The annual meeting of their representative body was held in Edinburgh on Wednesday, and it was stated by several delegates that even recently they had been required to work from 17 to 22 hours a day, or from 88 to 105 hours a week. This is monstrous, even if we admit that a great machine like a Railway is justified, in the public interest, in using men up, for the public is constantly endangered by the labour of men too tired to think, or see, or act quickly. Imagine a pointsman with, perhaps, 25 trains to direct, working the levers after 17 hours of continuous toil! So long as nothing new occurs, he goes on automatically, even if really asleep; but the moment he has to think, all is over, and there is a collision. We believe the men's statements to be literally true, and entirely agree with the delegates that Parliament should order a return of cases in which Railway employes are worked for more than fifteen hours a day. The men are not children, it is true, and need not obey unless they please; but the public are children, and must travel. Besides, the State binds the Railway servants to work well under criminal penalties.

Sir Stafford Northcote, like Mr. Parnell, has invaded Ulster, and on Thursday he explained to the Conservatives of Belfast the reasons they have for distrusting the Liberal Government. They are briefly that this Government is not national, but cosmopolitan in feeling; that in India, in the Colonies, in foreign policy, it is not always thinking of the interests of Great Britain. He gave as illustrations the Ilbert Bill, the conduct of Lord Derby about Australian annexations, and the condition of South Africa. He also adduced the Shaw case, and affirmed that instead of an Englishman being able to say "Civis Romanus sum," the best thing he could do to prevent insult from the foreigner was to deny that he was English. We have said enough of the speech elsewhere, but we must ask here the cause of this singular sterility of Tory speakers. Sir Stafford Northcote is in many ways the ablest man of his party,—certainly the most adroit,—yet even he is reduced to these stale complaints, which interest nobody, and scarcely influence a vote. Why does not Sir Stafford Northcote tell us distinctly what he would do with the Ilbert Bill, whether he would annex Polynesia, and what has been left undone in regard to Mr. Shaw?

A highly alarmist telegram from Hong Kong, forwarded by the China correspondent of the New York Herald, was published in London on Thursday. The writer, who dates his message October 3rd, declares that the people of Canton are highly excited over the Logan trial—Logan had fired into a mob without sufficient reason, had killed a child, and had been sentenced to seven years' imprisonment—and are threatening foreigners, especially the French, in incendiary placards. "The mob is ripe for rebellion," and the Chinese Viceroy has been compelled to guard his own palace with troops. Mandarins of the highest rank are insulted in passing through the city. The foreign settlement is guarded by six gunboats, but the uneasiness extends beyond Canton, and even in Hong Kong the arms of the Volunteers have been piled in two Banks, to prevent their seizure. The facts are certainly disquieting; but on the other hand, it must be remembered that the Chinese Government is in earnest in repression. Its whole policy and position depend at this moment upon its power to prevent any outbreak which would revive the solidarity of the Powers, and compel all European States to join in exacting reparation. Whether Pekin has the strength to enforce quiet when the mob is excited, may be questioned; but Chinese officials in earnest are rarely beaten by their own people. They have the control, too, just now of a good steam fleet, and large accumulations of regulars near Shanghai. The Government, however, moves slowly, and Europe may yet be startled by a popular attempt at massacre.

The Rev. J. Wordsworth, speaking on Thursday in the Church Congress of the wide division now opening between the Church and the Universities, complains that wealthy mothers now fail to teach their children the elementary truths of religion. "A Bible class for mothers of the wealthier class would be about the best expenditure of time possible to a parochial clergyman." That, as it is put, sounds whimsical, or even nonsensical, but there is a gleam of truth in it. While female education is improving rapidly, and "girl graduates" are becoming wranglers, the means for teaching "divinity," in its large sense, to women are not expanding. The subject is not so carefully taught to girls as it is to boys, and is very much less compulsory. Everything effective in the educational machinery for women is modern, and the modern tone is to leave theology for home reading. The mere fact that while at least half the higher teachers of men are clergymen, no female teacher can have gone through that training, makes a decided difference, as does also the declining influence of the Clergy over women. The highly-educated woman of to-day cannot absorb a sermon or a lecture without mental criticism, sometimes very destructive.

THE HOOTING OF KING ALFONSO.

THE hooting of the King of Spain in Paris is not merely a regrettable incident. It is a calamitous occurrence. It brings war perceptibly nearer, and it destroys, as no event since 1870 has destroyed, the confidence of Europe in France. There is not a German alive, and especially not a German soldier, who will not see in it startling evidence of French implacability. The King of Spain had done absolutely nothing to affront, or injure, or humiliate France, in any way whatever. On the contrary, in accepting the offer of a State reception in Paris he had, according to the European code of etiquette, paid France a considerable, though of course merely formal, honour. He had, however, sought the friendship of Germany, he was accused of seeking alliance with her, and he had accepted from her Emperor a customary titular honour, the colonelcy of a regiment, accepted also by the Prince of Wales; and so deep is the enmity felt for Germany in Paris that this sufficed to overpower every consideration of international courtesy, of State policy, and of municipal self-respect, and make Parisians express for a guest not merely anger, but contempt. It is nonsense to say the hatred was felt only by the roughs. The Army of the Revolution, swarming out in tens of thousands, gave the hisses; but some of the first journals of Paris had held up the King to obloquy as a soldier of Germany, and had counselled an unmistakable silence and avoidance. The hooting was only the mob translation of that advice, and in every German mind the conviction will sink deep that, as far as Paris is concerned—and Paris, though not France, represents her—peace will only last while France is unable to make war. We say nothing of the insult to the German Emperor, for he has passed into that period of stately old age when the judgment survives emotion; but every German will feel bitterly that the decorations his Sovereign bestows are in Paris felt to be disgraces, deserving hissing. That is not a conviction which even in the steady Teutonic mind tends to placability or to moderation in the expression of dislike. The English, with their history behind them, are not sensitive; but suppose Queen Victoria had been the Sovereign hissed! And if the Germans feel this, what must the Spaniards feel, with their almost morbid pride in the grandeur of their nationality, their undying recollections of the day when an insult to their Sovereign would have lit up war through the world?

Even the effect of the incident in Germany and Spain grows small, however, before its effect in Europe. It has revealed in a moment the ominous truth that the Parisians, who are the bodyguard of the Republic, have been dwelling on their defeat, on the lowered position of France in the world, on her mortifications, real and unreal, until they have reached the point of self-absorption, when the mind grows unsound, when self is the sole pivot, and men see conspiracies in the natural movements of the crowds around them. Such morbid irritability in individuals always precedes either an outbreak or an illness, and in the case of a nation it is as ominous of evil. For months past, it has been most difficult for men who, like ourselves, are friends of France, and cannot bear to see her bright genius obscured by her self-will, to defend or explain her action. There has been in it a note of savage suspicion, of angry self-assertion, of indulged contempt for all others' rights, which suggested that reasoning power had become impaired. The Government or its agents, backed by the Press, made the occupation of Tunis needlessly offensive to the Italians, till they at last thought their countrymen in Tunis specially marked out for French injustice. The treatment of the Malagasy Envoys in Paris was discreditable, and seemed based upon the old etiquettes of Constantinople. Li Hung Chang, the great Viceroy of Southern China, quitted his station, rather than negotiate any longer with M. Tricou. The ultimatum offered to Queen Ranavalona III. was arrogant to a point seldom reached by a conqueror in his intercourse with the conquered. Even towards England the French Press has been bitter, offensive, and so suspicious, that the only accurate intelligence received from Tonquin, that collected by the London journals, is frequently declared in tones of spiteful contempt to be "English inventions." So marked has been this tone that the quiet friendship of fifty years, which had grown by degrees into a true amity, has decidedly cooled, and English Liberals with whom an entente cordiale with France is a tradition, ask themselves what can be the reason of the new French temper, and listen gladly to stories of Bourbon dislike, and of M. Challemlacour's personal irritability. M. Challemlacour, it is true, did not hiss King Alfonso, but it is difficult not to believe, after that demonstration, that he expresses, in his irritable haughtiness and readiness to be acrid, the present temper of the body of his countrymen, who would be capable of believing, from sheer irritability, that if Queen Victoria went to see her daughter in Berlin, she had gone to arrange the partition of France, and the seizure of that "menacing growth," the French empire in Indo-China. Such a temper not only makes negotiation difficult, by inducing the English people to resent any concession as derogatory, but drives French agents all over the world into acts which might at any moment produce frightful consequences. They respond, half consciously, it may be, to the emotion they see at home. We will not press the deplorable incident at Tamatave, during which there is too much reason to believe that the Captain of a Queen's ship was compelled to clear his decks for action, because we do not believe that Admiral Pierre was responsible; but even in Tonquin the French agents are showing a disposition towards each other, as well as the world, which is in far too close accordance with that of the Parisian populace, a temper which sees in the slightest independence on the part of anybody an affront either to themselves or to France. The spirit which would order King Alfonso to ask M. Grévy's permission before accepting a decoration from the Emperor William is precisely the spirit which treats Chinese claims to Anam, claims centuries old, as impertinent arrogancies, which France will not even discuss, but sets aside as if unworthy of temperate reply.

We write, we need not say, with no intention of embittering the situation. To us, it has always appeared that the French people, with all their faults, are still pioneers in the long search for a happy political society, that the French alliance is the only one worth having, and that the enmity of France is for Britain, next to the enmity of America, the most paralysing and weakening of evils. And it is because of that friendship that we feel dismay at a spectacle like the hooting of King Alfonso. What stable confidence can we repose in a people who, after days for consideration, assemble in huge masses to insult a gentleman who can mass a hundred thousand soldiers on their southern frontier, who might in a war be the most effective of allies, who was their invited guest in their own capital, and who had done nothing to offend them, except talk pleasantly with another gentleman against whom they have a long-standing grudge? What would they themselves think of the temper and mental condition of François, if, after inviting Alphonse to dinner, he had thrown the soup into his face, because, forsooth, he had been seen shaking hands with François's opponent in a great law-suit? Would they not conclude either that François was habitually ill-conditioned, or, if that were impossible, that he was no longer master of himself sufficiently to be safe?

THE CITY COUNCIL DISPUTE.

IT seems to us that the only importance of the commotion in the Guildhall on Saturday last consists in this. The organisation of the Government of the City of London is so radically bad, that it can only be kept from corruption by a rigid adherence to traditional, or rather to constitutional precedent; and precedent has been suddenly and, to all outward appearance, capriciously departed from. There never was so ridiculous a method of electing a Chief Magistrate. The "Livery," that is, the members of the Guilds who nominate the two persons whom they think most fit for the Civic Chair, are called in some journals the "electors" and the "popular vote;" but they are not a popular body, nor do they elect. The Liverymen of London are not the citizens, nor the householders, nor the electors who send up Representatives to Parliament, but the members of the ninety or so Guilds, who do not number a sixth of the Parliamentary electors, or a twentieth of those to whom the City is an office or a counting-house. They are as much an oligarchy as the electors of any ancient Free Town in Germany, and for Liberals to defend them as the "representatives of the people" is perfectly absurd. Even this small body, moreover, does not elect the Lord Mayor. It thinks it does, but it does not. Its habit for a century or more has been to nominate the senior Alderman on the rota, and some other Alderman, and to expect the Court of Aldermen to recognise the first. That is to say, a self-elected body shouts its approval of a man who is prescriptively selected by seniority. So strong is this habit, and so unbroken the tradition, that a departure from it has excited the whole Livery to rage; but the thing they are defending is prescription, not liberty of election, which, on their own showing, does not exist, they holding themselves bound, as they allow, to elect a man designated to them by long-standing custom. They are, of course, quite right, from their point of view. They feel by instinct that if prescription is disregarded, they will speedily be disregarded too, and hoot down Alderman Fowler, not only because they like Alderman Hadley better, but because, if Alderman Hadley is not accepted, their own raison d'être is as good as gone. An absurd institution can go on while it is really only a cover for an ancient custom which is seen to work enduringly, but the moment the cover is stripped away the institution is seen to be a cumbrous nuisance. The present method of electing the London Corporation has gone on untouched because, under cumbrous or deceptive forms, an ancient scheme of electing rulers by co-optation and seniority has actually prevailed, and has worked, as that system usually does, quite enduringly; but if seniority is abandoned, the system must be abandoned also. Nobody intends deliberately to allow either Aldermen or Liverymen to elect any Lord Mayor they like, and if either of them will avail themselves of their legal right to do it they must make way for electors who, whether better or worse, can at all events claim a more logical position. Customary right is held good in England, and so is representative right; but nobody will bear a system under which representation does not exist, and custom is only acknowledged in order to be broken. Caprices can be permitted to the body of citizens in a city which cannot be permitted to a little Committee elected by a small section of persons, with no rights except such as they derive from a prescription now openly contemned. As long as the Liverymen nominated the senior Alderman, and the Aldermen recognised their vote as binding, men desirous of City status became Aldermen, and in rotation Lord Mayors, and the huge machine was driven by their energy; but if that scheme is set aside, and a Lord Mayor is to be selected by the Court or elected by the Livery, it becomes indispensable to make the election rational. This can only be done by abolishing both Aldermen and Livery, and confiding the election either to all ratepayers, or to a Council which all ratepayers actually help to elect.

The incident is a very strong argument in favour of Sir W. Harcourt's proposal; but we do not wish to be betrayed into a premature discussion of a measure as yet legally unborn. What strikes us rather, as we read the accounts of the grotesque scene, is the singular indifference of the citizens of English towns as to their own control over their Municipal Kings. They do not anywhere directly elect the Mayors, as is done all over America; and they do not interfere in their election by the Councillors with anything like passion or decision. The Councils, in fact, are expected to choose only Councillors. There are often fierce fights for the Wards, and sometimes there is very bitter party feeling; but the character of the Municipal King, at a municipal election, seldom becomes a party cry. Nobody, while voting for Smith as Councillor, does it in order that Brown may be Mayor, and nobody particularly cares whether Jones is Mayor or not. There is plenty of municipal feeling, much municipal bitterness, and some municipal aspiration; but as to municipal headship, there is scarcely any feeling, so little, that the system of double election under which Mayors are appointed is never so much as challenged. The ratepayers elect the Council, often after bitter fighting, and then instead of wishing them to elect the best chiefs for the Municipality, they leave them alone, and are only discontented if they give themselves too free a choice. If they stick preferentially to Aldermen, who are only Councillors supposed to be unusually solid, the Plebs, which has been so fierce about the Councillors themselves, is quite content. We shall be told that the Mayors have small powers and the electors do not care about them, but the statement is not true in this relation. A Mayor has much more power than any Councillor, and about each Councillor the ratepayers do care. They fight over him with animation, and sometimes spend money over him with liberality. The election of Brown for the Fifth Ward, and the consequent rejection of Jones, will sometimes convulse a city. We believe the true explanation to be a different and an exceedingly suggestive one. Among English-speaking men, the system of double elections, which looks so plausible and has so many arguments in its favour, almost invariably breaks down. If the primary electors are in earnest, they turn the secondary electors into delegates, as Americans, when choosing their President, turn their Electoral College. If, on the other hand, they are not exceedingly interested, they leave the secondary electors to act within certain limits of decorum almost as freely as if they had no responsibilities, and political or municipal life is deprived of what might be an absorbing interest. That is not our present political system, the Head of her Majesty's Government being virtually though informally named by the people; and we very much doubt whether, one object of municipal elections being municipal vivification, it is the best system. Suppose, now that new Municipalities are so frequently conceded to new districts, we were to try the experiment of allowing the Mayors in some of them to be directly elected?

THE BIRMINGHAM DEMONSTRATION.

THE great Conservative demonstration in the Aston Lower Grounds last Monday was evidently planned by a skilful hand. Nothing had been overlooked that could ensure for the proceedings the double charm of popular attractiveness and dramatic effect. The choice of Birmingham, the Holy Place of Radicalism, as the scene of operations was in every sense a happy inspiration, giving to the whole enterprise a spice of adventure, and supplying both speakers and hearers with the most powerful stimulus to an imposing exhibition of aggressive zeal. To suit all tastes, the services of Lord Cranbrook, the loudest, and Mr. Plunket, the most polished of Conservative orators, had been secured. For those who could not find room in the large hall, and were thus excluded from the main entertainment of the evening, attractions of hardly inferior interest were provided outside. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett and Mr. Raikes spoke to resolutions in the Skating Rink, Mr. Grantham and Sir Richard Temple might be heard "on the dancing platform in the wood," and "Dr. Sebastian Evans presided at the meeting on the meadow." It would be unfair to apply to speeches delivered under such conditions any very lofty or exacting standard of criticism. The object of a demonstration of this kind is not to convince doubting or to convert hostile judgments. The purpose of its promoters is accomplished, if they can succeed, by the contagious enthusiasm of numbers, and by a liberal supply of confident and highly-seasoned rhetoric, in inflaming the zeal of the faithful and striking terror into the enemy. It was no part, therefore, of the mission of Lord Cranbrook and Mr. Plunket to argue out the rationale of Conservatism, or to elaborate a scheme of constructive statesmanship. What they were intended to do was to make a telling onslaught upon the Government, to cause the ears of faithful Birmingham to tingle by a scathing catalogue of Mr. Gladstone's faults and follies, and to inspire their own followers by demonstrating the weakness of his position and the certainty of his impending fall. This is the duty which was laid upon them, and the merits of their performance must be judged by the degree in which it has tended to increase the confidence of the attack, and to dishearten and confuse the defence, in the coming political campaign.

Lord Cranbrook, as is his wont, indulged in a good deal of strong language, but he has rarely made a less effective speech. Confined by the exigencies of the occasion to the work of denunciation, and anxious, if possible, to find something to say which had not been said a hundred times before, he strove with obvious sincerity to bring to light some hitherto unnoticed crime of our much-vituperated Government. Great, indeed, would be the reward of the lucky discoverer to whom this coveted secret was disclosed. Lord Cranbrook, however, is clearly not the orator for whom fortune has reserved the prize. Like all the official Conservatives, he is afraid to challenge boldly that part of the Ministerial policy which best deserves and is least able to withstand the attacks of a hostile critic. Our position in Egypt, with its manifold anomalies and dangers, its inadequate reward for past sacrifices, its imperfect security for the future, offers, one would say, as tempting a theme as a partisan speaker could desire for sarcasm and invective. Upon no point are the habitual followers of the Government so divided in opinion; upon none do its most loyal supporters find the task of apology so difficult and distasteful. And yet, as all the recent utterances of the responsible Tory leaders show, at this, the weakest place in their whole line of defence, Ministers have least cause to fear the assault of their professed antagonists. The reason, of course, is obvious enough. There are only two intelligible views of our duty in reference to Egypt: the view of those who hold that we ought never to have gone there, and the view of those who hold that both our own interests, and the special responsibilities which we have incurred, impose on us the obligations of a tutelary power. Lord Beaconsfield's colleagues are precluded from both views alike. They cannot adopt the first, because it would commit them to the Radical doctrine of non-intervention. They cannot adopt the second, because five years ago, when they had the choice, they deliberately preferred Cyprus to Egypt; and because within the last few months they have, through the mouth of Sir Stafford Northcote, formally repudiated the scheme of a Protectorate. And thus the only use which Lord Cranbrook, one of the most skilful rhetoricians of his party, can make of the Egyptian Expedition is to drag it in as a crowning illustration of his wonderful thesis,—that “this peace-loving, war-hating Government is unequalled for blood-guiltiness.” The passion for universal bloodshed which Lord Cranbrook has detected in Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues—“against their conscience in all parts they have been guilty of bloodshed”—is, indeed, the one novel topic in his long and vehement harangue. In all other respects his speech is but a canevas of Tory platitudes writ large. He is as zealous as any Radical for purity of election; but why pass a Corrupt Practices Act full of “traps for honest men?” He has nothing to say against the Agricultural Holdings’ Act; but it was “a measure not special to the Government.” He burns with ingenuous indignation at the charge of “veiled obstruction.” And then we have the familiar gibes at the Kilmainham Treaty and the Transvaal Convention, the threadbare compassion for Mr. Foster, the inevitable denunciations of Mr. Chamberlain, and, finally, the lurid picture, which we all know so well by this time, of the Radical Millennium, when spoliation and sacrilege will have done their perfect work, and England will possess neither a House of Lords nor an Established Church. The zest and energy with which a man of Lord Cranbrook’s abilities can pace the weary rounds of this rhetorical treadmill form a striking tribute to the vitality of our party system, and his antagonists may well be content that he can find no more productive occupation for his powers.

It is no disrespect to Mr. Plunket to say that he is less fitted than Lord Cranbrook for the kind of work which had to be done at Birmingham. Of all living speakers, he is the one who would have found himself most at home in the House of Commons under Canning’s leadership, and his finished style cannot easily compass the broad and staring effects which are the life of platform oratory. Mr. Plunket, however, did his best to reach the level of the occasion. He naturally addressed himself to the Irish policy of the Government, and being not only a Conservative, but an Irishman who knows Ireland, he was of course careful to avoid Lord Cranbrook’s blunder, and to say nothing of the wickedness of the Land Act. At a critical moment in the fortunes of Ulster Conservatism, it shows, to say the least, a want of tact for a Tory leader to describe the legislation which secured the tenants in their property as a piece of robbery; and Mr. Plunket’s significant omission of all reference to the topic was unquestionably discreet. Keeping clear of this dangerous ground, he applied himself to the safer task of conjuring up an imaginary confederacy between Mr. Parnell and the Liberal party, and predicting its disastrous results to the country and the Empire. This is an old story, and the present seems hardly the most favourable moment for its revival. For months past Mr. Parnell’s henchmen have been ransacking their copious vocabulary of abuse for terms sufficiently strong to express their hostility to the “most brutal and despotic Government” that ever trampled on prostrate Ireland, and their detestation of the perfidy with which the Liberals have betrayed the fair professions of 1880. In almost every critical division of the last Session the Nationalist Members have been found in the Opposition lobby. Even those English politicians who have always been favourable to an alliance between the Parnellites and the Liberals admit that the events of the last three years have made reconciliation impossible. But so invaluable a stalking-horse cannot be lightly abandoned. Mr. Plunket is certain that if the Radicals and Home-rulers are not allied, they ought to be. Neither of them caring much about the “ancient grandeur and future greatness” of the Empire, both of them “desiring revolution in the direction of democracy,” it is inevitable that sooner or later the English Radical must join hands with the Irish rebel. Has not Dr. Pankhurst, who professes himself before all things a follower of Mr. Gladstone, taken the Home-rule pledge? Surely a speaker of Mr. Plunket’s powers might have found better nutriment for the Birmingham Conservatives than these vain imaginations. The chasm between the Home-rulers and the Liberal Party was never wider than it is now. That is one among the many instructive lessons taught by the Manchester election. The sympathy of English Liberals, so far as it ever had any existence, has had to succumb to an invincible moral repugnance; while the services of Mr. Gladstone to Ireland, the grievances he has removed, the new order and security which he has given to her great national industry, are all forgotten by the Nationalists, in their embittered hatred of the author of the Coercion Act.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE AT BELFAST.

WHAT is the object with which Sir Stafford Northcote has gone to Ulster? Some people imagined that he was going to seize the opportunity to give an official exposition of the new Irish policy of the Tory party. Others supposed that he was charged with the more common-place mission of encouraging and stimulating the resistance of the Ulster Conservatives to the Nationalist invasion. Careful perusal of the two long speeches which he delivered in Belfast on Wednesday and Thursday compels the abandonment of both these hypotheses. For all that Sir Stafford Northcote has to say on the subject, his Ulster audiences might well believe that the Tory party have not got an Irish policy at all. His references to Ireland and Irish affairs have been of the scantiest and most superficial kind; on the great scheme hatched by Lord Cairns and Mr. Smith for the creation of a peasant-proprietary he has not uttered a syllable, and almost the solitary piece of practical advice that he has given to the Irish Conservatives as such, is his very unnecessary recommendation that they should be on their guard against an indiscriminate lowering of the franchise. The notion that it was Sir Stafford Northcote’s object to inflame the already excited passions of the Ulster Orangemen is still less admissible. It would seem rather as though he had charged himself with the duty of administering a gentle sedative. Even while he protests against the “audacity of certain persons who have assumed to themselves the honourable title of the National Party,” he admits, with his usual candour, that these same persons “are pleading in a cause which they can advance by arguments of the most specious, and sometimes of the most tempting character.” This is by no means in “Ercles’ vein.” Nor can it be very inspiring to the bulk of the Ulster Protestants to know that Sir Stafford “does not fear” to name and praise their famous Orange Society, and “does not for a moment believe that the Conservative cause has not a great future before it.” Even in his highest rhetorical flights, Sir Stafford Northcote never omits to insert the qualifications and limitations which the sober judgment of a perfectly dispassionate spectator would demand, as, for instance, in the following characteristic outburst:—“Put your trust in your own selves and in your own determination to see right done, and depend upon it, if you are firm, if you are determined, I believe if you work hard, those whom you would put your trust in, if you leave it to them, will come to you and rally round you in large numbers.” This is not the dialect in which men speak who are capable of moving great masses of their fellows, and yet it is the dialect into which Sir Stafford Northcote inevitably lapses, when he leaves the level track which his oratory habitually pursues, and ventures into the region of exhortation and invective. We may depend upon it that it was not the kind of thing which the Orangemen went out to hear.

Having apparently nothing to say that is specially appropriate either to Ireland or to Ulster, Sir S. Northcote has reverted to an old theme of Lord Beaconsfield’s, and he devoted the greater part of his speech on Thursday night to a vindication of the claim of the Conservatives to be considered the National party. He distinguishes between the “national” policy which aims at the “maintenance of our large Imperial dominion,” and which requires that we should not only be strong, but make our strength known to all the world, and be ready when necessary to use it, and what he calls the “vague, grandiose, and unintelligible” ideas of the Cosmopolitans or Liberals. That there is a distinction, such as is hinted at in Lord Beaconsfield’s question-begging epithets, between the policies of the two great Parties, no one who has followed the course of affairs during the last six years would think of denying. Within that period, moreover, the two sets of principles have been put in practice, in each case with fairly strict fidelity, by two successive Governments, and the “Cosmopolitans” have every inducement to challenge a comparison. What does Sir S. Northcote mean by his astonishing statement “that now, the safest thing an English citizen who gets into difficulties or into a dangerous position could do would be to conceal the fact that he is an Englishman; he is then less likely to be insulted"? With the single exception of Mr. Shaw, whose harsh treatment Sir Stafford himself attributes exclusively to the "unfortunate illness" of Admiral Pierre, and to whom reparation will certainly be offered, can he produce one instance of an Englishman who has been insulted with impunity, or who has found it convenient to hide his nationality? We assert with the utmost confidence that the name of England stands as high, that her position and influence among the nations are as strong, and that her protection is as complete a shield to the meanest of her subjects, as in the heyday of Lord Palmerston's mischievous activity, or at the moment when Lord Beaconsfield brought "peace with honour" from Berlin. The real strength of England, and the knowledge of other nations that she has it and will put it forth when necessity requires, remain unaffected by the vicissitudes of party warfare and changes of policy. It was one of the cardinal mistakes of Lord Beaconsfield, which seems to be shared by many of his followers, that neither we ourselves nor other people will ever realise how great and powerful we are, unless we are perpetually proclaiming the fact in all men's hearing. The "Civis Romanus sum" formula, of which Lord Palmerston was so fond, and which meant in the mouth of a Roman, as Mr. Gladstone pointed out in the Don-Pacifico debate, "I am a citizen of the State of which you are a dependant," was an expression of insolent superiority, rather than of quiet and assured strength. The real difference between the spurious "Nationalism" which found its most typical embodiment in Lord Beaconsfield's Administration and the rival policy of his successors, arises out of their different views not of the expediency of maintaining the English Empire, but of the purposes for which that Empire exists. If its own existence is its final cause, and if, as we are often told, it has no concern with international justice or the strivings of other peoples after freedom, except in so far as these may subserve its own interests and procure it useful allies, then the "cosmopolitan" policy may be well described in Sir S. Northcote's sneer as "vague and grandiose." Liberals, however, or at least those who belong to Mr. Gladstone's school, have quite another conception of the meaning and purpose of the Empire. To them, it can only be justified so long as it can be shown to secure the conditions not only of order, but of free development for all who are under its sway, and so long as it recognises and discharges towards other nations, both strong and weak, the moral responsibilities which are inseparable from power. Sir Stafford Northcote would probably repudiate our way of contrasting the two policies as strongly as we do his own. But if the "Nationalism" of the Conservatives means something wider and nobler than we understand by it, they must cut loose the traditions which bind them to Lord Beaconsfield, and disown some of their ablest supporters in the Press. And before they will persuade the world that the "Cosmopolitanism" of the Liberals is destructive of the sense of national honour, they must produce some more substantial proof than Sir Stafford Northcote's reckless assertions at Belfast.

INDIVIDUALISM IN POLITICS.

IN spite of Pascal and all the haters of the Jesuits in the Roman Church, in spite of all the denouncers of casuistry among Protestants, in spite of all the well-intentioned ignoramuses who say that right and wrong are plain, straightforward matters, about which there can never be any mistake, provided only that a man is honest, there is nothing of which the interest is more perennial than the conflict of duties. What a man is to do when he is drawn different ways by considerations that seem of equal weight, or, more often perhaps, cannot be expressed in the same denomination, and yet are equally real, is a theme which never seems to grow stale. It is raised in relation to one large department of human life by a writer in the current number of the National Review. "A Retired Politician" moralises on the surrender of principle which he holds to be becoming habitual among public men. He sees it in candidates who say "yes" to questions, when they mean "no;" in Members who call themselves the representatives of opinions they distrust and abhor; in Ministers who, rather than retire from the Cabinet, consent to support measures in the value of which they are all the time absolute unbelievers. "Statesmen in high places, casting about them for majorities in Parliament, set the example; and candidates, casting about them for majorities in the constituencies, follow it. Thus gradually a sort of silent assumption is established that it is not the business of a politician to be independent and upright, much less intractable in his opinions, but rather to be pliant and docile. A man who refuses to be these is considered as impracticable, 'cantankerous,' and insensible to the necessity of daily and hourly compromise." And in this way the degradation of Parliamentary men, and ultimately of Parliamentary institutions, is ensured.

It is not to be denied that there is an element of truth in this accusation. No one can have compared the opinions that politicians express in private with the votes that they often give in public, without seeing this. In the Recess, a man will show himself keenly alive to the faults of some measure that is being talked about as likely to form part of the Ministerial programme for the next year, and yet when the Session comes he will be found voting for it, though the arguments against it have, in his honest opinion, lost none of their weight. The same sort of inconsistency runs up through all ranks of the political hierarchy. The elector votes for a candidate who only half represents him. The Member of Parliament supports a Cabinet whose policy he but half likes. The Minister advocates measures to which, if he were an independent Member, he would offer a hearty opposition. Can such a line of conduct as this be either honestly practised or seriously defended?

Within certain easily conceivable limits, we think it can. No doubt, it is not ideal. Every man who has convictions of his own would like to make them the sole measure of his political action. He would never suppress an enthusiasm or put a dislike into his pocket. He would vote on every question presented to him as though there were nothing to be considered but the character of the particular proposal. But the man who assumes this attitude does not escape as completely as he probably thinks from the conflict of duties of which we have spoken. In fact, he does not escape from it at all. He has, probably without meaning it, turned his back upon political life, and deliberately made himself a cypher in the affairs of the country. It is the old controversy between the world and the Puritan who must needs go out of the world. No doubt, the Puritan carries away with him a perfectly unstained conscience. He has had neither part nor lot in what has been going on around him,—he is not responsible for a single thing that has been done by his contemporaries. But then he has left the world just what he found it. He has not, it is true, abused it, but neither has he used it. If it is really the thing he thinks it—a simple mass of unmixed pitch, which no one can touch without being defiled—no doubt he is right. If, on the contrary, it is a very mixed mass indeed, one in which good and bad are always contending, and contending with varying fortunes, to withdraw from the battle altogether, is to do what in him lies to give the victory to the worse side. This is precisely what has happened in America. Most of the best men in the United States are "retired politicians." They keep apart from public affairs because, they say, they are so completely in the hands of wire-pullers and log-rollers, that honesty has no chance. It may be so; but in that case, how has it become so? In part, certainly—in very great part, we should be inclined to say—because honest men left political life prematurely. Indolence made them political Puritans. They saw the way in which things were tending, and it was less trouble to assume that they were past redemption, than to labour to keep them in a better groove. No doubt, the writer in the National Review will agree with us in deprecating any repetition of this blunder in England; but if it is to be avoided, there must be some kind of common action among those who take a part in public affairs; and all common action implies the surrender, to some extent, of individual opinions. To say that Party Government is a mistake, and that it necessarily leads to the degradation of Parliamentary institutions, is to become a pure pessimist. Unfortunately, pessimism has always a great deal to say for itself; but when all is said, the fact remains that pessimism never yet did anything to mend what has gone wrong. Party Government has its bad and its good side, and in proportion as honest men refuse to have anything to do with it, the bad side comes uppermost. The object of politicians, whether active or retired, should be to do all they can to check this degradation; and they will do nothing towards compassing this end by declaring that they will not concern themselves with public affairs, unless they can mould them exactly to their own pleasure. If they will give nothing and take everything, they will very shortly find that there is nothing left for them to take.

We are very far from saying that this is at all the direction in which things seem to be setting. The action of some of the Manchester Liberals during the recent election has been a disastrous instance to the contrary. With them, it was all give and no take. Dr. Pankhurst did not modify his views in the least degree to meet theirs, and they accepted him just as readily as though he had come something more than half-way to meet them. But if the doctrine preached by "A Retired Politician" becomes at all widely accepted, the world of public life will be more and more divided into those who give everything and those who give nothing; and whenever this happens, we shall be well on the road to be even as the Americans. No doubt, the danger that public men will be tempted to give everything is a real one, and one that is not likely to become less as years go on. But the only way in which it can be averted is the way in which it has been averted hitherto,—by a clear recognition on the part of the men who are not prepared to give everything that they must give something. Let us take, for example, the case mentioned by "A Retired Politician":—"I once," he says, "heard a colleague of Lord Hartington narrate how the latter said to him, 'I have been reading over my own speech against the extension of the County Franchise, and I confess I find it unanswerable.' I have little doubt he finds it unanswerable still; but he is a prominent Member of a Cabinet that is at this moment preparing a Bill for the Extension of the County Franchise." That is to say, "A Retired Politician" would have Lord Hartington leave a Cabinet with which he is otherwise agreed, because he differs from his colleagues on what, after all, is a question of machinery. It cannot be said that there is any principle involved in the issue whether household suffrage shall be extended to counties. There may have been one in the issue whether household franchise should be introduced at all, but when once that had been settled, its extension from town to country became only a matter of convenience and expediency. It is quite possible that Lord Hartington may still be of opinion that the balance of argument is against its extension at the present time. But if circumstances have made that extension inevitable, where would be the gain of his leaving the Cabinet rather than consent to it? If any principle were involved, it would be altogether different. If the thing it is proposed to do were something that, in Lord Hartington's opinion, it will always be wrong to do—not imprudent merely, or premature, but wrong—it would be his plain duty to leave the Cabinet, rather than have a hand in it. A practical politician cannot put down his foot too firmly where principles are concerned, but if he is to continue to deserve the title of practical, he must not jump to the conclusion that in everything wherein he differs from those with whom he is associated, principles are concerned.

THE RED MAN IN CANADA.

ACCORDING to a recent telegram from Montreal, one of the ceremonies that will take place before the Marquis of Lorne leaves Canada will be his installation as Grand Chief of the Lorette Indians, a sept of the Huron nation. The title to be conferred on him—perhaps the installation has taken place by this time—is "Kondearonte," or, in plain English, "The Rat." In spite of appearances, this is reckoned a dignified designation, and well it may be, when we find "Lean Man," "Strike-him-on-the-Back," "The Gambler," "Little Black Bear," and "The Man-that-took-the-Coat," among the "styles" of Indian Chiefs in Canada. The Marquis of Lorne has since his tour of the Dominion been a special favourite with the Red Man. No representative of the "Great-Mother-over-the-Water," not even Lord Dufferin himself, has come near him. It is a great and doubtless a historical honour that the Lorette Indians intend to confer upon their friend. It recalls memories of Tecumseh and "accursed Brandt," and the great duel between the kindred tribes of the Hurons and the Iroquois, and that wonderful Confederation which, if it had held together, might have defied the White Man, or at least secured better terms for the Red, and which the framers both of the Union and of the Dominion took as one of their models. Possibly enough, it is proposed to select Lord Lorne as successor to the last of the original Huron Chiefs, who died at Lorette, near Quebec, some years ago; although, in the absence of clear and full information, it would be unsafe to risk conjecture on this point. But the ceremony may prove symbolical in another than a historical sense. It may be presumed that the Hurons of Lorette, a tribe now less than 300 in number, will play a prominent, if not the leading, part in it. Having their village and reserve, bearing the matter of fact title of Quarante Arpents, not far from Quebec, they live close to British civilisation, and may be supposed to be immediately affected by it. They are attached to their missionaries. Their school has had the services of better men than can generally be secured to teach Indians the rudiments of Christian civilisation, and it is in consequence well attended. Yet is it the case that the Hurons of Lorette are fading away before civilisation, like the humourist of fiction who declared with his last breath that he died of "being governed over-much?" The very reverse would seem to be the case. In the latest Report of the Indian Department of the Dominion, dated December 31st, 1882—these annual Reports, by the way, receive far too little attention from our publicists, and even from our ethnologists—we are told that, "these Indians are, for the most part, as well to do as the surrounding white settlers. Some of them would be considered wealthy in a farming community." For some years back, a gradual revolution has been taking place in the relations between the Red Man and his master in Canada. The enlightened, tender, and Christian policy which the Canadian authorities have been pursuing, perhaps without knowing its inner meaning, is such as would have gratified William Penn, or that profounder Puritan, and in many respects abler man, Roger Williams. Does it savour too much of imaginative or sentimental optimism, to express a hope that the honour that is about to be if it has not already been done the Marquis of Lorne by the Indians, will mean the ratification of that policy by the Red Man's heart, as well as by the White Man's conscience?

It was Colonel Mallory, if we remember aright, who dealt, not certainly the first, but the first decisive blow, a few years ago, to the belief or superstition, all but universally held for more than a quarter of a century, that the North-American Indian is certain to die off before the advance of his White conqueror. He showed that the Red Men are probably at least as numerous as they were when Columbus rediscovered America. This doctrine receives decided support from the Report of the American Bureau of Ethnology, which, with various valuable papers as appendices, was lately published at Washington by its Director, Professor Powell. There is no mistaking the meaning of Professor Powell's words. "The Indians of the continent," he says, "have not greatly diminished in numbers, and the tribes longest in contact with civilisation are increasing. The whole body of Indians is making rapid strides towards a higher culture, notwithstanding the petty conflicts yet occurring where the relations of the Indian tribes to our civilisation have not yet been adjusted by the adoption on their part of the first conditions of a higher life." There has never yet been made a complete and thoroughly reliable census of the Indians in the Union; and it has, perhaps, been too hastily taken for granted that even there they are on the decrease. It would be no wonder, however, if they were. The Red Man has been more kindly treated and in every way better managed by the Canadian than by the United States authorities. The Minnesota massacre, the destruction of "Ouster's command" in 1877, and the removal of Sitting Bull and his band into Dominion territory, are evidences of this which are easily recalled to memory. But the United States policy towards the Indians is certain to tend towards justice and tenderness. But as Professor Powell shows, even if there is a decrease in the number of Indians in the United States, there is no reason why this decrease should continue, or why it should not be turned into an increase. They have but to be brought under civilising influences—civilising influences of the Christian, not of the scientifically pagan, or Survival-of-the-Fittest character—to take kindly to them and to flourish under them. The Reports of the Indian Department in Canada, and especially the last Report, already quoted from, supply what we may fairly reckon proof positive of this. The Red Men actually reported on in the Canadian Confederation have increased from 102,000, accounted for in the census of 1870-71, to 110,000 last year. It is true that this increase may be partially explained by emigration from the United States into Canada. But the individual reports of the Indian Agents to the Ottawa Bureau show conclusively that, under ordinarily good circumstances, the annual births in an Indian village outnumber the deaths. Where the deaths are the majority, they are due to preventible causes. Many Indian tribes are decimated by consumption, and consumption is in turn traced to the adulterated liquor which still finds its way (chiefly across the frontier of the United States) into their midst. The Report of the Indian Department abounds with the complaints from the Agents of the way in which the Indian Liquor Laws are still evaded; and it may be mentioned as a significant circumstance that Chinamen should be taking a prominent place among the illegal traffickers in alcoholics, and that Chinese brandy should in some quarters be ousting rum and whiskey. But the Liquor Laws are being every year more strictly enforced; and the excellent mounted police in the Manitoba and the North-west Superintendencies may be expected in time to crush out what remains of this wretched traffic. Education—there seem to be between two and three thousand children in receipt of an elementary education—is doing its work. Temperance societies are spreading. Chiefs are showing the example of abstinence or moderation. "He wishes to inform me," writes an Indian Agent of the Chief of the primitive Nickickesemenican Band, "that although traders are dealing out whiskey to half-breeds and others across the river at Fort Francis, yet not an Indian, to his knowledge, has drunk any of it." The quaintly cruel and superstitious observances of the Red Men in Canada—how quaint and how cruel these are, a correspondent of the Spectator recently showed—the disgusting "medicine feasts" and "potlaches," leading to drunkenness and death, are steadily, if slowly, declining. "It is satisfactory to learn that even among the degraded Indians, although the elder object to giving up the 'potlache' feasts, the younger appear to favour the proposed abolishment" (is "abolishment" Canadian English?) "of these worse than useless heathenish ceremonies." The conversion of the decrease of the Red population of America into an increase is simply a question of patience, legislation, and science; thus, while a small-pox epidemic carried off numbers of Indians in the States last year, it spared their brethren in Canada.

It used to be contended that time, and what Mr. Gladstone styles "the social forces," were against the Red Man. He is essentially a nomad, we were told. He must live by fishing and hunting; and the filling-up of North America by the Anglo-Saxon must take his happy hunting-grounds from him; and then he must die. This, too, is a delusion. Sir John Macdonald's Report proves that, especially in Manitoba and the North-West Provinces, "important progress has been made during the past year in the advancement of the Indians of the Plains who have settled upon the Reserves in the arts of civilisation;" and "the remarkable success which has almost universally throughout the Territories attended the labour of the Indians during the past season in cultivating their lands will, it is hoped, encourage them to renewed energy in the future." Big Bear, the last of the important Indian Chiefs of the nomadic type in the more fertile Territories, entered last year into treaty relations with the Government of Canada, and settled down to agriculture. Poundmaker, once a troublesome chief, has become so keen a cultivator of his soil that "when his reserve was visited during the past summer by the Inspector, he found Poundmaker so intent upon his work that he would hardly spare the time to speak to him." Here is a common experience:—"The chief is very glad to contrast the improved conditions of his tribe now with their wretched state of existence in his younger days, when only the precarious products of the lakes, rivers, and forests were available for food and clothing. He beholds with pleasure the advent of better days dawning upon them, when all the comforts and luxuries surrounding their white brethren will be within their reach." The Red Man, well watched and cared for, makes an excellent navvy, as docile as he is industrious. More than once we find Indian Agents commenting on his superiority as a workman to the Chinaman. There is no reason why the Red Man should not be a valuable element in that marvellous "blend" of races which Mr. Spencer looks forward to as likely to be ultimately dominant in America, and through America, in the world. In 1877, Lord Dufferin, in a strain of Sheridanian eloquence, bore eloquent testimony to the value of the Métis in Manitoba, who are the result of an admixture of Indians with the original French Coueurs de Bois. "They have," he said, "been the ambassadors between the East and the West, the interpreters of civilisation and its exigencies to the dwellers on the prairie, as well as the exponents to the White Men of the consideration justly due to the susceptibilities, the sensitive self-respect, the prejudices, the innate craving for justice of the Indian race." In any case, there ought to be an interesting and increasingly prosperous career before the Red Man in North America, whether he maintains a position of isolation, or becomes an agent in the evolution of "the crowning race of them that, eye to eye, shall look on knowledge."

PROFESSOR FLOWER AT READING.

THE Church Congress, assembled this year at Reading, is showing courage. Its conduct in officially requesting Professor Flower to state at length the place held by the doctrine of Evolution in philosophy marks a distinct advance towards a great end, a resolute determination to face the ultimate difficulties of religious thought, and not to remain content with discussion on the mere surface of things. We can remember when a Church Congress would no more have discussed Evolution, than it would have permitted an argument on the morality of murder; and when, consequently, if ever the speakers approached fundamental questions, they left an impression either of unreality or of talking beside the point. The change from this attitude to one in which Professor Flower is invited to state frankly the conclusions of science is very notable, and will make discussion in such Congresses at once more manly and more convincing. The laity will no longer be able to say, as they say now, that the theologians are always fighting dead foes, and that they shrink from the encounter with the living one—Paganism, armoured in intellectual certainties—with a feeble avoidance which suggests their certainty of defeat.

While, however, we welcome the innovation, we are not quite satisfied with Professor Flower's statement of the theological trouble he is endeavouring to allay. In language which occasionally, as in a fine passage on embryology, was of an exquisite lucidity, he stated the scientific opinion that Evolution was a certainty, that man was evolved like other animals, and that "special creation" of known forms could not be admitted; and asked why this conclusion should be called irreligious, even if, as a consequence, man did descend from the ape? Science did not deny to men the possession of an anima, a non-material or spiritual something wanting to all other sentient creatures, nor could theologians deny that man in the embryo stage showed animal characteristics. "If, therefore, the most godlike of men have passed through the stages which physiologists recognise in human development without prejudice to the noblest, highest, most divine part of their nature, why should not the race of mankind as a whole have had a similar origin, followed by similar progress and development, equally without prejudice to its present condition and future destiny? Can it be of real consequence at the present time, either to our faith or our practice, whether the first man had such an extremely lowly beginning as the dust of the earth, in the literal sense of the words, or whether he was formed through the intervention of various progressive stages of animal life?" That is, of course, a splendid argument for the Theist, who desires to retain his belief in God while accepting the conclusions of science, finer, perhaps, even than the other also mentioned by Mr. Flower,—that as the sudden vivification of a torpid atom, without a cause, is an unthinkable proposition, the fact of such vivification, which no one doubts, makes a non-material Final Cause a scientific necessity. But the argument, considered as one intended to instruct a Church Congress, has the misfortune that it does not touch the more pressing trouble of the Christian clergy. It is not enough to tell them that, for all that man yet knows, it is possible for Science to admit a God powerful enough not only to create the original atom, but—a far more wonderful thing—to endow it with the potentiality of developing into St. Paul, Newton, or C. Darwin. They want to know something else,—whether men of science admit that development can by possibility be arrested or interrupted, or must when once begun go on for ever, obedient to its own laws. Their inner fear is not that Evolution may dispose of the possibility of God, which, as the great Catholic divines at once perceived, the doctrine scarcely impugns, but that it may deny the possibility of miracle, which is absolutely essential, if not to Christianity, to Christianity as a historic creed. If Christ did not break the continuity of physical laws, as, for instance, in turning water into wine, or raising Lazarus, or feeding the multitude with food visibly insufficient, the credibility of the historic narrative becomes too shadowy to support a creed; while, if Christ did not rise from the dead, there is no Christianity at all. The lofty Faith becomes a collection of moral precepts, uttered by a Teacher who said he had risen, when he had not. It is for belief in Miracle, not for belief in God, that the Clergy quake. This, and not any particular reverence for the literal interpretation of Genesis, is the feeling which makes most clergymen look on Darwin's great hypothesis with suspicion, and induces them almost instinctively to doubt whether any one who insists on the absolute rule of Law can be entirely orthodox. They insist that Will should enter actively into the system of the Universe, and it is therefore the logical consistency of Darwin's theory with the continuous action as well as the original existence of an unconditioned Will that Mr. Flower, after proving his first point, the possibility of reconciling God and Evolution, should, to make the soothing effect of his argument complete, have proceeded to demonstrate. It is not that his argument is imperfect, but that it is incomplete.

For ourselves, we think the Clergy far too timid and too little certain of their own logic. Very few of them doubt that the original atom was created by a sentient Will, and that once granted, miracle becomes mainly a matter of evidence and enquiry. The power of creation once conceded, there is and can be no miracle, not involving a contradiction in terms, which is outside the range of conceivable possibility, not even the standing-still of the Sun, which is supposed to be affirmed in the Old Testament, though it is only quoted there from some well-known record, which may be no more inspired than the poet Menander, who also is quoted as any other author might have been. That this explanation of miracle is in most cases needless, miracle being in most cases only development under some new stimulus, and in all may be the wrong one, does not signify; it is, at all events, a final one. God, if there be a God, can create in water the lacking constituents which would make it wine; and there at once is an end of impossibility, and a safe beginning for the task of rigorous examination as to the mere fact of such an incident having occurred. Theists who accept a Creator and doubt his power of bringing rain in answer to prayer are breaking rules which, if the subject were scientific instead of theological, they would be the first to observe. They are denying to the Creator, whom they admit to exist, the power of creating or moving a cloud, a denial which is, on the hypothesis, almost nonsense. Whether the Creator ever does or will set aside his own physical laws is, of course, a question for evidence, but a priori the affirmative argument would seem to be very strong. Free-will is the first quality of every sentient being, is, in fact, what differentiates him from a passive organism, and to affirm that, yet deny free-will to the highest of all sentient beings, seems to us bad logic, logic made foolish by fear of necessary deductions. We quite understand the irritation of the scientific man with the deductions, because they introduce an element of uncertainty which mars his mathematical scheme of the Universe, and injure his chance of arriving at absolute truth; but why the theologian should be so timid we do not comprehend. He often is, however, and if Professor Flower had added to his argument the considerations which, to many scientific minds, prove that miracle is not impossible, he would have greatly increased the service which his paper, in its exquisite lucidity, has rendered to the Clergy.

DR. BEGG.

AT the good age of seventy-five, and after a short illness, in itself the appropriate close of a life of action, Dr. James Begg has vanished from the sadly-reduced circle of Scotch notabilities of the old school. To English eyes, he is the last of the Dii majorum gentium of the Free Church. Persons acquainted with the inner life of Northern ecclesiasticism tell us that there are still some of the old Disruption heroes left; that such names as Moncrieff and Kennedy and Wilson are still names of power. The Disestablishment movement has brought into prominence younger ecclesiastics than Dr. Begg, men with whom and with whose management of his Church he had no sympathy. The Free Church of to-day, the Free Church which has now reached middle age, suggests, too, not so much Dr. Chalmers and Spiritual Independence, as Professor Robertson Smith and the New Learning. But of the celebrities of 1843, Dr. Begg alone was known outside his own denomination and country as the fellow-worker of Chalmers, Candlish, Cunningham, Buchanan, and Guthrie. Now he is gone, it is difficult to conceive of the Free Church or of Scotland without him. Keen Churchman and controversialist though he was, his energy was far too exuberant to be confined within the limits of ecclesiastical and theological activities. As the champion of temperance and social reform in every shape and form, as the opponent of "Godless" education, as the tribune of the Highlands, as the spokesman of an intense, though narrow, patriotism, Dr. Begg was even better known in Scotland, and still more outside of it than as the veteran of the "Ten Years' Conflict," the Sites "controversy," the Union "controversy," the Instrumental Music "controversy," the Robertson-Smith "controversy," the thousand and one "controversies" which have made up ecclesiastical life beyond the Cheviots for the last half-century, which seem to many outsiders a melancholy series of teapot storms, but which surely cannot have been altogether in vain, since so many strong men have spent their vital force in and for them. From 1865, when, as the acknowledged "Leader of the Highland Host," Dr. Begg was elected to the Moderatorship of the Assembly of his Church, he has been one of the best known and one of the most written-upon of Scotch public men. Since the death of Chalmers, three Scotch clergymen alone have been able to play with success upon the emotions of popular audiences, to move them to laughter, to tears, or to action. These are Norman Macleod, Thomas Guthrie, and James Begg. Now the last is gone, who is there for Scotch Presbyterians to talk about? Still more, who is there for Scotch journals to write upon?

One needed to have seen and heard Dr. Begg in his prime, and on a platform of his own choosing, to understand his peculiar influence in Scotland. He was generally surrounded by less robust, more anxious, not perhaps more earnest, but more painfully earnest men than himself,—Emersonian "assessors," in fact, who were proud of him, reported on him to the general public, and seemed ready at any moment to point to his burly presence, and large, almost leonine head, and exclaim, triumphantly,—See what the Shorter Catechism and oatmeal porridge can give to the world? His Saxon features and his combative air reminded one not a little of Mr. Bright; while the pose of his head and his flowing hair recalled Christopher North, that impersonation of Wordsworthianism allied with athletics, and dieted, as Carlyle put it, in his snappish way, on rizzared haddocks and toddy. When he began to speak, he did not strike one at first as having much of the orator in him. His utterance was deliberate, and his elocution was mainly notable for that peculiar intonation of voice, which has characterised almost all great Scotch speakers who have also been earnestly religious men, which may sometimes be observed when Mr. Gladstone is making an impressive rather than an impassioned speech, and which, like the New-England drawl of the day, is traced by the curious in such things to the attempt of Puritanism to make the voice, like everything else, convey the idea of submission to divine power. But when Dr. Begg warmed to his work and, metaphorically, threw off cloak and bands, when his intonation vanished or his hearers became accustomed to it, he showed himself the vigorous and essentially lay controversialist, delighting in the art of self-defence, and delighting his audience by his art. It may be doubted if he has left behind him any Scotchman who can play so well upon the patriotic harp of Falkirk and Bannockburn, of Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge. The present writer once heard Dr. Begg addressing a meeting in support of a hopeless cause—he was the champion of almost as many hopeless causes as Oxford itself—the maintenance of a Scotch Board of Education. His arguments were poor; his onslaught on "My Lords" of the Privy Council was not effective, even as a piece of rhetoric; and his audience was not sympathetic. At last, he drew himself up to his full height, shook his head threateningly, and said,—"My Lords shall learn that the Scotch lion can still wag his tail." His hearers were unconvinced, but they applauded "the stroke" to the echo. The incident was a typical one. Dr. Begg delighted his countrymen by his vigorous personality and his inexhaustible vigour, but except as a social reformer he did not persuade the majority of them to accept and act upon his views; even as a social reformer, his views were not original, and his success was limited. He succeeded, with the help of the Highland Host, in postponing union between his own Church and the chief of those Voluntary bodies whose ecclesiastical creed was in his eyes "national atheism," but apparently not in finally preventing it. He has not been able to dissuade his Church from throwing itself into the Disestablishment movement. What was the result of his anti-Popery crusade? He must have seen before his death that the triumph of refinement in religious service, of the movement for a less rigid observance of Sunday, and even of the new eregias, is only a question of time, and not of a very long time. In spite of Dr. Begg, of his valiant speeches, and his innumerable pamphlets, the traditional Calvinism of Scotland is being silently and gradually superseded by a more genial and less dogmatic scheme of the Divine Economy. Dr. Begg was indeed a quarter of a century behind his time.

Yet Scotland will long respect the leader of forlorn-hopes that has just passed away. Looked at simply as a personality, he was strong,—much as Bishop Dupanloup was strong. Although he had not the literary culture of Dupanloup, he resembled him in his energy, his political sagacity, his indisposition to give the cheek to the smiter, the positive zest with which he called a spade a spade, his delight in pressing journalism and pamphleteering into the service of his Church and his hundred other “causes.” He must have had many of the qualities of the leader of men. While he was in the fullness of his powers, the Free-Church Conservatism of the Highlands obeyed his will without question. He might have made the boast of Cardinal Bonnechose, “Mon clergé sont un régiment, et quand je lui dis, ‘Marchez!’ il marche.” What helped further to make Dr. Begg popular in Scotland was the fact that he was quite open and above-board in all his dealings. He may deserve to be styled a bigot or a demagogue, but not an intriguer or a wirepuller. He held Chalmers’ theory that a Scotch minister ought to be above all things “a tribune of the people,” and would have scorned to accept power that was not freely given him by his countrymen or his Church. He detested whatever savoured to him of Broad Churchism, Rationalism, or Ritualism; Papists and Free-thinkers he, no doubt, honestly believed to be bad men. But it cannot be said of him that he was a mere heresy-hunter. It was probably owing to him and his strength as the leader, if not of the stupid, at least of the unenquiring party in the Free Church, that Professor Robertson Smith was expelled from his position as a teacher in it. But Professor Smith’s “heresy” was brought to him, and he was asked to deal with it; he did not laboriously ferret it out. After all, it is something to have been the greatest force of theological resistance in one’s time and country. This position—this “bad eminence,” if you will—must be assigned to Dr. Begg. Already the murmur is heard among the advocates of theological movement in Scotland, that after him will come the Deluge. A generation hence this prediction may be verified, and, perhaps, by those in whose eyes that Deluge will only be the showers that usher in for Scotland the spring of a mellow, a richer, but not less reverent or less loyal Protestantism, than that which, intensified and embittered by persecutions which are not yet forgotten, James Begg represented in much of its narrowness, but also in all its earnestness, in all its democratic independence of spirit, and in not a little of its homely and racial humour.

MINISTERING ANGELS.

“THE Silly Season” is a harsh name for the quarter, now generally reduced to a sixth of the year, which intervenes between the rising of Parliament and the reopening of the Law Courts. In these days of congresses and conferences, there is really more food for thought supplied by the newspapers, and of a more varied kind, than we are allowed to regale ourselves with during the weary régime of Parliamentary debates and law reports. The original function of the House of Commons, as a place for the utterance of grievances, is gradually being transferred to these congresses and conferences, and to the correspondence which fills the columns of the Daily Press. As discontent is the seed of progress, the “autumn of our discontent” must be regarded as at least as important and useful a season as the summer, in which it seeks, generally in vain, to be healed by the sun of Parliament. “The Grumbling Season,” if less alliterative, would be a more appropriate and worthy title. The grumbles of railway travellers in search of speed and comfort, of City clerks in search of cheap dinners, of Paterfamilias in search of a house, of Filiusfamilias in search of a career are, to say the least, no sillier than the grumbles of an Opposition in search of office, or the pertinacious platitudes of politicians in search of notoriety. But that we wish to imply that all the grumbings out of Session are any better founded than some of those in Session. But as they are generally more spontaneous, and not being confined to one class, are more likely to express a real grievance, they are at least as useful in suggesting reforms for the future and testing those of the past. In this point of view, even the splenetic charge of the heavy brigade in an evening contemporary on the manners of Female Post-office Clerks is worthy of attention. The introduction of female telegraphists was hailed by the supporters of Woman’s Rights with a sort of chorus of spinsters, very much in the same way as the chorus of old men in the Agamemnon hailed the beacon-

fire which told that Troy Town had fallen. It was the end of a weary period of watching and waiting, the harbinger of the good time coming, the earnest of the fruits of many a victory to be. The deft fingers of women were to set in action the wires of the telegraph with as much swift dexterity as they do those of the piano. They were to write messages about iron and steel and stocks and shares with the same easy celerity that they corresponded about the last new ribbon or baby’s first tooth. The sweet graciousness of their manners and the quick intuition of their brains were to make the sending of messages a task of true delight, which would refine the office boy and elevate the most elegant of clerks. The process of asking for information as to the weight of a book, or the postage to Kamtschatka, was to be a liberal education for both sexes. The inquiring male was to have his manners softened, and not allowed to be ferocious; the informing female was to have her mind broadened and her intellect strengthened by contact with the realities of life. Yet it was not so very long before a whisper went round that a noble Postmaster-General had been refused information by two of his employés, with a rudeness which would have done credit to a French admiral or a German lieutenant. And now we are told that “brazen pertness” is characteristic of female Post-office clerks, that they snub heavy fathers, and actually converse in audible tones in full official time as to the young men who have kissed them, though, happily, they are not so far sunk as to relate in the same audible tones whether, like the mermaids, they returned the compliment. Not merely have they been contrasted or compared with the other sex, but other members of their own sex have been held up as examples to them. Shop girls, and even barmaids, are depicted as models of ladylike deportment, in sad contrast to the dreadful specimens, mixtures seemingly of the virago and the coquette, who fill the post-offices. Unhappily, however, evidence is adduced also on the other side. One cantankerous sender of telegraphic messages received with gratitude a lesson in manners from a young lady who licked a stamp for him, which he refused to lick himself, and a cloud of witnesses have testified to the general sweetness and light dispersed by the Post-office young ladies.

The upshot appears to be what might have been expected. The female Post-office clerk is, on the whole, not so very different from the male clerk. Most male clerks are civil and well behaved, most female clerks are the same. On the other hand, a Post-office clerk is “in office.” As there are Jacks in office, so there are Jills in office. Every one, probably, has suffered at the hands of the male railway clerk who prefers finishing his tea round the corner to giving you the ticket you are asking for a train which is overdue, or who is cackling with his fellow-clerk, instead of attending to the queue of impatient voyagers. If the female clerks in the Post Office occasionally indulge in similar irritations behind their more transparent lattice-work, it is only “human nature,” and there is, after all, “a deal o’ human natur’ about wimmen.” But it is significant of the superior character of the Post-office clerk that there have been no complaints made by ladies that they are treated worse than the other sex by their own. It is a well-known complaint with regard to barmaids that they neglect the wants of women, while they are ministering to those of the young man with the hat on the side of his head and a too odorous cigar in his mouth, who divides his attentions between Hebe and the nectar she provides. But, from the nature of things, this objectionable youth is not to be found in the Post Office, to the great benefit of clerks and customers. On the other hand, there is not, perhaps, quite so pressing an attention shown by the young ladies in post-offices as by the young ladies in milliners’ shops. But then this is a difference which is also observable between the young man behind the counter, and the young man behind the little window at a railway station. Indeed, it would be a considerable addition to the minor evils of life if, after having bought a shilling’s-worth of stamps, you were then pressed even by the sweetest lips that ever breathed to buy a packet of post-cards. What is required of Post-office clerks is despatch in doing their business, and readiness to give information. This requirement is, on the whole, fully met by female Post-office clerks. As a rule, there is no doubt that they are civil, obliging, and well behaved. It may also be a male prejudice, but there has certainly, in our view, been a distinct gain of civility and obligingness wherever female clerks have been substituted for male. At all events, the opening to women of the Post-office Service has been a distinct success. It has shown that, on the whole, they are able to do work of this kind, at least as well as men.

The experiment, so far as it has gone, not merely justifies its continuance, but is an experimentum crucis in pointing the way to further experiments of a like kind. Those who expect all women to be always "ministering angels" may be disappointed, and the "manners and tone of good society" cannot be always ensured for a modicum of shillings a week. But those who look to the throwing-open of indoor employments for which they are qualified to women, as likely to provide honest and respectable careers for those who might otherwise trifle away their time in "ignoble sloth," or worse, or perhaps starve, will be satisfied if they get reasonable service. They will neither expect nor desire the ministrations of angels in petticoats, but they will act on the belief that if they treat human beings, wherever situate, with respect and courtesy, they will get respect and courtesy in return.

THE LÉONAI.

IF a line be drawn on the map of France almost due south from the mouth of the Rance to St. Nazaire on the Loire, and the place-names on either side of it be compared, it will be found that nearly all those to the west of such a line begin with "Tre," "Ker," "Lan," or "Plou," while to the east of it very few will be discovered commencing with those characteristic syllables. The narrowness, indeed, of what may be termed the nomenclatorial border-strip that runs along the irregular frontiers of the two Departments Ile-et-Vilaine and Loire Inférieure, into which the Breton marches are divided, is strikingly illustrative of the sharp contrast which Lower Brittany still exhibits to the rest of France, as well as indicative of the comparatively recent period at which the land of biniau and bragou became incorporated with the dominions of the Most Christian King. The gaiety of the Gaul—the Frenchman is still known as "Gallek," in Bretagne—is replaced by the silent gravity of the round-headed, black-haired descendant of the Six Tribes, the vine hardly ripens north-west of the Loire, the sunny plains of Touraine and the rich pastures of Normandy are exchanged for the heathery landes and boggy hollows of high granitic plateaus, where scanty crops of potatoes and buckwheat can alone be raised, under the constant rains that the west winds blow in from the ocean. The conformation of the coast is as characteristic as the surface-sculpture of the interior. From St. Malo round to St. Nazaire the shore-line is indented to an extent seen nowhere else in France. Deep bays are enclosed within far-jutting headlands, up creeks and estuaries the tide surges into the very midst of corn-fields, and washes the thresholds of inland farmhouses, while a barrier of islands serves as some defence against the tempestuous flood of the Atlantic. Everywhere the Celtic race seems to live under similar physical conditions, and the Breton, like his cousin of the western coasts of Ireland and Scotland, is half a sailor, half a tiller of the soil. This very amphibiousness, perhaps, prevents his attaining excellence in either industry; the Celt has never in his original home proved a good farmer or an enterprising seaman. Of this unique Celtic land, unique as the last dwelling-place of the pure Celtic race on the continent of Europe, the characteristic social features are rapidly becoming effaced. What centuries of French domination were unable to effect, a few decades of railway enterprise are silently bringing about. The costume is disappearing, garment by garment, the ancient game of soule is but seldom to be witnessed, the guerz are rarely chanted, and the solemn dances on the sea-shore are already almost things of the past. Granite crosses and finely sculptured calvaries of the same time-defying material attest the piety of former days, and the traveller is never long out of sight of some exquisitely-designed clocher, or towering cathedral spire. But it is in the villages only that the men will be seen at mass; in the towns, as in the rest of France, the congregations consist almost wholly of women. The language will be the last characteristic of the Breton to disappear, but go it must, in time; French only is allowed to be taught in the schools, or spoken in the army, and no Eistedfodds exist to maintain the one Celtic dialect, still spoken out of the Queen's dominions, as an element of culture.

The megalithic antiquities of southern Brittany have attracted the majority of visitors to what is, probably, the least Celtic portion of the Duchy. These huge monuments—temples, tombs, or fortresses—seem to have been the work of an Iberian or Basque, rather than of a Celtic people. The dolmens that are scattered over the surface of the three Departments of Finistère, Côtes du Nord, and Morbihan, but which are most numerous in the last-mentioned, are often termed in Breton ti- er-corriganet, or dwarfs' dwellings, and it is hardly likely that such a name would be given to their constructions by the early Celts themselves, who were a tall race, or by their descendants. The Basques of the present day are a small-statured race, and so are the Eskimo, with whom they appear to be allied. These remains, too, were certainly regarded as antiquities in Roman times, and the Celtic immigration into western Europe did not, probably, take place further back than a few centuries before the Christian era. Of the four dioceses into which Lower Brittany was formerly divided, that of Léon, corresponding roughly with the northern half of Finistère, is the most interesting, especially to Englishmen, from any but a merely prehistorical point of view. Of the builders of Carnac we may guess much, but we shall never know more than a very little, notwithstanding Mr. Miln's exhaustive researches and careful admeasurements. But in the cathedral of St. Pol de Léon, the clocher of Creisker, the triumphal arch of Thégonnec, the calvaries of Guimiliau and Plougastel, we read the æsthetic and religious history of a people in whom Englishmen cannot but feel a peculiar interest. For there can be little doubt that a considerable proportion of the present inhabitants of the Léonais are the descendants of British (Welsh, Cornish, or Devonian) immigrants of the fourth and succeeding centuries. All along the shores of northern Brittany the towns seem to have begun as aggregations round a priestly rather than a military foundation. As Brother Albert le Grand tells us, in his "Vie, Gestes, Mort, et Miracles des Saints de la Bretagne-Armorique," many, perhaps most, of these religious town-makers were British apostles. St. Malo owed its origin in the sixth century to a British saint, Malou or Maclou (MacLeod); St. Briec to St. Briek, in the fifth century. Dôl itself, a frontier town of importance in the days of William the Conqueror, is said to have been founded by Riwal, a Devonian prince; and of St. Renan, an Irish saint, the memory is preserved in the name of a town in Finistère. The very seat of the Bishop, St. Pol de Léon, was founded by a British missionary, who bore the Roman name of Aurelian, and after displaying proofs of sanctity in his own country, had been commanded by an angel to cross the Channel and preach the Gospel in Brittany, where he built a large number of churches, and died, a centenarian, in 594. The famous cathedral is said to cover the burial-place of Conan Mériadec, a Pictish chief, who, following the Emperor Maximus into Gaul towards the close of the fourth century, founded Aleth, now St. Servan, and ended by becoming ruler of all Armorica. The dialect of the Léonais is asserted to be the purest form of Breton, which on examination turns out to be little more than softened Welsh. Many words are absolutely identical in the two languages, and the grammatical terminations of Brezounek are merely worn-down repetitions of those of Welsh. It is possible enough that, as some recent writers maintain, the insular Britons and the continental Bretons were different peoples; but however this may have been, the British immigrants of the earlier centuries of our era undoubtedly constituted a preponderating, though probably not hostile element, in influence, if not in numbers, in the northern half of ancient Armorica. The town of St. Pol has a sleepy look, as if conscious of having earned repose by the erection of its fine cathedral,—one of the few in France completely finished by the middle of the fifteenth century—and of the exquisitely-proportioned and elaborately-decorated Clocher de Creisker, the ascription of which to an English architect is so indignantly scouted by the patriotic Joanne. Visitors should not omit to ascend the clocher,—the view of the entire Roscoff peninsula, dotted with white-walled, blue-roofed villages and tall, slender spires, with Enez Baz beyond it, and on either side an iron-bound, rugged, precipitous coast, hollowed out into endless deep bays, bordered by glittering strips of yellow sand, and enclosed between jagged capes and points of every conceivable form, often ending in a sort of procession of pinnacled rocks, against which the blue sea breaks incessantly in rings of encircling surf, will amply repay the exertion. One may very well walk from one end of the town to the other without meeting half a dozen persons, and it is not easy to imagine how its seven thousand inhabitants manage to gain a livelihood. Yet there is a well-to-do air about it, and it is possible that the railway recently opened to Roscoff may lend it animation, as well as add to its prosperity. Next to Brest, which we have only space to mention here, Morlaix is the most important town in the Léonais. Nothing can be more picturesque than its situation; street after street of white-walled, blue-roofed houses, occupying either slope of a deep ravine, crossed below by the immense granite viaduct of the Brest Railway, nearly two hundred feet above the pavement. The view from the old ramparts looking westwards over the Queffleut towards the Church of St. Martin des Champs is one of the finest of the kind in Brittany. The arrangement of blue and white, characteristic of Breton towns, harmonises singularly well with the greenery amid which the many-gabled houses, with their high-pitched roofs, are nestled. The town is full of old houses, and such streets as the Rue des Nobles and the Grande Rue are almost what they were when the "Duchesse Anne," who seems to have honoured every town in the Duchy by residence at some time or other, gave her hand to Charles VIII. and her dominions to the French Crown.

At the period of the present writer's visit, the town was full of Réservistes, most of whom seemed miserable enough, but, despite the somewhat bellicose tenor of its punning motto, "S'ils te mordent, mords-les!" the irruption merely lent an increased animation to the streets. The Bretons are a peaceful, courteous, kindly folk, rather too fond of trois-six, and a little given to trickery. The virtue of cleanliness they have not yet learnt to appreciate, and in Breton towns and villages the vilest smells assail you at every turn. They are, however, industrious and frugal; as in Wales, the peasant-women knit as they walk. The small proprietors seem for the most part very poor, beggars are numerous, though not very importunate, and even the able-bodied are not ashamed to ask for a copper. In the country the priests and the resident "noblesse" still maintain much of their old prestige and authority, but the people of the larger towns are distinctly Republican, rather, perhaps, from a sentiment of opposition than from any fervent admiration of the Republican principle. The Léonais was formerly the most subject to clerical influence of the four dioceses. Souvestre says that so great was the number of crosses in it, that to replace those thrown down during the Revolution would have cost £40,000. The land is still more thickly covered with churches than any other portion of the duchy. The explanation of these facts, however, may lie in its earlier evangelisation, and especially in its greater fertility and wealth. The Léonais has a greater extent of coast and a smaller proportion of mountain and moor land than any of the three other dioceses. Under these circumstances, the success which has rewarded the efforts of a Baptist mission, established some years ago at Morlaix, is the more remarkable. In the town and its neighbourhood seven places of worship have been opened, the services at which, conducted in Breton as well as in French, are numerous attended. M. le Pasteur Jenkins is a thorough master of the Breton language, and it is touching to witness the fervour with which Breton translations of Baptist hymns are sung to Moody and Sankey tunes, the simple trustfulness with which the words of the preacher are listened to by congregations invited to consider for themselves the truths of Christianity, in lieu of receiving their religion shaped and fashioned for them by a sacerdotal class.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MR. HOULDSWORTH AND THE LIBERALS OF MANCHESTER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I notice in last Saturday's Spectator you make the statement that I "called" the Liberals of Manchester "cowards."

Will you allow me to say that I never made use of any such expression, nor has any language escaped me conveying that idea.—I am, Sir, &c., W. H. HOULDSWORTH.

NOVEL CHURCH EXPERIMENT IN AMERICA.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I think the Liberal Churchmen of England, most of whom, I take it, read the Spectator, will be interested in an experience I have just had of the practical working of the American branch of our Church.

Three years ago, the settlement at Rugby, Tennessee, was founded, and a few Englishmen, of whom the great majority were Episcopalians, with some Americans, mostly Methodists or Presbyterians, went to live there. One church was built, and handed over to a committee of the settlers, on condition that it was to be free to all denominations who desired to use it. Accordingly, the committee arranged that the Church Service should be used in the mornings of Sundays, and a Methodist or Presbyterian service in the evenings; while, in the afternoons, the building should be used as a Sunday-school of the New-England type. So far, all was clear enough; but then came the question, who would undertake the services? There was no clergyman or regular minister amongst the settlers,—they could not afford to pay one; and the experience of the first few months showed that no reliance could be placed on occasional clerical visitors, or missionaries, of any denomination.

The settlers accordingly, like sensible folk, chose the best man amongst themselves "to fill the bill." This proved to be an energetic farmer, Blacklock by name, the father of seven sons, who had "laid hold" of some 200 acres of forest just outside the town boundaries with exemplary vigour. It seems that in former years he had been in the habit of conducting Methodist services in the South of London, though (I believe) not a regularly appointed minister. This was his special qualification, but he willingly, indeed gladly, undertook to give the Church service always in the mornings.

On this footing matters ecclesiastical have gone on without a hitch. Mr. Blacklock has conducted the services to the entire satisfaction of all concerned, giving place occasionally, when the Bishop sent a clergyman to administer the Communion, or a denominational minister happened to be staying at the hotel. On my arrival last month, my latitudinarian soul was rejoiced to find the denominations inextricably mingled, the settlers attending both services with perfect impartiality, as convenience might dictate, a zealous New England Methodist Sunday-school teacher leading the hymns and responses at the morning services, and English Churchwomen, detained in the morning by household duties, attending the evening service with exemplary punctuality. In a word, nothing could be more satisfactory than this state of things, except that several babies were waiting to be christened, and there was no certainty as to when the next Communion Service would be held.

The obvious remedy, as they saw it, was that Mr. Blacklock should be ordained, and at their request, after obtaining his consent, I wrote to the Bishop of Tennessee, suggesting this solution of the difficulty. I confess that I did so with much doubt as to the result of the application, as it was stipulated that the evening services were to go on as heretofore, and Mr. Blacklock frankly stated that, having his hands full with his farm work and the preparation of two sermons a week, he could not undertake to pass examinations requiring preparation.

By return of post I received the Bishop's reply. Far from raising any difficulty, it met the proposal with perfect cordiality and frankness, intimating that it had already occurred to him. After expressing his high respect for Mr. Blacklock, he goes on (for I think it best to give his own words), "I am quite sure that he will do better work at Rugby than any new man could accomplish. I can promise him there will be no difficulty in the way of his ordination. He need not rub up his Greek. Of course, he must undergo examinations in the Bible and Prayer-book, as there are certain canonical examinations which cannot be dispensed. He will be received as 'an ordained minister or licentiate of the Methodist denomination.' I am willing to go very far to satisfy the Nonconformists, and am willing to compromise anything but fundamental principles. The fratricidal dissensions of the so-called Christian world are appalling. Our dear Lord prayed that all his disciples might be one. He made unity the distinguishing mark of his kingdom and the first condition of missionary work, and I thank God that our branch of the Catholic Church interposes no obstacle to the most substantial unity. The Church system is large enough to comprehend all those who love the Lord in sincerity. . . . True it is that if all denominational distinctions were forgotten, or buried in the depths of the sea, no truth essential to the soul's salvation would be lost, nor any the smallest necessary truth destroyed. We need more and more of 'the patience of Christ,' and more and more of that charity which hopeth all things. Men do not understand the Church, or her teaching, or her terms of communion, and so they array themselves in hostility against her." I hope that my old colleagues of the Church Reform Union may, upon reading this deliverance of a most orthodox Bishop, "thank God and take courage, and possibly bring in again next Session the modest 'Occasional Services Bill,' which used to be such a red rag to Anglican fanatics in the House when I was an M.P.—

LONGEVITY AND CANON KINGSLEY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have read with interest in your last issue General Robertson's letter about the patriarchal age of Miss Gray. I am, however, surprised to learn that Sir G. Cornewall Lewis knew of this case, and regarded it as established. As I have stated elsewhere (Fortnightly Review, April, 1869), Sir George told me, only two or three weeks before he died, that a few instances of Scotch centenarians seemed to be made out, but that he regarded 105 (or thereabouts) as the ne plus ultra of human life. Sir George, speaking to me from memory, may have forgotten the exact figures. It is, therefore, more to the point to remark that in 1872, in Fraser's Magazine, an article was written by Professor Owen on longevity, which seemed to accept the conclusions of Mr. Thoms to the effect that, up to that date, no one was proved to have exceeded the age of (I think) 103 and a few months. Would it not be worth General Robertson's while to call Mr. Thoms's attention to the very remarkable case of Miss Gray?

Perhaps I may be permitted to add that the October number of The Journal of Education publishes for the first time an interesting letter of the late Canon Kingsley, expressing views concerning longevity diametrically opposed to those of Sir G. Cornewall Lewis.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POPULAR PANIC AND POLITICAL CROTCHETS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me to protest against your eagerness to crush out individual crotchets in the Liberal party? Whatever "discredit" may be brought on the Liberal party by "tolerance of crotchets," surely it ought to bear, if it is to remain a body of men aiming at freedom! If it crushes out freedom in its own body, how can it promote freedom in the country? I do not wonder that the irritating acts of the Obstructionists should be stirring an impatience of talk and delay, and should lead to a desire for a uniformly-working machine which should grind out so many laws an hour; but surely the Spectator should try to check the excesses of a popular panic of this kind, instead of encouraging it! If the policy advocated by the Spectator had been followed by Liberals, that intolerable crotchet-monger, Buxton, would never have compelled the Whig Ministry to abolish slavery; those equally intolerable crotcheteers, Cobden and Villiers, would have been snuffed-out by steady Whigs like Macaulay, who expressed great irritation at their breach of party discipline; and the present Postmaster-General would have never been able to waken Parliament to the need of preserving the rights of "Commoners," keeping open land which was being rapidly swallowed up by landlords and builders, with the sanction of Whigs as much as of Tories. And, with this scorn of crotcheteers, will there not grow a scorn of all independence, moral as well as intellectual?

The concluding words in the Spectator's article alarm me much, though I earnestly hope that they do not mean to express quite so cynical a contempt for honesty as they seem at first sight to show. Yet I entreat you to read them again, before you decide that the snuffing-out of independence is the great duty of Liberals. The words are,—“We admit that Dr. Pankhurst is honestly dreaming, and not pretending to dream, and therefore we prefer, if we are forced to make the choice, a sensible Tory to Dr. Pankhurst.” Ergo, if Dr. Pankhurst pretended to dream, instead of honestly dreaming, your objection to him would be less decided, because then, he might surrender his convictions on due pressure.—I am, Sir, &c.,

CHILDREN AND THEIR DINNERS.

SIR,—In your very interesting article last week on food for the poor, no reference was made to the apple, which is a most important article of consumption. With bread, potatoes, and apple pudding, children will flourish without meat. Apples are so abundant this year in the Vale of Taunton, that the branches of the trees are broken down by their weight. Careful housekeepers are now busily engaged in making apple jam, no bad substitute for butter, for which I am giving 1s. 6d. a pound. Apples, my doctor assures me, are not sufficiently valued as an article of food. Moreover, if the farmers in orchard countries would grow apples for cooking purposes, instead of making cider, and prune and watch their trees as in America, a double produce may be obtained.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE INVASION OF ULSTER.

SIR,—I am impelled by the frantic attempts of Mr. Parnell's followers to misrepresent the events of their late Ulster campaign, and encouraged by the article on the invasion of our Province in last week's Spectator, to send you some account of what I saw in Omagh last Saturday, and what I heard from friends who were at Dungannon on Thursday, and Aghnacloy on Tuesday.

It is necessary to say, in the first place, that the loyal and anti-Parnellite demonstration was not organised by the landlords. The landlords were almost unanimous in believing that the farmers, Protestant as well as Catholic, were absorbed by the desire to get rents reduced, and full of suspicion and distrust, and they were persuaded that any effort on their part to get up a counter-demonstration would be regarded as a scheme for maintaining high rents, and sure to fail.

The Protestant gatherings at Aghnacloy, Dungannon, and Omagh were got up by the rank and file of the Orange farmers, shopkeepers, and labourers, by whom the Conservative gentry and clergy were asked to attend and speak, and were well received and heartily cheered.

What must have struck every impartial spectator most was not merely the confronting of the so-called "Nationalist" meeting by a loyalist and Unionist meeting, strong enough to make head against it, and obliging the Government to collect a large force of police and soldiers to prevent a pitched battle, but the utter insignificance and feebleness to which the attempted Nationalist gathering was reduced by the Conservative demonstration, both as to numbers and as to character. I overheard the following dialogue between two gentlemen on the steps of the White Hart Hotel, Omagh, after the Nationalists had escorted their leaders to their obscure place of meeting in the lower town, and the country Orangemen had marched into the square, where their brethren had erected and garrisoned a platform:—First spectator: "Well, we've had a good view of both parties, now." Second spectator: "I did not see the other party at all." First spectator: "Were not you here when they started half-an-hour ago?" Second spectator: "Oh, I saw a few ragamuffins running after a waggonette." First spectator: "That was the other party!"

The Orangemen who walked in procession with drums, flags, and sashes, were joined at the meeting by a still larger body of independent Protestant farmers and others, and the whole body was remarkable for fine physique and respectable appearance. Great enthusiasm prevailed, and there was an angry ring in their cheers which convinced those who know the country and had seen both parties that, but for the troops and police, the Protestants would very soon have cleared the town of the "invaders" and their friends, not without serious injury to their persons. The ragged following of Parnellites at no time throughout the week made any attempt to show fight, except late on Saturday night, when a small party of Orangemen, passing through a low part of the town, was attacked out of the windows of some houses.

At Dungannon, the rush at Mr. Healy, when he foolishly crossed the Diamond to the Post Office, was so alarming that the police who were protecting him would not attempt to escort him beyond the lines held by the troops till they got the help of a troop of Lancers. An officer of the escort that protected the agitators to the train in the evening described them as clinging to each other, in terror of the pursuing Orangemen. At no point were their sympathisers in a position to attempt to protect them from the violence threatened by the numbers and excitement of the Protestant party. At Portadown Station the only person able to rescue Mr. T. P. O'Connor from very rough treatment was the most violent of the Orange speakers, the Rev. R. Kane.

The feeling throughout the country is no less remarkable than the actual occurrences at Aghnacloy, Dungannon, and Omagh. Satisfaction at the Parnellite discomfiture is universal among the Protestant population, including many of those who have been hitherto most advanced Radicals and tenant-righters, and whose politics were thought to consist entirely in hatred of landlords. The effect of the invasion of Ulster has been to arouse a feeling that was believed to be nearly extinct, but which proves to have been merely dormant, and to completely destroy the chance which many, till last week, believed Mr. Parnell to have of returning one of his followers for County Tyrone, in the event of a contest between Liberals and Conservatives at the next general election.—I am, Sir, &c.,

NATURAL SCIENCE AND BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Perhaps the most important discussions at the Congress, I mean those on "Recent Advances in Natural Science," &c., and "Recent Advances in Biblical Criticism," were rendered much less useful than they might have been by the readers, with three notable exceptions, endeavouring to cover too much ground for the time allotted to them, and so their papers, far too long, were hurriedly read, in the attempt to get all in. It was impossible to follow what we most wished to hear, and until the report is issued we shall be in ignorance of the arguments and conclusions which three or four of the principal speakers, whose words carry enormous weight, intended to bring before the audience, and the force of their advocacy by speech entirely lost. The points touched on should be limited in number, to fall within the allotted time, and allowance made for the reading to be of that fairly loud, clear, and deliberate character (such as that of the Bishop of Carlisle and the Rev. and Honourable A. T. Lyttelton) as would make the most abstruse subjects easy to follow without the strain to hear, which would quite spoil the enjoyment of a story, and makes attention to close argument absolutely impossible.

This was felt by many who spoke to me, and as a suggestion through your widely-read paper may be more effective than any other means to ensure an alteration of this obvious and serious fault at future Congresses, I venture to ask your insertion of this letter.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

A FANCY.

SWEET Summer went forth to the fields,
With roses entwined in her hair;
Her footsteps as light
As her glances were bright,
And all that she looked upon fair.

Grave Autumn, beholding the maid,
Grew cheery in chanting her charms;
They met, but, alas!
All her strength seemed to pass,
And she languished to death in his arms.

Now sombre grew Autumn and sear,
As he clung to the maid in his woe;
Then Winter passed by,
And, with tear-stricken eye,
Hid them both 'neath a mantle of snow.

A BREATH OF HEAVEN.

I ONCE again in this charm'd realm inquire:
Not listening to the Ocean's sad refrain,
Nor watching on the mountain heights, to gain
A message for the meditative lyre.
The air contents me. Such do they respire,
Our lov'd ones, gather'd on the heavenly plain,
With quiet breathing blest, and freed from pain,
And toil, and care, and unfulfill'd desire.
Embosom'd in like calm, oh, let me rest,
And breathe in sweet, unseen companionship
Time cannot sever, nor delay, nor Death!
These shining shores and sunlit sea attest
The encircling Love that doth his children keep
In perfect peace and unlaborious breath.

PROFESSOR GREEN'S PROLEGOMENA TO ETHICS.*

[FIRST NOTICE.]

THIS is the most able and remarkable contribution to ethical science which has appeared in our country since the publication of Professor Sidgwick's Methods of Ethics. And when we have said this, it seems paradoxical to add, what we must add, that we have read three times the author's treatment of so important a question in ethics as the freedom of the will, without being able to make quite certain whether he does or does not believe that human action is, in any intelligible sense of the word, freely performed. He emphatically declares that such "action is as necessarily related to the character and circumstances as any event to the sum of its conditions," and so far appears to deny human freedom. But when he proceeds to explain what character, according to his acceptance of the term, involves, it comes to mean the self, and determination by the character is called self-determination. If this were all, we should conclude that Mr. Green was an advocate, as he professes to be in his work, of free-will, but that he uses the word "character" not in the sense of natural bent or habitual disposition, but in a new sense, which denies to it a fixed meaning or a permanent value, and identifies it with the disposition of a particular moment, as expressed in the act performed at that moment. A more careful study of his language, however, makes us waver in this opinion, and inclines us to think that, amid a certain vacillation both of language and of thought, he does not distinctly contemplate any power of self-determination, as distinct from the action of habit or a tendency in this or that man to resist immediate inclination, brought about by the natural adherence of his will to distant ends, rather than to immediate pleasure. In such action he appears to consider the will self-determining in this sense, that it is the action of a man conscious of the end at which he aims; but that end is, nevertheless, marked out for him by the interaction of his character (in the sense of natural bent) and the circumstances of his life. This is the conclusion which we are inclined finally to draw as to Professor Green's meaning, and the question is so vital, and its truly critical issues so frequently and easily evaded, that we shall not, we think, waste our space, if we devote our first notice of his work to a careful examination of his remarks on the subject.

We select for quotation two pages which seem to us to express most clearly Mr. Green's view as to the operation of the will in a deliberate action, and its connection with the motive on which it acts. Here is the first:—

"The motive which the act of the will expresses is the desire for . . . self-satisfaction. It is not one of the motives, the desires, or aversions, of which the man was conscious previously to the act, as disposing him to it; at any rate, not one of these or a combination of them, as they were before the determination of the will, before the man 'made up his mind.' It is only as they become through the reaction of the self-seeking self upon them, only through its formation to itself of an object out of them—only as they merge in an effort after a self-satisfaction to be found in this object—that they yield the motive of the act of will, properly so called. This motive does, indeed, necessarily determine the act; it is the act on its inner side. But it is misleading to call it the strongest motive, for this implies a certain parity between it and the impulses which have been previously soliciting the will. The distinction of greater or less strength properly applies only to 'motives,' in that sense in which they do not determine the will,—to desires and aversions, as they are without that reaction of the self upon them which yields the final motive expressed by the action. It may very well happen that the desire which affects a man most strongly is one which he decides on resisting. In spite of its strength, he cannot make its object his object, the object with which he seeks to satisfy himself. His character prevents this. In other words, it is incompatible with his steady direction of himself towards certain objects in which he habitually seeks satisfaction."

We will only, for the moment, draw attention to the concluding sentences which we have italicised. "Character" seems here to imply what it generally implies,—that bent and disposition of mind which is the outcome of the past, that past including what nature originally implanted, and what circumstances as affecting and affected by the original character have superadded. There is no hint here of the additional factor, expressed in the action, of a power of proceeding in a direction different from the habitual one, although there is abundant indication of the power of habit to overcome the desire for pleasurable feeling. This will become plainer, and the questions which it raises will be more satisfactorily discussed after we have presented to our readers another passage, in which the meaning of "character" is enlarged upon:—

"A character is only formed through a man's conscious presentation to himself of objects as his good, as that in which his self-satisfaction is to be found. Just so far as an action is determined by character, it is determined by an object which the agent has thus consciously made his own, and has come to make his own in consequence of actions similarly determined."

Again:—

"What we call a strong character we also call a strong 'will.' This is not to be regarded as a particular endowment or faculty, like a retentive memory, or a lively imagination, or an even temper, or a great passion for society. A strong will means a strong man. It expresses a certain quality of the man himself, as distinguishable from all his faculties and tendencies, a quality which he has in relation to all of them alike. It means that it is the man's habit to set clearly before himself certain objects in which he seeks self-satisfaction, and that he does not allow himself to be drawn aside from these by the suggestions of chance desires. He need not, therefore, be a good man; for the objects on which he concentrates himself may be morally bad, according to the criteria of badness which we have yet to consider. But on the other hand, the weak man, taking his object at any time from the desire which happens to affect him most strongly, cannot be a good man. Concentration of will does not necessarily mean goodness, but it is a necessary condition of goodness."

Our criticism on this account of the will is that, full though it is of true and thoughtful analysis, it fails to bring into relief those cases in which freedom is most plainly exemplified. We have indeed clearly contrasted the man who is led by the desire which affects his feelings most strongly at the moment, and the man who is "tenax propositi," and unswervingly pursues some end. But the effort of the self which modifies the character, which turns, not from habit or from nature, but by free choice, to the pursuit of one end rather than another, is certainly not clearly contemplated, if, indeed, it is contemplated at all. Let us endeavour to make our meaning a little plainer. Tom Tulliver is undoubtedly an instance of what Mr. Green terms a strong character. He placed clearly before himself the end he would attain to—the restoration of his father's good name by his own success—and he worked for it, undeterred by the allurements of pleasure or immediate temptation of any kind. Here seems to us an instance entirely satisfying the conditions laid down by Mr. Green for the completest exhibition of free-will. Such a man's course of action differs from blind habit in that he places the end consciously before himself; and he acts habitually for that end, unmoved by chance desires. And yet we can see nothing in his actions, as thus explained, inconsistent with the absolute denial of free-will. We see, indeed, a character acting rather from the motive of a distant aim than from immediate attractions; but if the character is such in its nature that it is swayed rather by a fixed object than by its sensitiveness to present wants, although undoubtedly the "balance of pleasure" theory is denied by the admission, free-will is not proved or clearly exhibited. The mere fact that the end is "consciously made his own" does not make the agent free, supposing him to be determined in choosing the end by his natural bent, any more than the fact that a man is conscious of slipping down a steep mountain-side makes him slip by choice. The really critical cases in which man's freedom is put to the test are those in which he makes what the late Dr. Ward called anti-impulsive effort,—in which, that is, the net result of bent of character and circumstances being inclined in one direction, and some end proposed by the intellect in another, he adheres doggedly to the latter; not, as Mr. Green contemptuously expresses it, by a power of "unmotivated willing," but by a power of adhering to whichever of two motives is chosen by preference. No doubt, this power is limited, and becomes more and more so in proportion as it is little used. The man who habitually surrenders himself to the inclination of his natural character may in time almost lose this originating power; and, on the other hand, the man who constantly uses it acquires a strength not merely of the kind which Mr. Green contemplates, which is only self-conscious habit, but of subordinating, to use the old-fashioned language, his passions to his reason; of directing his will whithersoever his cool judgment advises.

The importance of the distinction which we have here drawn is, of course, that upon it turns the whole principle of moral probation. If it is once allowed that the same man would always act in the same way under similar circumstances, no juggle of words about its being the "self" which reacts on the circumstances and consciously chooses its end will avail to vindicate the will's freedom, or human responsibility.

If the "self" acts according to a fixed nature, and reacts upon circumstances according to that nature, and is consequently modified in nature, and then reacts according to its modified nature, and so forth, free-will is as plainly denied as it would be by the crudest theory of the "balance of pleasure." The chain of necessary cause and effect is more varied in its links, but is quite as unbroken, and consequently the idea of probation falls. No doubt, Mr. Green's theory has this advantage, so far as its practical moral working goes, over any less subtle determinism; that, as he says, the belief that our action is necessarily determined paralyses the "moral initiative," whereas a contrary belief stimulates to effort; consequently, his retention of the term "free-will" greatly lessens the evil effect of his analysis of its nature. But Mr. Green's explanation of this very phenomenon is, to our mind, an absolute denial of what we mean by free-will. It amounts to this, that that particular circumstance—the belief in our own power of originating effort—affects many characters, so as to bring about moral improvement; and its absence is the absence of a circumstance on which the character would react, and without such reaction the improvement in question cannot take place.

We repeat once more what we have already said, that we do not think that the author quite clearly contemplated the issue to which we have drawn attention; but we think it all the more important, for this reason, to hold it up to the light. His analysis is, up to a certain point, so able and true, that we should fear that some of his readers might adopt the whole, without noticing its full bearing; and it cannot be too often said that an error which is "half a truth" is always the most dangerous of errors. We should add, in conclusion, that although the meaning attached by Mr. Green to such "freedom of will" as he allows is not consistently or clearly expressed, there are incidental passages which seem, taken by themselves, plainly to indicate that our account of his opinion is the true one,—that he attaches no further meaning to the term "free action" than the idea of an act due to the internal force of character, and not to the interaction of external forces. "Rightly understood," he writes, for example, "the ascription of an action to character as, in respect to circumstances, its cause, is just that which effectually distinguishes it as free or moral from any compulsory or merely natural action."

AMONG the great novelists of England, the position of Richardson is unique. In reviewing that position, one feels tempted to indulge in the paradoxes of which Macaulay was so inordinately fond. If Clarissa Harlowe be, as some critics imagine, the greatest novel in the English language, its author, of whom we happen to know a great deal, was one of the smallest of men. His faults as well as virtues were feminine. His self-appreciation was enormous, his jealousy contemptible, his intellectual range narrow in the extreme. Probably, no writer who has made a conspicuous mark in literature was ever so sparsely furnished by education. His opinion of books is as worthless as that of an enthusiastic but ignorant school-girl, and in writing of his great rival Fielding he displays an irascibility of temper and an incapacity of discerning merit only to be tolerated in affairs of the heart. A fond girl who has lost her lover may be excused for speaking contemptuously of the woman who takes her place; but if we cannot expect Richardson to be pleased with Joseph Andrews, he ought, if not prompted by good-feeling, at least to have had the sagacity to write with justice of its author. His incapacity to appreciate the finer qualities of Fielding's genius would be astounding, were it not explained by his jealousy. He tells Miss Fielding, the author of David Simple, that her brother's knowledge of the human heart is not comparable to hers, and that he has little or no invention. Of Amelia, he was unable to read more than the first volume, so wretchedly low and dirty did he find the characters. "Tom Jones," too, was a "spurious brat," whose success, to the author of Sir Charles Grandison, was "unaccountable." He pretended not to have time to read a book which he had heard strongly condemned as immoral, and commissioned Aaron Hill's two daughters to undertake that labour for him. They did so, and executed it fairly. Their judgment, considering to whom it was addressed, is an honest piece of criticism. Richardson had leisure to pass judgment on a book he had not time to read. Sophia, he declares, is "fond, foolish, and insipid, and Fielding knows not how to draw a delicate woman. He has not been accustomed to such company." And then he goes on to say that the novelist has a perverse and crooked nature. It is evident that he blames Astræa and Minerva Hill for thinking too well of Tom Jones, for they both fairly cried, writes their father, "that you should think it possible they could approve of anything in any work that had an evil tendency in any part or purpose of it." But while justly censuring the levities of the book, they see a thread of moral meaning in it. "And as soon," adds Hill, "as you have time to read him for yourself, 'tis there, pert sluts! they will be bold enough to rest the matter." We are not told that this time ever came.

Richardson, who is so shocked at Fielding, more than tolerates Colley Cibber, whose praise is of the coarsest kind; but the novelist, though shrewd enough in other ways, was open to any degree of flattery, and of this his correspondents seem to have been aware. No expressions of admiration can be too extravagant for him when the subject is Pamela, Clarissa Harlowe, or Sir Charles Grandison, and that those novels did affect the readers of that age to a degree almost inconceivable in ours may be seen from a thousand tokens. Men of the most contradictory characters at home and abroad joined in the chorus of praise, and we do not remember that any one, with the exception of Dr. Watts, ventured to hint that the scenes of vice Richardson described so minutely were not always calculated to promote virtue. By most readers he was regarded not only as a moral writer, but as a great religious teacher, whose works were especially fitted for Sunday reading. All young ladies of the time read Pamela and Clarissa Harlowe, and talked freely of what they read, without a thought apparently that the plots of those tales, whatever might be the moral purpose of the writer, render them unfitted for general perusal. Nor was this all, for Richardson had his little circle of ladies whose judgment he asked, but, we believe, never followed, while his novels were in progress. He lived, as Mrs. Barbauld states, in a kind of flower-garden of young ladies, and had generally a number of them staying at his house, where he exercised the most generous hospitality, and enjoyed the homage paid to him, not by Englishmen only, but by foreigners. One of the most curious facts in his life is the invitation he received from the Moravians to visit Germany. But, indeed, he had praise enough to turn a weaker head, for what Aaron Hill calls his "inimitable virtues."

The great blot of Pamela does not seem to have been noticed by the novelist's contemporaries. The pursuit of an innocent and beautiful servant-girl by a wealthy libertine, her resistance, his reformation, and finally the marriage of the two, forms the substance of the story. "Mr. B.," in the earlier stages of the narrative, is an accomplished villain, who shrinks from no diabolical act to attain his purpose; but the immaculate Pamela loves him, notwithstanding, and when at length he proposes marriage, instead of treating him with contempt, as any right-minded girl would, is almost abject in her gratitude. The condescension of a man of family in offering to marry a servant-girl gives her such a feeling of awe, a feeling shared by her parents, that she and they behave on the great occasion with a singular want of self-respect. There are moments, indeed, when Pamela acts with dignity and with charming simplicity, but her conduct in the expectation of matrimony is far from pleasing. The third volume, which was afterwards added as a supplement, in order to describe this paragon in her married life, has the worst fault, perhaps, a novel can have. It is dull, from the first page to the last.

Some years ago, the late Mr. E. S. Dallas published an abridged edition of Clarissa Harlowe. We do not know whether the three volumes were a commercial success, but they were assuredly a literary failure. To appreciate Richardson's power in this story, the whole narrative should be read, and the five handsome-looking volumes before us may tempt a reader to undertake the task. It will not be wholly pleasurable, and it is probable that he will find the sentiment which Johnson praised so highly in Richardson mawkish and overstrained. For our part, we confess that we follow Clarissa's fortunes with a sense of oppression from which there is no relief, and feel stifled by dwelling in an unwholesome atmosphere, a feeling of which no one is ever conscious when moved by the higher pathos of a Shakespeare or a Scott. And yet we almost hesitate in depreciating this wonderful fiction, for wonderful it certainly is, when we remember the nobility of character exhibited by Clarissa, after the worst outrage a woman can receive. Here tragedy may be said to fulfil its true mission, in elevating and purifying, and in this delineation Richardson ranks for the moment with the greatest masters of the art. The madness of Clementina in Sir Charles Grandison affords another instance, not readily to be equalled, of this novelist's tragic power. We have not the patience in this eager age to endure his prolixity, and thus we may be inclined to think too lightly of his genius; but it is well to remember that in the last century, and especially in France, men of the highest mark in literature acknowledged the claims of Richardson. Rousseau and Diderot were both powerfully influenced by his genius, and the latter, on hearing of his death, wrote:—"His loss touches me as if my brother were no more. I bore him in my heart without having seen him, and knowing him but by his works. . . . Richardson, if living thy merit has been disputed, how great wilt thou appear to our children's children, when they shall view thee at the distance we now view Homer. Then who will dare to steal a line from thy sublime works?" Some of the defects of Richardson, who wrote in a verbose and slovenly style, might not be obvious to a foreigner. To Macaulay they must have been evident, but how greatly he loved this novelist every reader of his biography knows. And Macaulay is among the most English of writers.

The truth is that, in spite of much in Richardson which, to quote Dr. Johnson again, might make the reader hang himself, the creative power of genius, and a knowledge of the human heart, or, perhaps, we ought rather to say, of the female heart, exhibit themselves in these long stories in many delightful touches of nature. He is often wrong, while intending to be right in his morality; his mode of telling his tale, by interminable letters which could never, under the circumstances, have been written, is the worst method a novelist could select; and yet, notwithstanding these defects, and the more glaring fault that his bad characters are often more attractive than the good—his specially good man, Sir Charles Grandison, is surely the greatest prig and bore in fiction—Richardson, can we doubt it? will retain his high place as the father of English fiction, and one of the most original of English writers. It is fitting, then, that his works should appear in a style worthy of his position.

THE STRUGGLE FOR FAME.*

MRS. RIDDELL'S books have always had one merit that perhaps even the most blasé novel-readers can scarcely appreciate as keenly as reviewers must; they do not all turn upon the same subject and run in the same groove as every other novel that has been published within the last twenty years. After perusing we dare not say how many hundreds of three-volume, or (far too seldom), one and two-volume works of fiction, all dedicated exclusively to what one of the characters in the Struggle for Fame rather profanely terms "the love-and-twaddle business," or what another speaker in the same book expresses more elegantly as "love and beauty and children, and dress and jewels, and parties and pleasure, and everything coming right at the end," the relief has been great at finding a novel in which the characters do not devote their whole energies to making love, or having it made to them; in which men and women can be heartily in love, and yet go about their daily work like rational beings, and we may add, like real people. Still greater, perhaps, has been the boon Mrs. Riddell has conferred upon novel-readers by not obliging all her important characters to be "in society," and so delivering us from that dismal condition of fiction in which everybody drinks five-o'clock tea, dines at eight, plays lawn-tennis (or croquet, ten years ago), shops at Marshall and Snelgrove's, and goes out of town at the end of the season. Novelists, especially of the feminine gender, content themselves far too much with depicting this kind of life over and over again, weaving in a thin plot of love or crime, and then they call it representing human life at the present day, unable to perceive that they really only scratch the surface of this nineteenth-century life with their pens, and give about as deep a view of human nature as a looking-glass does. Probably the cause may be found in the fact that people write when they should be reading or observing, and that every one is in too great a hurry to look beneath the surface, but Mrs. Riddell's kind of novel may be best described in the words that she herself applies to her heroine's successful work:—

processes of manufacture unknown utterly to the reading public—took the outside world due East in London, and asked it to walk into dreadful little manufactories, and listen to 'shop' talk, and take an interest in the doings and sayings of men who had probably never been to a dinner-party in their lives, and knew nothing of Sir Bernard Burke, and were not acquainted with lords or baronets; but who were yet some of them gentlemen, and some of them cad, following the nature of their kind."

In the book now before us, our author has not given us much of the City life which she so excelled in depicting; and we regret it, for there is a great charm in studying a kind of existence so entirely unlike our own, and in learning how the great heart of London works its apparatus; but she is always unconventional (which does not mean objectionable), and many of her sketches of character are delightful. Are Mr. Vassett's views, we wonder, still held by publishers in general, and are they—worse still!—likely to be true? "No one knew better than he did that the works he published were not likely to live, but in their generation they were good, useful, amusing. That they were not likely to go down through the ages did not much trouble the gentleman who had assisted at their birth. He felt they would live long enough; they had served their purpose, and could die when they pleased. He felt no such frantic desire for posthumous fame as rendered him unhappy because he could not compass it. If Shakespeare had come back to earth, Mr. Vassett would not have risked anything he considered very valuable, say, for instance, the lease of his house in Craven Street, for the honour of standing godfather even to a second Shylock. The world's applause he did not consider worth the loss of one night's sleep; further, he had a notion, not uncommon among those who prefer to seek their mental food among the past of literature, rather than browse on the light productions of the present, that no more great books would ever be written. Mr. Vassett was no optimist concerning the books of the future. Looking around, he saw what he considered almost a dead-level of mediocrity. Whether the few who struggled out of the mass and achieved distinction, who were run after by readers and run down by the critics, would be thought much of in succeeding generations, was a question he professed himself glad he had not to decide. He admitted they had many merits; but when asked if they would stand the test of time, he returned the safe answer that he did not know." Mr. Vassett may be old-fashioned and wanting in enterprise, but he is always a courteous gentleman, and an agreeable contrast, therefore, to the newer type of publisher whom Mrs. Riddell depicts further on, as the head of the brilliantly successful firm of Felton and Laplash:—

"'Hillo!' cried the great publisher, as he beheld his St. Mary Overy acquaintance, 'what wind has blown you here?'—'Your letter,' answered Barney.—'I never wrote you any letter, though I should have written to you long ago, if I had known your address.'—'Well, somebody, at any rate, sent a letter. Here it is.'—'But this is to Mr. Kelly, the author of "Street Sketches."—'I am Mr. Kelly.'—'God bless me! why, I thought he was some great swell.'—'Did you?' said Barney. He could not have prevented the blood rushing into his face at this unexpected slap, if he had died for it.—'Oh, I didn't mean any offence,' exclaimed Mr. Felton, quickly. 'What I meant was a tip-topper, regular out-and-outer, aw-awing sort of fellow. You understand, don't you?' The street you live in, though, I daresay may have given rise to the notion. You lodge there, I suppose?'—'Yes, I'm only a lodger,' answered Barney. 'Now, we'd better get to business,' suggested Mr. Felton; 'what have you to offer us, Kelly?'—Barney winced a little; he had not been prepared for such an amount of familiarity, but nevertheless answered the question with tolerable composure.—'Nothing except what has appeared before?' said Mr. Felton; 'that's bad, Zack, eh?'—Zack replying to this interrogatory with a grunt of acquiescence, Barney ventured to observe Mr. Vassett had never found that the fact of previous publication in a magazine interfered with the sale of a volume.—'Oh, Vassett!' exclaimed Mr. Felton, with lofty scorn, 'don't talk to us of Vassett; what he does, or finds, or says, or thinks is no rule for us;' at which utterance Mr. Laplash laughed a dog's laugh. 'No, no!' went on Mr. Felton, encouraged by this sign of approval, almost imperceptible though it was, 'we don't want any Vassetts held up here for our example. We've shown that good gentleman a thing or two already, and before we've done with him, we'll show him and others a thing or two more. But now to settle with you; how much do you want for the lot?' Will that do?'—'Yes, that is something nearer the mark,' replied Barney.—'Very well, then, we will send you on the agreement.'—'Thank you.'—'And "rush" one book, at all events, as soon as possible.'—'Will not that be somewhat imprudent, considering how recently a work of mine has been brought out?'—'Exploded nonsense,' commented Mr. Felton, 'there are some authors I only wish I could get a book from every week in the year.'—'The wisdom of the ages, then, seems foolishness to you?'—'I should think so, indeed. I am my own wisdom, and my own age, and my own everything; and if you can show me any other man who could have done as much as I have done out of the same material, I'll give you leave to call me what you like.'—'I only imagined I might venture to make a suggestion concerning the time of publication of my own work.'—'Then you were mistaken,' retorted the genial publisher. 'No, Sir, I allow no interference here. I bring out my books when I think I will, and I don't bring them out when I think I won't. If I once allowed that sort of thing,' he added, viciously, 'I might soon give up command of the ship.'"

Even Mr. Felton shines in contrast with his partner, who, when he becomes head of the firm, and is publishing Mrs. Lacere's successful novels, sits with his hat on to receive her, greets her by asking her if her husband has got any work yet, and goes on, "I can't speak to you to-day. Look in to-morrow;" or, "You're a nice sort of young woman. Where's the rest of that manuscript?" or, "I had your note, but it's no use asking me for any money, we ain't got none here;" or, "That last reprint of yours was a bad business for me; I wish it had been at the — before I ever was such a fool as to take it;" and all the time, while he was insulting her position, and depreciating her work, and grinding her down to the last penny, he was, as she found out afterwards, making a good income from her books, and finding her, as Mr. Butterby truly said, "the best steed in his stable." It is a satisfaction to know that this "great" publishing firm failed at last, and we may hope that nothing like it has ever arisen since; but it is a pity that we cannot quote any brighter pictures of human nature to set against these dark ones,—not that there are none such through The Struggle for Fame, but they must be read, not quoted. The charming Bohemianism, for instance, of the eminently life-like Dawton menage,—though, by the way, Will Dawton must have known London better than to think that an Atlas omnibus would take him to Paddington!—is sprinkled through nearly the whole of one volume, and so is the pathetic heroism of Mr. Lacere's married life. We could hardly expect a book from Mrs. Riddell in which the principal married couple did not somehow, with the best intentions, fail to make each other happy; why they fail in this story it is not quite easy to see, unless we accept the disparity of age and the unpleasant relations as sufficient cause; but even then it is difficult to believe that a woman like Glenarva Westley could have lived so long with her husband, and remained blind to all his real greatness. She does at length perceive that "everything in her books the world thought great and true and useful, was due to the husband who had never been able to make his mark. Without him she could have done nothing—nothing—and in return she had not half loved him as she ought;" not, perhaps, an isolated experience; but, of course, in her case it comes almost too late. Mrs. Riddell certainly does not favour the "married and lived happy ever after" style of human life; her married people are generally melancholy during the greater part of their lives, and only achieve happiness through much suffering or sin, or both; indeed even while they are enjoying brief intervals of sunshine, she has a way, which we consider rather tiresome, of stopping the story to inform us that if they had known all that was going to come upon them before long, they would never have felt as cheerful and happy as they did then,—a sort of "if you know'd who was near, I rather think you'd change your note, as the hawk remarked to himself with a cheerful laugh, when he heard the robin red-breast singing round the corner." But her characters are always human, there is much humour as well as pathos in her books, and considering that every one who has not published something is apparently dying to do so, this straightforward, unvarnished history of what The Struggle for Fame really means; who those are who succeed, and those who fail, ought to be read with keen interest by a very large and varied number of educated people.

WHAT IS LAW?*

If it were not that so many other sciences are in a like predicament, one might reasonably be excused for doubting whether there is a Science of Jurisprudence, when so large a portion of the works of its professors is taken up in discussing what the subject of the science is, and whether and in what way a science of it can exist. Here, for instance, is a book consisting of 419 octavo pages devoted entirely to the discussion of this one topic, and not arriving at any very clear or distinct conclusion, and certainly not at one which will be universally or even generally accepted on the matter, after all. It is odd that such a work should be possible, yet no one can say that it is superfluous. It is even odder in the case of Jurisprudence (or may we say Law?) than even in the case of other "moral" or human sciences. It is not odd that sociology, or by whatever other name the science of society may be known, should be still on its probation as to whether it should be admitted into the College of Sciences or not, because it is only within the last generation that it has ever presented its claims for examination. Nor, though its study has been established for a century, is it odd that political economy should still be only in the Court of the Gentiles, as it were. It offends so strongly against the prepossessions of large classes of people, and its principles have been hurried into practice with so little consideration, that people may be excused for doubting the validity of the claims of a science which seems so opposed to experience. But jurisprudence has been upheld as a science and been professed scientifically since the days of Plato and Aristotle, of Cicero and Ulpian, even unto these latter days of Bentham and Austin, of Savigny and Ihering. Yet we are still discussing what jurisprudence is, and in what the science of jurisprudence consists, if it exists at all. Why this is so, it would be long and hard to say. It is in part owing to the same causes which have retarded the formation of the "humane" sciences generally,—the complexity and wealth of the facts on which the science must be based, and the continually pressing necessity of practising law as an art, whether its scientific principles are settled or not. It is also in part owing to the ambition of its professors, who till quite lately have shown a tendency to exalt it to the skies, with the result of making it cloudy and misty, instead of clear and distinct, as a science ought to be. When Ulpian, for instance, defined jurisprudence as "the knowledge of things human and divine," or Cicero said that law is "the right reason of supreme Jove," they were no doubt magnifying their office as professors of law, but they were not greatly contributing to an exact knowledge of the subject of their profession. Nor was the science advanced by the unhappy discovery of a law of Nature, which was to be the pattern to which jurisprudence was to make law conform, and the touchstone by which it was to be tested; and though some advance was made when utility was substituted for the law of nature, yet no definite science of law was possible until the metaphysical treatment was discarded, and the province of law fenced off from the neighbouring kingdoms of theology, morals, and politics. This was done, or this was rendered possible, by Austin.

But unhappily, Austin's style, or rather the style in which alone Austin was revealed to the public, was repulsive to the last degree, and the science of law has suffered from the faults of its expositor, and has been regarded till quite lately as a dreary and repulsive study. For the same reason, the knowledge of Austin has apparently not extended beyond the circle of those who speak the English tongue. The Germans, consequently, are "sadly to seek" in the science of law, and are still wandering in the mazes of metaphysical jurisprudence, instead of helping to macadamise the new road of scientific law. Moreover, even in his own country, the prophet of law has not been wholly accepted. His method was analytical, and he disregarded history. Hence his main thesis has been impugned from the historical point of view, and it has been pointed out that his definition of law is applicable only to communities such as those of the modern civilised world and ancient Rome, and is not true of the greater part of the world now, or of any part of the world before the era of the Roman jurists. The work before us, while apparently intended to enforce the objections to the Austinian theory from the point of view of the Germans and of the historical school, does yet confirm and bring into relief its intrinsic accuracy. The points at issue may be put shortly enough. Austin said in effect that there are two marks by which you may know law proper, or "positive law," from laws "falsely so called," such as the "law of nature," scientific laws, and moral laws. They are that the law is a command given by a political superior to an inferior, and, secondly, that obedience to the command will, if necessary, be enforced; or to speak in the now recognised terms, it is a command given by a sovereign to a subject, and under the sanction of a penalty. To this it is objected by Sir Henry Maine that the definition would exclude altogether that custom which in undeveloped communities is the only law, with which, as in the Indian village community, the sovereign has no concern, and which is really the origin of law in all communities. This objection Mr. Lightwood takes up and reiterates with considerable emphasis and ability. He also takes up the views of the German school of Savigny and others, which he exposes in an interesting and full analysis. Law is not set by a sovereign to a subject, but is the spontaneous growth of custom, deriving its origin from the people, and resting not on the sanction of force, but on its acceptance as right by the popular conscience; so that the people are both the source and the guardian of the Law, and law consists in rules of conduct voluntarily accepted as right, not imposed as of right. Legislation and judge-made and jurist-made, or, as he calls it, scientific law, though they seem to conflict with this view, are really only modes by which the popular conscience acts. In simple societies it acted directly through custom. In more complex societies it acts indirectly in modifying and recreating customs through delegates, the Sovereign, or the special professional class, accepted as representatives of the society. But a third view has been taken in Germany by Von Ihering, whose system is practically accepted by Mr. Lightwood, that Law is founded on force, and is a command resting on a sanction; but that it only becomes truly law when the force is forgotten,—when the law is accepted voluntarily, not only by the subject, but by the Sovereign, and a general habit of law-abidingness has been developed.

Though there is truth in all these views, yet it cannot be said that they really affect Austin's definition. The objections drawn from custom by Sir Henry Maine, and from the inner consciousness of Savigny, are objections to its historical, but not to its philosophical, truth. It may be perfectly true that custom is historically the source of law, but so long as it is merely custom, it simply is not law. If a village community does enforce its customs on its members, and there is either no paramount power, or the paramount power takes no cognisance of the doings of the community other than to exact tribute, then that community is practically a sovereign, and its customs are laws enforced by a sanction. If the customs are enforced with the cognisance of the paramount power, and, as Professor Holland says, "the local force must, if only for the preservation of peace, be supported in the last resort by the whole strength of the empire," then the paramount power is the Sovereign, and the custom, as under the Austinian system, is law, because and in so far as recognised by the Sovereign. If, on the other hand, the custom may be disregarded with impunity, except in so far as the breaker of it is looked on with disfavour, then the custom is not law proper, but a moral rule, or a law of fashion, or honour, or what not, as the case may be. So, too, it is perfectly true that, as the author points out, the more a law has to depend directly upon force, the less it partakes of the binding and universal character of law, and that the consent of the people is necessary to the continuance of a law. But what does that amount to? Simply to this,—that in the last resort, whatever may be the form of the constitution, the majority of the people, or the strongest section of the people, is the true sovereign; and that the force on which Law rests, even in a country like Russia, is the force of the people. In such a case, the people resumes the Sovereignty which has been taken by or delegated to some of its members, and either enforces law in its own name, or, if it does not act the Sovereign, lets all law disappear. Historically speaking, both Austin and the Germans are right. The sources of law are found both in the commands of a superior and in the self-adopted customs of the people. But in resting all law upon force ultimately, whether the force of the representative Sovereign or of the bulk of the people itself, there can be little doubt that Austin is right. A law which you are at liberty to disregard, like the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1875, is no law. A right such as that of a patentee when his patent is expired, which any one is at liberty to violate with impunity, is no legal right; a duty such as that of educating your children before the Act of 1870, which you are at liberty to disregard, if you choose, is not a legal duty. The State is just as ready to enforce the law which gives the unsettled real estate of an intestate in Gloucester to his youngest son, though it may have originated in custom, as it is to enforce the latest enlargement of the criminal offence of fraudulent bankruptcy, though in the latter case a definite sanction is stated, in the other it is not. It is sufficient for the eldest son to know that if he is deprived of his right, the posse comitatus will, if need be, assist to put him back again, even if he does not know that any one who resisted his entry might ultimately find his way, under attachment for disobedience of the order of the Court, to the same gaol as the fraudulent bankrupt. In relying on the law and the law-abidingness of the community, the owner of property knows, if he thinks of it, that he is relying on the whole force of the community.

A further point on which Mr. Lightfoot takes issue with the Austinian school, and especially with Professor Holland, is the object of jurisprudence. Professor Holland restricted it to the "observation of the wants for the supply of which laws have been invented, and the manner in which those wants have been satisfied," and "digesting those actual wants and the modes in which they have actually been satisfied according to logical principles of division." Mr. Lightfoot would extend this "formal science of positive law" which he would call "pure or general jurisprudence," to include also suggestions for the reform of the law which he would call "applied jurisprudence." General jurisprudence would observe and classify principles of law generally. Applied jurisprudence would classify a particular system of law, and endeavour to reform it. But though the reform of the law may be eminently desirable, it is surely a little unnecessary to create a new science to do it. Law reform is a matter for the statesman, after taking counsel with jurists, no doubt, but equally after taking counsel with the moralist. It is not a matter for the jurist as such, and the applied jurisprudence would be nothing less than the science of politics, how best to promote the well-being of the State.

On the whole, then, we disagree with most of the author's conclusions, and indeed, if they are accepted, the science of Jurisprudence would return again to the cloud-land from which it has so lately been rescued. Nor can we attach much value to the classification and system of jurisprudence which he promulgates at the end of his volume. It seems crude and sketchy, and tends to confound the spheres of morals and law. But there is a good deal of interest in his historical analyses of the two rival systems, and in his interesting analogy between the relations of the Church Courts and the Law Courts in England, and between the jurisdictions of the Pontifices and the Prætor at Rome. The author, indeed, seems happier in particular than in general jurisprudence. His style, too, is more calculated for the former than the latter. He has not the knack of making generalities interesting. He implies that he does not find Austin's style repulsive, a fact which may account for some of the repellent characteristics of his own. There is no reason why Law should be made a dismal science, and if the School of Jurisprudence which the author wishes for is ever established, it is to be hoped that it will cultivate the graces of style, as well as clearness of thought.

SIR FREDERICK ROBERTS.*

GENERAL ROBERTS is one of the few living Englishmen who have commanded an army of more than ten thousand men in the field; and, if the question were asked by some Continental critic as to who were our Generals, the reply that would rise naturally to the lips would be the names of Sir Frederick Roberts and Lord Wolseley. There are many very evident objections to the writing of a biography during the life of its subject, and the more carefully we consider them, the more force do we find them to possess, and the greater regret do we feel in the frequent departure from the old rule that a man's acts and career were not summed up and recorded until he had gone over to the majority. But as Mr. Low had published a memoir of Lord Wolseley, we suppose he felt bound to perform the same service for his brother-in-arms, General Roberts; and although the work would have benefited from judicious compression, it will be allowed that he has written an interesting volume enough of several campaigns in which General Roberts took always an honourable, and latterly a prominent part. We may give Mr. Low's opening lines, as introductory to his subject:—

"A memoir of an officer, of whose principal achievement, the march from Cabul to Candahar, German military critics declare that it is the most brilliant performance of a British army since Waterloo, and which a distinguished officer, who had served throughout Lord Strathnairn's victorious campaign in Central India, declared to us was, in his estimation, the finest exploit achieved by our arms since Sir Charles Napier's conquest of Scinde—the memoir of such a soldier cannot be without interest, not only to men of his own cloth, but to the British public, which reads with avidity biographies of its military heroes."

General Roberts is the son of an excellent and distinguished Anglo-Indian officer—the late Sir Abraham Roberts—whose advice, if it had only been taken at the time, would in all probability have averted the catastrophe at Cabul in the winter of 1841-2. The subject of this memoir was his only son by a second marriage, and he was born at Cawnpore on September 30th, 1832. In the early part of 1852, when he was less than twenty, he sailed for India to join his regiment, the Bengal Artillery, to which he had been gazetted as second lieutenant. His apprenticeship in arms began with a piece of that good-luck which never abandoned him. His father was in command of the Division at Peshawur, and the young lieutenant was at once appointed to his staff. When the Mutiny came Roberts joined the movable column sent by John Lawrence's energy to Delhi, and more than one story is told of his hair-breadth escapes while serving the batteries against that city. If the siege and capture of the old Mogul capital made him known to his superiors as "an active and gallant officer," the later stages of the Mutiny brought him increased fame. During the operations before Lucknow, when Sir Colin left Outram in possession of the Alambagh, and also during the fighting round Cawnpore after Windham's reverse, Roberts greatly distinguished himself on Hope Grant's staff. It was during the pursuit of the scattered fragments of this rebel army, which, constantly reinforced, renewed the offensive on numerous occasions, that he performed the act which gained for him the much-coveted distinction of the Victoria Cross. Mr. Low describes the incident as follows:—

"While following up the retreating enemy with the ardour of a fox-hunter across country, Lieutenant Roberts saw two sepoys making off with a standard. Putting spurs to his horse, he overtook them just as they were about to enter the village, and made for them sword in hand. They immediately turned at bay and presented their muskets at him. It was a critical moment, as one of them pulled the trigger, but a merciful Providence had preserved the young officer to render priceless services to his country, and add a glorious page to her history. The cap snapped almost in Roberts's face, and, the next moment, he laid the Sepoy carrying the standard dead at his feet by a tremendous cut across the head, and seized the trophy as it fell from his lifeless grasp. Meantime, the companion of the standard-bearer made off into the village. But this was not the only exploit performed by Lieutenant Roberts on this 2nd of January. Following up the rebels, he came up with a group, consisting of a Sikh sowar and a rebel Sepoy standing at bay with musket and bayonet. The cavalryman with his sword felt himself no match for the foot-soldier armed with what Napier called 'the queen of weapons,' but Roberts, on arriving on the scene, did not wait to count the odds, if they were against him, but rode straight at the Sepoy, and with one stroke of his sword slashed him across the face, killing him on the spot."

Roberts's part in the Indian Mutiny terminated soon after the recapture of Lucknow, through his being compelled to return to England by ill-health. It is a coincidence that he was succeeded in his post on the staff by Lord Wolseley. On his return, after only twelve months' holiday, he resumed that active work in the administration of the Army which made him as favourably known at Head-quarters for his attention to official duties as for his activity during a campaign. In 1863 he was sent on a special mission to Sir Neville Chamberlain's camp, and witnessed the closing scenes of the Sittana campaign, when the fanaticism of a band of mountaineers and Hindoo zealots seemed for a time to be more than a match for the discipline of an English force of several thousands. He accompanied the troops when they attacked the village and heights of Laloo, and he was present at the destruction of the village of Mulkah, a week later, by the chiefs of Bonair. Major Roberts next took a prominent part in the organisation of the expedition to Abyssinia. Again he returned to India, in a high administrative capacity, and again his luck sent him the preferable alternative of active service in the field. A punitive expedition was sent against the Looshai tribes, on the eastern frontier of India, and to Colonel Roberts was entrusted, as chief of the staff, the task of organising it. Of all the many frontier wars and expeditions in which we have been engaged during our rule in India, none was as well arranged and provided for as the little war with the Looshais, and it still serves as a model for imitation in such matters. Some interesting traits of human nature were obtained and recorded during the operations against these wild men of the thick forests beyond Cachar and Manipore. Among them may be mentioned the practice of carrying off their dead, because, "according to a superstition prevalent among them, the man who loses his head in battle becomes the slave of the victor in the next world." Another instance was the effect produced upon them by music, as, "when after dinner the officers in turn favoured the company with a song, the auditory included the fierce children of the forest, who stopped firing when each song commenced, and resumed it on its conclusion." General Roberts received as his reward the post of Quartermaster-General, and in 1877 he was appointed to the command of the Punjab Irregular Force. He

However much divided opinions are likely to remain as to the policy and necessity of that war, there will be agreement on the point that it enabled the subject of this memoir to make a reputation as a soldier second to none of his English contemporaries. The operations entrusted to him in the Khurum Valley during the first campaign promised to place him in a position of minor importance, for no one believed at the time in the feasibility of the so-called short route to Cabul over the Shutargurda; yet, in a way almost marvellous, he managed to rivet public attention on his movements, and such interest as the Afghan Campaign of 1878-9 excites centres round his battle of the Peiwar, and his later expedition into Khost. When the Treaty of Gandamak was signed, it was admitted on all hands, by the captious critics who had seen danger in his intrepidity not less heartily than by enthusiastic friends, that General Roberts had carried off the honours of the war. Three months later, on the arrival of the terrible news of the massacre of Sir Louis Cavagnari and his companions in the Afghan capital, the choice of the commander to lead an expedition to occupy Cabul naturally fell on the officer who had shown the most daring and enterprise in the previous war, and "the hero of the Afghan war," as the Viceroy called him, hastened from his seat on the Army Commission at Simla to place himself at the head of the troops rapidly assembling in the Khurum Valley. It is unnecessary to recall the principal incidents of the occupation of Cabul, as they are well remembered; nor will the sudden arrest of the progress of our arms, and the retirement into Sherpur, easily pass into oblivion. General Roberts had very unjustly been set down up to this as a reckless and impulsive officer; but nothing could have been more deliberate or better timed than his resolve to concentrate his army in the great barrack fortress erected by Shere Ali outside Cabul. His men were exhausted by constant and harassing fighting with the fanatical warriors devoted to Mahommed Jan, and there is nothing improbable in supposing that a persistence in attacking might have resulted in a signal disaster. General Roberts showed that he possessed a soldier's eye, by taking in the situation at a glance. The retirement under cover not merely enabled his soldiers to recover from their exhaustion, but it blunted the edge of Afghan fury. When Mahommed Jan delivered his assault on the entrenchments, not only had the courage and confidence of the English revived, but the Afghans had suffered from the loss of the impetuosity which made them most formidable. The Sherpur incident showed conclusively that General Roberts possessed the instinct of caution, in which he was thought to be most deficient.

Just as the Cavagnari massacre recalled General Roberts to Afghanistan, so did the tidings of the defeat at Maiwand compel a further stay in the country then on the eve of being evacuated. It was resolved to send a strong division under the command of General Roberts to attack Ayooob's victorious force outside Candahar, and with ten thousand picked troops he marched across a great portion of Afghanistan, relieved the beleaguered garrison of Candahar, and inflicted a crushing defeat on the Afghan forces encamped in a strong position north of that city. The whole execution of the enterprise was as near perfection as it is possible for anything human to be; and there are very few episodes that stand out so clearly or with such dramatic completeness in the whole of our military history. This achievement placed the crowning touch on the fame of General Roberts; but, as Mr. Low has no new information to impart, we will not attempt to describe over again what was already known on the subject. We cannot conclude this brief notice of an interesting volume better than by quoting Mr. Low's closing criticism on the subject of the Afghan campaigns:—

"Our experience of Afghanistan has been of a varied character; and, indeed, the country may be said to be the grave of many military reputations. The names of Elphinstone and Shelton call up memories other than glorious to British arms; and the only consolatory feature in a retrospect of the disasters associated with their names is that every Englishman displayed personal gallantry under trying circumstances. Equally has the name, Afghanistan, been associated in our annals with glorious memories of honour retrieved, and defeat wiped out by victory. Nott, Sale, and Pollock—the last, a brother-officer of Roberts, reposes in Westminster Abbey—are names which Englishmen must ever hold in respect as those of soldiers who restored our prestige,—that impalpable but essential attribute of our sovereignty in the East, without which our tenure of India would be quickly challenged by our subject races. To these great names those of Roberts and Stewart must hereafter be added, the march of the latter being in the footsteps of Nott, and his victory at Ahmed Khel one of which any soldier might be proud. Roberts's victory at Charasia and dispersal of Mahomed Jan's forces at Sherpur may likewise be likened to Pollock's action at Tezeen and Sale's defeat of Akbar Khan at Jellalabad. But the forced march from Cabul to Candahar, with the swiftly-following reconnaissance and victory of September 1st, remain without parallel in the record of our relations with Afghanistan, and place the name of Roberts first among the soldiers who have led the British armies in that region."

SOME OF THE MAGAZINES.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON's Address to the Trades' Union Congress, delivered at Nottingham on September 12th, and on which we have already commented, is reprinted in the Contemporary Review. A double-barrelled paper on "The Bengal Tenancy Bill" puts the question which the proposed measure raises from opposite points of view; the "for" by Miss Nightingale, the "against" by Mr. Dacosta. The lady's statement of the facts of the case and the provisions of the Bill is admirably clear and comprehensive; the gentleman confines himself to the main features of the former, and the chief provisions of the latter, and each arrives at a totally opposite conclusion with reference to the justice, utility, and probable effect of the proposed measure upon the people and the Government. Mr. Dacosta believes that the carrying of the Tenancy Bill would do all those terrible things in Bengal that the Tories, now that their literary faculties are at least half awake, persistently prophesy for England as the result of Liberal legislation, and would in particular "check progress in the work of civilisation which has so successfully been carried on in Bengal for three-quarters of a century." Miss Nightingale concludes as follows:—"The English statesman seeks to conceive and carry out a work of even-handed justice. Let us see that the work be not left half done. Let us see that this great reproach be taken from us. It has been hanging over us for ninety years. As a matter of policy, and for policy's sake, this must be done, and done quickly; for the sake of morality, of humanity, for the sake of right, it must be done, and done well." We have two good examples of opportunism in the Contemporary, which has been sluggish of late. Mr. Proctor's very interesting paper on "Earth Movements in Java" contains an awful account of the eruption of Galunggung last year, an event of which we do not remember to have received any very distinct impression at the time, but by which an entire province was devastated, by hot water and mud, in two hours. Mr. Proctor places before the imagination of his readers a wonderful picture of the earth as it would be if her vulcanian energies were extinct; but he argues from their action that "such disturbances as the recent earthquakes, while disastrous in their effects to those living near the shaken regions, assure us that, as yet, the earth is not near death. She is still full of vitality. Hundreds of thousands of years will still pass before even the beginning of the end is seen in the steady disintegration and removal of the land, without renovation or renewal by the action of subterranean forces." Mr. Heath's "Rise and Fall of Amsterdam" is a singularly interesting and well-written paper, full of information and of suggestions that might well give pause to the Mammon-worshipping city that has so far and so long belied the ancient traditions of Groote Gods Huisland. Mr. Archibald Forbes gossips not to much advantage in "Some Social Characteristics of Australia." Criticism of Richardson has been overdone; nevertheless, Mr. Traill's paper on the honest old tradesman's views of naughtiness in high life is very interesting. Now, we hope, we shall hear no more of Clarissa and Pamela, and Sir Charles Grandison; but of course, we wish a distinguished place in every gentleman's library to the new edition of the tiresomest novels that ever were written.

"Somewhat too much of this!" is the sentiment with which we observe an article on "Mr. Irving's Interpretations of Shakespeare," among the contents of the Fortnightly. Are we not running through our capital rather recklessly, in this instance? It is to be hoped that Mr. Irving has many famous years before him, but unless he unearths a few dramatists, and produces a fresh repertory (and there is no sign of his doing either), there will soon be nothing left to say about him. Already the Irvingite literature is treading on the heels of the Shakespearian, and the great actor must, we should think, find himself in the mental attitude of the little woman who had her petticoats curtailed by a pedlar "whose name it was Stout." It is rash to intrude upon the musings of genius, but if Mr. Irving does not sometimes say, "Goodness gracious, bless my soul, sure this is not I!" he must be the most remarkable man in this country, or even in that he is going to. To be sure, a vast amount of the so-called criticism lavished upon Mr. Irving has its origin in the eagerness of certain littérateurs to make the world understand that they are the only people who really know what Shakespeare meant, and that they are, on the whole, cleverer fellows; but the ostensible object of these torrents of analytical gush can hardly be expected to admit this consideration for quite all it is worth. Suppose a truce could be declared for the year of relâche at the Lyceum, and Mr. Irving be let alone while he is in America! It would be so pleasant for all parties. Mr. Edward Russell is enthusiastic in his praise of Mr. Irving's acting in Bells, and we agree with him as to its general excellence. Neither Mr. Russell nor any other critic, so far as we know, has hit the blot of the play, i.e., the entire perversion of the author's idea, by the introduction of the vulgar device of the apparition. The true test of the actor's genius would have been absolute adherence to the purpose of Le Juif Polonais; and surely Mr. Irving could have stood that test. Any mere murderer might be frightened by the ghost of his victim and the presentment of his crime; the Erckmann-Chatrian conception was a perfect one; on the stage of the Lyceum it is maimed and spoiled. Again, why has the blunder in the name of the burgomaster not been detected and remedied? The original name is "Mathis," a familiar Christian name in Alsace; while "Mathias" is a totally different, and distinctively Jewish appellation, so that it is even more inappropriate in the instance of the Alsatian burgomaster of the Erckmann-Chatrian play than it would be in an ordinary case. "Why Have a Hangman?" asks Major Arthur Griffiths, and argues that we can find in our prisons "respectable and trustworthy individuals" competent to carry out capital sentences. Very likely, but suppose those respectable and trustworthy individuals do not like to hang people, are they to be made to do it as a part of their regular duties? If so, it had better be largely considered in their wages. We regret to find M. Leroy-Beaulieu contending for the present attitude of France in her foreign policy, and maintaining that the colonial enterprises of his country are commendable in the present and justified by the past. Lady Gregory's pleasant account of "A Tour through Portugal" agreeably supplements Mr. Oswald Crawford's charming monograph of that little known country. For the rest, with the exception of Mr. Swinburne's hysterics over Victor Hugo's "Légende des Siècles," the Fortnightly is excellent.

Macmillan is excessively, we must say unpardonably, dull, even for October. A dreary essay on corporal punishment in schools, to prove the undisputed proposition that it is not the interest of school teachers to be brutal, and a school-boyish theme on the subject of "Genius," one which really might be allowed to slumber with the New Zealander or the literary Tories, combine to render the number rather hard reading.

We regret to be unable to record any check in the falling-off of the Cornhill. Mr. Anstey's serial story, "The Giant's Robe," is not interesting; and its main motive, the appropriation by the hero of a friend's novel, and his passing it off for his own, is not original. Mr. Follett-Syngé's novel, "Tom Singleton," is founded on a similar incident; and it has also been dramatised by the latter author, in a piece called Self. A pleasant little memoir of Mrs. Opie, very sympathetically written, is the only paper of value this time.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Reminiscences of an Adventurous Career at Home and the Antipodes. By Alexander Tolmer. 2 vols. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Tolmer tells the story of his life from his birth down to 1853 in two volumes, which may be calculated to contain about three of the ordinary three-volume novels. On the Australian continent, books appear, we believe, at the rate of about fifty a year, and a few hundred pages in excess are but of small account, when readers have a leisure so ample. Here, where fifty come out in the week, it is a serious matter. The excessive length of these volumes is the more injudicious, as Mr. Tolmer wants to call attention to his own grievances. These are some thirty years old, and we doubt whether any book would do much to redress them; but if any, it must be something terse and telling. The best part of these reminiscences is that which concerns the author's services in the British Legion that fought for Donna Maria of Portugal. This contains some really amusing anecdotes,—the story, for instance, how Mr. Tolmer and his comrades, being then besieged in Oporto, ingeniously contrived to turn an honest penny at the expense of the enemy. They used to provoke a cannonade from the enemy, by venturing into a cabbage field which was within the range of fire. They got the cabbages, which under the circumstances were very useful, dodged the cannon-balls, and further improved their rations by selling them for ninepence apiece, to be returned from the town batteries. Nobody, it seems, was ever hurt at this pleasant little game. But before we get half through the first volume, we are taken to Australia, and find the story become distinctly tedious. Yet there are even here some things which, were they picked out of the mass, might well be worth telling. Of Mr. Tolmer's case we cannot pretend to judge. We can but mention that he states it at length in his second volume, and prints the official documents which concern it.

Selections from the Writings of Archbishop Leighton. Edited, with a Memoir and Notes, by William Blair, D.D. (Macniven and Wallace.)—This very elegant-looking little volume belongs to a series (with which we make acquaintance for the first time) called "Evangelical Classics." The memoir seems to us excellent. Leighton's position, a prelate in a Church which had as little hold upon the nation as ever a Church supposed to be dominant had, was a very difficult one; Dr. Blair does not, of course, regard it with sympathy; but he is fully appreciative of the man, without, however, closing his eyes to the mistakes which he made. The extracts comprise three sermons, selections from the commentary on I. Peter, and portions of lectures, charges, and letters. Leighton published nothing in his lifetime.

Pen and Pencil Sketches. By W. H. Florio Hutchisson (George Trigger). Edited by Rev. John Wilson. (Sampson Low and Co.)—This volume is made up of the recollections and experiences of Mr. Hutchisson in India, and is divided between political and social matters and sport. Some part of the former portion is obsolete. It refers to the days of the Company, which we are told is "allowed to raise and recruit in Great Britain and Ireland two European regiments," &c., and this without any comment from the editor. This gentleman has Indian experience of his own—if we may judge from his decided views on Indian spelling—and it was his business to point out any matters in which time had made his author obsolete. The sporting papers will probably be read with pleasure by the public to which they appeal.

Red Riding Hood. By Fanny E. Millett Notley. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—This is a story about Nihilism, which seems likely to become a favourite subject for the writers of fiction. Novelty, of course, is desirable, and novelty daily becomes more and more difficult of attainment. But surely Nihilism suggests a very obvious difficulty. The drawing-rooms of duchesses are more or less accessible, and anybody who can pay for the price of a pint of beer may enter a tap-room; even when it is inconvenient to be present in person, it is not difficult to evolve out of one's consciousness what is said and done in such places. But who knows what goes on in the secret councils which doom emperors to death? There is an inclination to rebel, not so much at the imaginary, but at what we know must be imaginary. There has, however, been no great effort of imagination made in this part of Red Riding Hood. The hero has broken with his associates, and is doomed, according to custom, to die; the doom, however, is not executed. A minor character is, it is true, poisoned by the agents of the society, but the great catastrophe of the drama is brought about by private vengeance. The story is somewhat slow in its movement in its earlier part. There is far too much fine-writing, for a book which is meant, we suppose, to depend for its chief interest upon incident. Here is a specimen of what has been said before, and said better:—

"The young oling passionately to hope, and as they press forward to their desire, they fling the hours from them impatiently, they count the days heavy and slow; they would fain tread them down beneath their eager feet, forgetting that these are portions of their inheritance, their share of time; and each day falls into its place in that strange mosaic pattern they are weaving, upon which they will look back in age and say, in wonder and sorrow, 'That was my life.'"

In the third volume there is a manifest improvement. The action is vigorous, and the plot well contrived. Is not this, by the way, a new arrangement of familiar words?—

"Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?"

The British Navy: its Strength, Resources, and Administration. By Sir Thomas Brassey, M.P. Vol. IV. (Longmans.)—Sir Thomas Brassey completes in this volume his work on the British Navy with a number of miscellaneous papers, Parliamentary speeches, letters, addresses, &c., to which, in some cases, additions have been made.

The subjects are dockyards, reserves, training, and pensions. We have in these six hundred pages a vast mass of facts, for which we should have been more thankful if they had been given with more arrangement. As it is, they form a vast labyrinth, to which the index is scarcely an unfailing clue. One of these facts, of a more consolatory sort than Navy facts commonly are, we may quote:—"The repairs of iron ships are very much less costly than those of wooden ships; and the proportion of their cost seems to be diminishing. In eight years, the annual cost of repairs to the 'Warrior' was one twenty-fifth of the original cost, in the case of the 'Bellerophon' it was one thirty-third part, in the 'Invincible' class one-eightieth."

POETRY.—The Son of Shelomith. By L. M. Thornton. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Shelomith is a Hebrew woman, married to an Egyptian prince, who perishes in the overthrow in the Red Sea. Her son is the hero of this drama. His courage, wisdom, loftiness of soul, and purity of purpose stand out in striking contrast to the fickleness, turbulence, and meanness of the Israelites in whose camp he is a sojourner. To point this contrast, and generally, to put the matter quite plainly, to make the reader realise that the worship of Jehovah was a cruel and degrading superstition, seems to have been one of the "motives of his own taste and convenience" which actuated the author in composing this drama. There can be no mistaking the purpose of the following:—

"Thine be the glory, Lord!
Thine is the high command,
Thine, not ours, the slanting sword
And the red and ruthless hand.
For human hearts are frail and weak
And flinch with pity and faint with toil,
The hand would scanty vengeance wreak,
The eye be sick at the curdled soil,
Were not the fire of Thy wrath
A lamp in our terrible path,
Did not the might of Thy word alway
Kindle the soft and rouse the slow
To smite by night, and smite by day,
And spurn the pang of the dying foe."

The controversy is an old one which we do not care to renew; but it is a fatal mistake to make it the motive of a work of art. Mr. Thornton's choral odes are not of high quality; the extract given represents them fairly well. The blank verse rises to a higher level. It is modulated with skill, and not unfrequently reaches a force and dignity worthy of its subject. The dedication to the drama is written in Latin hexameters, a metre in which Mr. Thornton certainly does not excel. The last line, e.g., where we look for something very noble in sound, is sadly weak:—

"Oculum esse, esse diem, solique ignes et alaudam."

"Abdita lumine nostro" can hardly mean, as it should, "hidden from our eyes;" and "renovable" is not a Latin word.—The More Excellent Way. (Macmillan.)—The speaker in this poem utters a long soliloquy, in which he meditates on the problems of existence. The soliloquy is interrupted by a vision, and the vision, again, is interpreted by an angel whose teaching is summed up in the stanza:—

"But, as I said, I spoke not of my creed;
The vision that appeared to thee said not 'Believe'; but 'Do'; and in this word I read
That blessed faith is not to be my lot,
But only the salvation to be got
By charity—salvation from the hell
Of Thought's consuming fire; and therefore what
The vision taught thee I was sent to tell,
And now, my son, adjure thee to obey. Farewell."

And on this advice the speaker acts. All this is put in the most difficult metrical form which a young versifier's ambition can attempt, the Spenserian stanza. The author of this volume is manifestly unable to manage it. If our readers wish to be satisfied of this, let them take another stanza:—

"O Death, beneath this lonely moon-lit sky,
The thought of thee lets loose an agony:
Thou mystery within a mystery,
The darkness of the dark infinity
I darkened darker by thy darkness; thy Terror to spirit broods upon the deep,
And shades the shadows of uncertainty
Beneath the shadow of thy wings, that sweep
Me to the awful certainty of unknown sleep."

If the necessary rhymes cannot be made out except by such violent dislocations as those which we have italicised, surely it were better to try something simpler. The thought of the poem does not seem to us to rise above the ordinary level of prose.—Summer Dreams. By Henry Rose. (W. Isbister.)—Mr. Rose has a certain gift for description of nature. Some of his landscapes and foregrounds in the series of poems which follows the prelude of "The Mill" are executed with feeling and skill. But his metrical power is deficient; and we cannot make out that in his tales or his reflections he has anything very striking to say.—The Lay of the Lady Ida: and other Poems. By J. J. Britton. (Remington.)—Mr. Britton has studied Mr. Tennyson's verse with much care, we should say, and not without some good result. Here is a sample:—

"The fountains in the court
Leapt up from marble bowls to greet the sun
And, at their height, paused, broke, and breaking, fell
Like to a life's high yearnings and their fall:
A peacock on the broad smooth terrace steps
Spread proudly all his wealth of gold and green:
Pages were loitering in a corner's shade
Chatting belike of kisses lately snatched

From waiting women of the princess' train,
And last, the princess' self, encircled round
With some of these, came over the smooth eward, Paused by the fountains, entered then the house.
'She comes' the painter thought, 'and always takes
This road, the longest, to her inmost bower,
Some hope in that—small hope, if such it be.
Yet, what am I to have so much? peace, peace.'
Then, as the sliken rustle filled the door,
He bent his lowest, courtliest bow."

The resemblance in lines three and four to "And like a broken purpose waste in air," is a little too marked. But Mr. Britton has much yet to learn from his master, whom he certainly will not find using such a pause as this:—

"And in the day a fascination draws Me ever to that gallery."

The story is of a painter who loves a maiden of a princely house, and when doomed to die for his presumption is found to be himself the long-missing heir. It is told with some skill and command of language. The long ballad poem, too, "Bertha," shows considerable power of execution. Mr. Britton makes progress in his art; and if he will remember that he has as yet got but a little way, he may yet do well.

NOVELS.—Squire Lisle's Bequest. By Annie Beale. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—There is a considerable element of romance in Miss Beale's story, and it is a kind of romance which is pretty sure to attract the interest of readers. Most of us have had day-dreams, at some time or other, of coming into great inheritances. The incident, too, has the advantage of corresponding more than many romantic incidents do to real facts. We hear very often of poor people suddenly lifted up to heights of prosperity—commonly, it is to be feared, very much to their injury—by unexpected bequests or regular devolution of the property of intestates. Miss Beale introduces into her story a missing heir, and does it with a fairly satisfactory skill, though the experienced reader will be, perhaps, too well prepared for the dénouement. Still, the tale is interesting. It has, too, other attractions. The character of Aveline is uncommonly pleasing. A sweeter picture of a girl we have seldom seen. The French retired teacher, too, is excellently drawn, though we may remark that he must have been exceptionally fortunate in having his property restored to him by the French Government. This, we fancy, has been a very uncommon experience. Praise, too, must be given to the drawing of the characters of the four sisters. Their resemblances and their differences are marked with a skill that is nothing less than subtle. We much admire the tact with which Miss Beale has worked out the development, which a nature substantially the same in these four women, a nature petty and narrow, but not radically evil, receives under the various circumstances under which they are placed. We cannot but remark on the strange liberties which Miss Beale, whose literary experience really ought to keep her from such doings, takes with the English language. A woman is said to be "accredited drowned," instead of "believed to have been drowned." We read, when something becomes known, that it "evolved." A witness who confirms the statements of another is said to "invalidate" them.—The Waters of Marah. By John Hill. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—Mr. Hill makes his story out of one of what may be called the cross-purposes of life. Caspar Rosenfeld has a father who is a swindling usurer, and a sister who is an unprincipled adventuress, and he falls in love with a very beautiful young woman, who is already engaged to a very commonplace lover. Caspar is already cynical when we first meet with him, and the progress of events does not tend to reconcile him with life and human nature. The story of his unhappy love is the chief thread in the plot. There are other threads, very loosely connected with it. We hear about Mr. Claudius Faringdon, a selfish roué, and Mr. Malcolm Faringdon, the lover aforesaid; how the former sank the greater part of his property in an annuity, to the detriment of his heir, and how the latter fell into the hands of the money-lenders. Then there is the young fellow who acts as a sort of chorus to the drama, Charlie Deane; and he also has a love, which comes to a happier result. There is a certain cleverness in the writing, though the story is but indifferently constructed, and, to our mind, even tiresome. Mr. Hill has, we should say, some knowledge of books, and can quote appropriately on occasion.—Colonel and Mrs. Revel. By Laslett Lyle. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—The most noticeable thing about this novel is that the bicycle appears in it, for the first time to our knowledge, in fiction. Colonel Revel—we fancy that not many colonels ride on bicycles, as the riding is a recent accomplishment, and can scarcely be acquired at the average age of colonels—meets with a serious accident, and is helped by Gladys, the heroine. The two say to each other not more than the occasion requires. She brings the wounded man water, and gets his flask out of his pocket. Then the doctor arrives, and drives his patient off to the surgery. But behold the result. "Gladys awoke on the following morning in love." Surely this is a little hasty. Even in the tropics such instantaneous love would be a little surprising. In these colder latitudes it looks like insanity. Then follows a marriage, which turns out as might be expected. Altogether, this is a dismal story, not redeemed, as far as we can see, by any power of thought or of literary expression.—Was it Worth the Cost? By Mrs. Eiloart. (White).—This is a healthy and unpretentious, and therefore a commendable and tolerably successful novel. Mrs. Eiloart places her chief scenes in a cathedral town, to which she gives the name of Carminster. But she very wisely does not compete with the late Mr. Anthony Trollope as a painter of clerical "types." She contents herself with letting us have glimpses of the circles in which move an honest ex-Quaker of a draper, and a dishonest, Jewish-looking (no doubt, he is dishonest because he is Jewish-looking) ironmonger. Honest Mount's pretty, but rather weak daughter, Nellie, and dishonest Keightley's perfect paragon of a son, Arthur, fall in love with each other in a railway-carriage, while the one is reading the Queen, and the other the Spectator. Misfortune falls on Mount, something worse than misfortune on Keightley. The gallant Arthur, now engaged to Nellie, puts his shoulder to the wheel, gives up a promising career as a barrister, and takes to his father's "shop." But Nellie has not courage to marry him and "live above the shop." Rather she prefers a naughty baronet, who has conceived a genuine passion for her. But Sir Brooke Cornill is a very naughty baronet indeed, for he has not only run away with another man's wife, but when that other dies does not marry his widow. Arthur Keightley furnishes Mount with proofs of Cornill's villainy on Nellie's marriage-day, and, of course, there is no marriage. Nellie quickly repents, and gradually gains in strength of character; the good genius of the story, Georgie Wade, although in love with Arthur herself, tenders her good services, and,—but we shall say no more. The naughty baronet is not a success; he and his wickedness are, indeed, but shadows. Mrs. Pounsford, Nellie's aunt, and the marplot of the story, are very well drawn, and so are the members of the Mount and Keightley households. Mrs. Eiloart has written worse novels than Was it Worth the Cost? She may write better, but hardly in a "line" better suited to her.

(Elliot Stock).—The Creed of a Modern Agnostic, by Richard Bethell, B.Sc. (Routledge), from which we may quote a sentence:—"The designs, intentions, hopes, and moral judgments of mankind are daily and hourly traversed, and thwarted, if not subverted, by the operations of those laws which have their origin in that great Creative Power which our faith can trust, but which our intellect can never know." Such agnosticism is better than some dogmatism.—The Pedigree of the Devil, by Frederic T. Hall (Trübner), is a learned effort to trace to early ideas and beliefs, and to innate or, in any case, common ideas in the human mind the belief in a great power of Spiritual Evil.—The Mystery of Being; or, What Do We Know? By J. DELHI MEDICAL MISSION (S.P.G.)—Established 1867.

—The First Female Medical Mission begun in India. The Delhi and South Punjab Mission of the S.P.G. carries on its work among over 3,000,000 of people, and besides Delhi and its suburbs, occupies fifty towns and villages. Its work is carried on,—(1) By training native agents. (2) By philanthropical agencies, of which the most important is medical work among women and children. (3) By day and night schools for boys and young men, with 1,535 pupils. (4) By zananah missions, with 792 pupils. (5) By dividing the city and country into districts, giving each a systematic parochial organisation, for both Christians and non-Christians. The Medical Mission attended 19,983 cases, with an average of 121 sick attended daily. Owing to the growth of the work, the Missionaries are responsible for raising £1,500 a year, over and above annual grants from the Society and Government.

Subscriptions for the general work, or for the Medical Mission in particular, will be gladly received and acknowledged by the Rev. Canon CROWFOOT, Minister Yard, Lincoln; by the Rev. R. B. WINTER (Delhi); or by Rev. W. C. BROMHEAD, Kensington Palace, W.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Spanish incident in Paris is not yet closed. A good deal of needless mystery is kept up, but, according to the best accounts, the Spanish Government demanded that an official report of M. Grévy's apology should be published in the Journal Officiel. The French Government, in reply, published a Note, stating that the report in the "Havas Intelligence" was correct—which it was not—but refused to do anything further. The Spanish Ministry, which has for some time been divided in opinion, thereupon resigned, and will be succeeded by one much more Liberal, which will, it is understood, withdraw the Embassy from Paris. The two countries, therefore, will be formally at variance, probably for months, because M. Challemel-Lacour cannot bring himself to repeat formally what has already been informally said. M. Grévy, it is believed, is entirely opposed to this policy, as he is to all foreign expeditions; but he has accepted General Camponon as Minister at War, and the Cabinet is, therefore, in the hands of Gambettists, who hold the Premiership, the Foreign Office, the War Ministry, and the Department of the Interior. It remains to be seen whether they have a majority in the Chamber.

The Gambettists rely upon the support of the Extreme Left, which in Paris has become to a high degree Chauvinist. M. Rochefort is for making no apology at all, and even M. Clémenceau, in La Justice, says enough has been done,—that General Thibaudin ought not to have been dismissed, and that if the Powers wish France to respect them, they must respect her. All this is very foolish, as is also the breaking-off of negotiations with China. They have ceased, and the French Government issues reports of victories in Tonquin, which, however, amount only to this. M. Harmand, the Civil Commissioner, finding, as is officially admitted, that his troops could not move, "from the state of the roads," bought off some of the Black Flags, or Tonquinese Franch-tireurs, who accordingly dispersed. The road is therefore clear to Sontay, and the French think that when the reinforcements arrive and occupy that station, the Cabinet of Peking will be intimidated. They do not in the least understand the patient policy of China, or the impossibility that the Government of the Empress-Mother should surrender Tonquin to anything but superior force. The dynasty would not be safe. In this matter, again, much, if not all, depends upon the Chamber, which meets on the 22nd.

If it be a success to make Irishmen hate one another, Sir S. Northcote's tour in Ulster has been a great success. He has said very little, except that the Union must be maintained; but he has enabled all Orangemen and a great many Catholics to show that they are as ready for civil war as ever. A great many Englishmen, including some Liberals, hold that to be a healthy position of affairs, because, they say, while Ireland is divided secession is impossible. Secession is impossible anyhow, without British consent, as all Home-rulers, even the wildest, admit, and we believe the idea of deriving benefit from Irish divisions is as inaccurate as immoral. In the first place, the quarrel between North and South makes the proposal of any modus vivendi between Britain and Ireland impossible; and in the second place, the hatred of the south towards England is mainly caused by the attitude of the north. It is because Catholic Ireland confuses England as she is with her old vanguard, the Orange party, that she hates England so hard. The division, moreover, makes Ireland unreasonable to a needless degree, the southerners losing the whole benefit of the northerners' grip of facts, and the northerners the whole advantage of the southerners' perception of what the majority want. If Irishmen could only pull together, there must come reason into their councils, and it is reason that is wanted. We could compromise with Scotland, if Scotchmen all hated us as their forefathers did.

Most men, in these dull times, will read the speech of the Marquis of Waterford, who followed Sir Stafford Northcote, with a certain intellectual pleasure. It is not often one comes across anything so consistent and so thorough-going. The Marquis is for governing by pure repression. He would prohibit meetings, "act stringently," and refuse all reforms. He would reject the smallest measure of local self-government, however plausible it might appear, and would refuse votes to the labourers, because they might become Home-rulers. All this he defended on the ground of the supreme interest of the kingdom in maintaining the Union. Lord Waterford forgets the grand objection to his plan. It has been tried for three hundred years, and at the end, Catholic Ireland enthrones Protestant Parnell because he promises that the Union shall come to an end. An absolute Government might govern Ireland for twenty years by pure repression, and so greatly enrich her; but it would not bring the true Union of the Islands one whit nearer.

As a rule, while in Ulster, Sir Stafford Northcote carefully avoided saying anything of the slightest interest to any living being, except that the Union must be maintained. Upon Saturday, however, he dropped some very curious hints as to his theory of representation. It is very American. He showed his hearers that Ulster, if fairly represented, would have forty-four Members, instead of twenty-nine; and that Belfast alone, if represented like Connaught, would be entitled to eight. That is true enough, more especially if taxation and numbers be taken together as bases of representation; but the principle involved is equal electoral districts, and we want to know if Sir Stafford really means that. Will he concede the proper mathematical addition to Scotland; and above all, will he recognise the claims of the Metropolis? London within the postal area is entitled to one hundred Members, and if taxation is included as well as numbers, to one hundred and fifty. Will Sir Stafford Northcote accept that conclusion? We do not believe it, though there is a curious rumour that the Tory chiefs would like a mathematically perfect scheme, which would give London and the populous counties enormous weight in the House of Commons. They think they could carry them. Still, we expect the Tory rank and file to show some respect to history, and if they do, Ulster cannot obtain nearly half the representation of Ireland.

The funeral of Turgeneff, the Russian novelist, on October 9th, at St. Petersburg, was raised to the dignity of a national event. No less than 126 deputations from every part of the Empire, including the Caucasus, Finland, Siberia, and even Central Asia, attended, as did representatives from all the newspapers, colleges, and dramatic associations of the two capitals. The crowds which followed were enormous, and so acute were the fears entertained by Count Tolstoi, the Minister of the Interior, that all arrangements were previously revised by him, all speeches submitted to his censorship, and large numbers of Cossacks and gendarmes held in reserve to attack the procession, if it grew disorderly. No disturbances occurred, but of course the speeches were without interest, though it is said the Government is deeply moved by the universality of the demonstration. The official feeling is the more remarkable, because Turguenieff, though he represented with such force the prevalent temper of Russians, their despair under their system, was utterly opposed to Nihilism, which he thought an absurdity, and to insurrection, which he considered hopeless. It must be remembered that the entire absence of popular politicians in Russia gives to popular littérateurs, who alone can present thought with any degree of freedom, an even exaggerated importance. Turguenieff, besides being himself, was to Russians a Liberal leader.

The British in Egypt have at last attempted to force one practical reform upon the Egyptian Ministry. Acting, it is believed, upon the advice of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, now Adviser-General to the Department of the Interior, the Ministry in Cairo have ordered the Governors of Provinces to visit the gaols, to examine the prisoners, and to release those who are innocent,—a duty which will be zealously performed, and be most profitable to the officers who perform it. Still, though bribery will increase, suffering will be diminished. For the future, all gaolers are to refuse to receive the prisoners sent in, unless they are forwarded by some competent and responsible authority. That is the true rule, if only it can be enforced; but then, can it? The gaoler's patron is the man who imprisons at will, and the gaoler will not affront his patron until the law makes him penally liable for his conduct. We fear the only effective method of preventing false arrest would be to authorise resistance; but to this no Asiatic Government will consent. The next best way would be to have none but European gaolers, or gaol inspectors; but then, that involves precisely the system of direct government which it has been resolved not to introduce.

Sir Evelyn Wood on Wednesday gave the Fishmongers' Company a most gratifying account of the progress made in forming an Egyptian Army. He had drilled and organised 6,000 natives, with whom, it is said—he did not say it—he is willing to answer for order without British troops; and in the whole force, from the time he took the command, corporal punishment has not been inflicted once. The men were ruled mainly by their confidence in their European officers. That is excellent, though it shows that Europeans are the proper and not the improper class to entrust with power, but it needs to be further supplemented. That Egyptian sepoys will be orderly and obedient in peace-time under lenient treatment will be believed by all who know them, but will a discipline without terrors hold under shells and bullets? Will not the men, who respect and like, but do not dread their officers, try to save themselves? They may not, for officers who are never struck do not run away; but this, and not order in cantonments, is the main point. The object of drill is to repress the natural human fear of shells and bayonets, by inspiring a greater fear of the consequences of skulking. Have the Egyptians got that, as well as a liking for order?

Mr. Osborne Morgan made, on Monday, an able speech to the people of Wrexham, upon the necessity of stricter organisation in the Liberal Party. The next election would be fought under the Corrupt Practices Act and with household franchise in the counties, and a great number of "independent" candidates would be tempted into the field. Already an independent candidate, about whom he could discover nothing, had been started for Denbighshire. He held it best to beware of such men, who were almost universally either Conservative wolves in Liberal fleeces, or men who cared mainly for themselves. He distinctly advocated the caucus, as the only feasible method of feeling the pulse of great constituencies, and attributed the defeat of 1874 to the absence of such organisations. There is no need to abuse the independent candidates, who will often be fanatic philanthropists, and not self-seeking at all; but the necessity for Mr. Morgan's caution is becoming more apparent every day. When the counties are enfranchised, we shall always have a labour candidate and a farmer's candidate, and unless a previous agreement can be obtained, the landlord's candidate will beat both. A man who votes for any but the accepted candidate of his party must be held to wish its defeat. The rest of Mr. Morgan's speech was of the ordinary party kind, except that he praised the Welsh Members for their great Parliamentary virtue,—silence, whenever speech was equivalent to obstruction.

A well-informed correspondent of the Times declares that the ancient and severe repression of the Russian Press has within two years become more determined than ever. The provincial newspapers are all subjected to the "previous censorship," which makes free speech impossible; and the newspapers of great cities, when too Liberal, are now subjected to the same rule. All officials are forbidden to give news to the journals, and a kind of monopoly is secured to the "Northern Agency," which both exports and imports news, and which is under the strictest official censorship. The journals struggle uselessly against this tyranny, as the Departments have power to prevent their sale, to prohibit their advertisements, and to punish their editors, besides enjoying a right to issue circulars commanding that such and such subjects or events be not discussed. Fourteen such circulars were issued in 1882. Of course, all these efforts are ineffectual for their end, Russia being full of secret literature, and men learning the news as they used to do before newspapers were, and do still in most parts of Asia. The repression only accentuates the permanent quarrel between the Government and the educated, and increases indefinitely the danger arising from false statements. When there are no free newspapers, a Government may be accused of anything; its enemies will believe the story, and the Government may remain ignorant till the explosion comes. That happened repeatedly just before the French Revolution.

We have noted elsewhere one grand difficulty of governing France through a Chamber wielding sovereign power, namely, its possible incompetence to manage negotiations. There is, however, another. The Chamber is as extravagant as an extravagant Sovereign. The Deputies seem unable to resist any demands, and grant votes for the Army, for public works, and for fortifications, as if the revenue came out of a mine, instead of taxpayers' pockets. M. Tirard, the Finance Minister, now admits officially that the deficit will be £2,000,000 sterling, and proposes to meet it only by reductions on the interest allowed to some Military funds. At the same time, the Budget of the Army has been swollen by vote after vote, until it has reached the immense sum of £24,000,000 a year. Yet the French Army is only on a peace footing, and the great difficulty, which can only be met by more expense, the supply of competent non-commissioned officers, still embarrasses and enfeebles the regiments. Some day we shall all recognise, we greatly fear, that the temptation of democracies is not an "ignorant impatience of taxation," but an ignorant readiness to spend. There is a healthy meanness in Kings and aristocrats, which the peoples are without.

The French are quite alarmed at the number of foreigners who crowd into France. It has rapidly increased of late years, and now includes 1,001,000 persons, nearly a thirtieth of all the souls in France. About one-half of the immigrants are Belgians, but the Italians are coming in regiments, and the Spaniards, and even the Germans, rapidly increase. The French statisticians dislike the movement, but it keeps up a population which otherwise would decline, and it may be taken as a rule that the country which can attract immigrants can absorb them. We have no men more English than the sons of the Germans who begin to swarm into our cities. In Switzerland, where everything depends upon a vote, there is much more reason for alarm, some Cantons—Neuchâtel, for instance—receiving immigrants in excess of the native-born population. The rush of Europe towards America is now perceived to be a movement of importance to the world, though 80 per cent. of all inhabitants of the Union are still native-born; but the internal movement of the peoples among the European States has received little attention. It is, however, worth notice. There are provinces in Germany which are nearly Slav, and counties in Scotland in which the base of the population is Milesian Irish.

Some members of the Metropolitan Board of Works are not pleased with the letter from the Treasury, discussed elsewhere in our columns, refusing to extend the grant of the coal and wine duties after 1889. They say they did not ask the extension in order to borrow more money, for they always borrow on the security of the assessed value of London, which is as good as anything, except possibly the State's promise. They asked in order to avoid the sudden jump in the rates by 2½d. in the pound which must occur in 1889, if the coal dues are abolished. They repudiate the implied imputation of extravagance, showing that the rate was as high in 1867 as at present, and that London has all the benefit of their improvements. They also deny that they have borrowed £8,000,000 in five years, £3,000,000 of that sum having been lent to Local Boards with borrowing powers of their own,—a bad system, as the high credit of the central Board makes lesser Boards careless in spending the money obtained so cheaply. The writers, whoever they are, argue well, but miss, naturally, the essential point of the whole matter. Why should they decide that communication across the Thames is worth an expenditure of millions, or that a coal tax is a good tax? Such points are either for a true representative Municipality, which can be turned out if it blunders, or for Parliament.

Mr. Teale, a surgeon of standing, is President this year of the Health Department of the Social Science Congress, and in his address on Monday he attacked modern education, on a partly new ground. While repeating the assertion that children were often unduly pressed by the present system, on which we have said a word elsewhere, he brought forward the special case of the Pupil-teachers. He declared emphatically that they were overworked. In addition to preparing for a severe examination essential to their career as masters, and, indeed, necessary to their livelihood, which involves a full day's toil, they were employed for five and a half hours a day in the fatiguing work of drilling little children in their lessons, and maintaining their attention. That is a dreary picture, but is the work much harder than that of any other apprentice, say in a printing-office? It may be more exhausting, if the Pupil-teacher hates it, but then one object of the whole system is to keep out of the schools those who detest teaching. We must admit, however, as we do elsewhere, that a case is being made out for inquiry through the Department itself, during which the severe labour imposed on all school teachers should not be forgotten. Weariness is the root of much of the bitterness, tempered by resignation, so often found in the class.

We are not entirely in favour in Asiatic countries of what is called "equality" between Europeans and natives. It is sometimes needful, in order to secure to the European his leadership, without which he can do nothing, to protect him against the injustice of jealous rivals; but occasionally he renders the task of supporting him intolerably difficult. He has an innate and apparently unconscious arrogance that is almost inexplicable. The China correspondent of the Times, for example, a well-informed man, often very moderate, complains this week that when Shanghai was formed, the land of the settlement was "unfortunately" not reserved exclusively for foreigners, and rich Chinamen, flying before intestine troubles, actually bought bits of it. "Hence all our actual and potential difficulties, sanitary and political." That notion of our feebleness in allowing the Chinese to buy at our prices land in their own country would be incredible, but that it is justice, compared with the ideas of South-African colonists. It is, we believe, a law in the diamond fields that though a native may dig for wages as much as he will, he must not own a "claim" or possess a diamond. If he does, he is flogged, the presumption being that he is a thief. He has not, of course, the claim of the Chinaman, being usually as much an immigrant as the Englishman; but this cool denial of any right at all is monstrous. No wonder that in Canton the Chinese are suspicious of the equity of the Consular Courts, as suspicious as we are all over the world of any but European Judges.

A remarkable report by Mr. Shirley Murphy, Medical Officer of St. Pancras, on the recent outbreak of typhoid in that parish, was read on Wednesday. It showed conclusively that the disease was conveyed through the milk consumed in the houses affected. These houses, 276 in number, were subject to the ordinary influences, were no worse drained than their neighbours, and were not specially poisoned by neighbourhood to the Regent's Canal. Of the 431 persons attacked, however, 220 are customers of Mr. X, milk vendor, and supplied by his carriers, 130 send for milk from his shop; and eighteen received it from Mr. Y, who is only a middleman for Mr. X. In one large tenement house in Islington, with sixty-two apartments, all who bought milk elsewhere escaped; but of the fifteen families which dealt with Mr. X, not one was without a case of fever. Further inquiry showed that not all of Mr. X's customers were affected, but only those supplied from one farm in Hertfordshire, where the cattle drank from a pond into which the water of a neighbouring cesspool percolated. And, of course, when the history of this cesspool was traced, it was found that persons had recently used it known to have been afflicted with typhoid fever. We wonder if cholera is ever conveyed in this way. It is supposed to be always conveyed in water; but nothing is more puzzling than the way in which it will apparently jump over houses supplied with water from the same source.

The Standard publishes a letter from a correspondent at Colombo, stating that on September 5th,—“We witnessed a very extraordinary phenomenon on Sunday, about five p.m., when we were driving on the Galle Face promenade. Minnie looked up and said, ‘Look how bright the moon is!’ It was the sun, at that time a pale, yellowy-white colour; a little later on, it changed into a deep pea-green colour, and then a spot could be distinctly seen on the face of the sun, with the naked eye, for about ten minutes, during the whole of which time we could look at the sun without its making the eyes blink or feel uncomfortable. The spot was near the centre of the left outer circumference, was triangular in shape, and nearly the size of a florin.” The phenomenon of a green sun was witnessed also in Southern India, and appears to have been due to the floating over the continent of a huge body of sulphuretted vapour thrown out from Krakatoa, in the eruption of August 27th. If that is correct, the vapour had travelled in the upper region of the air at the rate of 300 miles a day.

Those who are interested in watching the change in the modern religious temper should read carefully the address of Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of the Independent College, Airedale, Bradford, delivered before the Congregational Union on Tuesday. Its object was to describe the position of modern thought, especially sceptical thought, in relation to Christianity, and though of course orthodox, it was penetrated throughout by an admirable fairness. Dr. Fairbairn treated the modern movement as an outburst of naturalism, a new effort to get behind Christ and find a basis for religion in Nature. There is not a sentence in his speech to which a just-minded agnostic could object, though he might not like the icy way in which he is told that the modern movement is a revival, rather than a progress, that M. Renan is very like Celsus, and that Mr. Matthew Arnold is “a modernised Lucian, with better manners, more religion, and a higher mind.” We cannot summarise the address, which ended in a strong appeal to the audience to introduce their religion into the affairs of life, until “Secularism should have no excuse for its being,” but its tone was as unlike the narrow bigotry often attributed to Dissent as it is possible to conceive. Dissenters must, however, pardon us if we say that thirty years since it could not have been delivered, or would have been pronounced there and then an example of the evil tolerance of scepticism which was impeding the Word. Dr. Fairbairn did not swear enough at heresy, for the older members.

Sir Evelyn Baring will not, we venture to predict, be long popular in Egypt. He is too independent of the opinion of the European Colony, which considers that in many respects it is “Europe” present on the spot. This colony is eager for the payment of the indemnities, and on the 5th inst. waited on Sir Evelyn to urge him to press the Government on the matter. Sir Evelyn refused point-blank, telling the deputation that he saw no ground for exercising pressure, and that the request came with a bad grace from men who claimed immunity from local taxation. Perhaps he might have been a little gentler with advantage. He is entirely in the right, and the indemnity, though politic, is oppressive; but as it has been granted and the awards made, the money should be paid. It must be found, sooner or later, and an indefinite delay is only cruel to the Europeans, some of whom have not exaggerated their claims, without being beneficial to the Egyptian Treasury. Sir Evelyn Baring scarcely ever made a blunder in India, but he often made needless enemies.

ENGLISH COLLECTIVISM.

IS English Liberalism about to undergo a change, to modify its traditional doctrines, and to accept, whether with pleasure or reluctance, a strong infusion of "Socialism?" It is quite time to ask the question, and there could hardly be a better opportunity than the present lull in politics. To us it seems clear that the tendency exists, and that the school of thought which on the Continent is called Collectivism, though greatly modified by the English desire for compromise and for concrete plans, is gaining ground visibly among us. We do not rely merely on the wide circulation of that dreamy and dangerous book by Mr. George on the nationalisation of the land, or on the speeches now frequently made in gatherings of distressed men; we see the spread of the school in much higher quarters. The disposition of Parliament to override the claims of individuals when opposed to the interests, real or presumed, of the whole people becomes, as the Pall Mall Gazette so frequently points out, more marked in every Session. An appreciable section of Radical candidates begin to base their claims to popular favour upon "philanthropy," sometimes pulpy, occasionally, perhaps, factitious, but often quite genuine, and even practical. The political litterateurs who have so much initiative in English politics, though not often great weight, are bringing forward, in all manner of magazines, journals, and pamphlets, schemes which thirty years ago would have been pronounced ridiculous, and which are one and all penetrated with the same thought, that the whole community should make great, sometimes indeed huge, pecuniary sacrifices, in order that the lower mass should have more enjoyment of their lives. Lecturers go many degrees further than the litterateurs, and the active section of the clergy, who come daily into contact with misery, and who have not much to lose, are often inclined to go further than both. The spirit is catching the new generation, and we are constantly amazed to find that the Spectator, which Tories often think so rabid, is pronounced by younger Liberals a little antiquated in its views, and incapable of appreciating advanced philanthropic schemes. And yet we should have said that the Spectator, too, was a little bitten, and that an article such as we published a fortnight since, on "Children's Dinners," would twenty years ago hardly have appeared in its columns. Some of the proposals current, besides being philanthropic, are gigantic, and three at least are slowly gliding out of the region of speculation into that of practical politics. But for the opposition of Irish theorists, State-aided Emigration on a considerable scale would be already before Parliament as a positive and not a tentative proposal. Both parties are becoming slowly pledged to the most vast of all Collectivist schemes, the "rehousing of the people." And that some measure will be brought forward for the bettering of the people in the Scotch Highlands and Islands which will be essentially Collectivist in tone, if not in form, those who have watched recent events with attention hardly doubt. The English will not long endure a conflict between the laws and the happiness of the only Celtic race whom they regard, possibly in part on sentimental grounds, but in the main for sound reasons, with cordial affection and esteem.

We have no objection to the movement, which, when investigated, is an outcome of Christianity, and could not arise in a country dominated either by Paganism or by the scientific spirit, and we recognise to the full that the tremendous power of the collective State as an agency for good has never been sufficiently employed. Except in supplying food to the starving, in suppressing small-pox, in providing education, and in insuring to the masses the possibility of travelling by railway, "the Country" has as yet done little strictly to be called philanthropic. It might do much more, especially in the direction of alleviating the three great incidents in human life, birth, sickness, and death, through better State provision for scientific attendance. But we want all Liberals, before they give way to the swelling stream of pity, to make up their minds finally and inexorably on three principles, or rather rules of thought, the breach of any one of which will bring them ultimately to ruin. First, that they must themselves bear the cost of all the good they propose to do, and not steal it from other people; secondly, that plans for philanthropic improvement must be as hard, and as practical, and as closely limited by facts, as plans for war or other forms of destructive action; and thirdly, that when they have done their utmost, they must be content to know that there will remain troubles of humanity upon which they will spend their highest energies in vain. God has decided that women should suffer when the race is born, that man's permanent work should be to sweat for his living, that all should inexorably die,—and against these, and kindred necessities, the human will is vain.

About the adoption of the first rule, we have some misgivings which many of our friends would pronounce foolish. The English, they would say, are an honest people, and they would say rightly; but they are not a people quick of ideas, and we have been astounded to discover how many there are who sincerely believe that the State cannot rob, if only it takes away money from the comfortable and expends it for the benefit of the unhappy. That is an utterly immoral doctrine. The State can rob, even within its own area, and does rob very often, while it still more often breaks its own contracts by quasi-criminal negligence. One-half the secularisations of Church property on the Continent have been robberies effected by force, while the special taxation of State Bonds, except so far as it is a form of bankruptcy, is a criminal breach of contract. Suppose, for example, that the State ordered all great proprietors of land to rebuild their cottages at a loss, without also ordering all other equally large employers of profitable labour, it would unmistakably and openly rob. So it would if it adopted a suggestion in this month's Fortnightly, and expropriated all unhealthy houses at less than their market value. So it would if it "nationalised" the land without compensation to owners, whom for two hundred years at least it has promised to keep secure in the enjoyment of their property. And, finally, so it would if it placed upon a class the burden of a philanthropic scheme, instead of placing it upon the whole people,—if, for instance, it put on a progressive Income-tax, in order that the sum exacted from all with more than a million should be spent upon children's hospitals. Of course, if the specially taxed class agrees, as, no doubt, English Income-taxpayers have agreed, to an impost not borne by the community, no harm is done; but otherwise, the tax is nothing better than a violent wrong. The State has no more right to decree that Arundel Castle shall be a museum for the benefit of the people of Arundel, than it has to seize the humblest cottager's home, and turn it into a hospital for the Arundel sick. If we desire to do these grand charities—and we do not protest, rather we should be delighted to pay our share for the children's dinners—we must pay for them out of our own earnings, and not look round greedily to snatch any property which seems too much for its owner. If we do, besides breaking laws outside our legitimate control, we shall very speedily find that the rain raineth on the just and unjust, and that the system of the Universe does not make pity a reason for injustice. The spirit of accumulation, to which man owes nearly as much as he does to hunger, that beneficent and self-acting whip of Heaven, will receive a fatal shock.

The second rule is nearly as important as the first, and is more disregarded. Human reason was not given to man to be safely set aside whenever a man wanted something for his brother. Statesmen may be excellent men because of their aspirations, but they must carry out their aspirations through hard calculation. What is the use of ordering the children's dinners, if there is not the money to buy them? Take this rehousing of the people, for example. People write of the iniquity of housing whole families in one room, as if, since the beginning of the world, man had ever done anything else; as if the human race had not dwelt each family in a tent, or a hut, or a room, from the days of Lamech. Two men on earth in every three are Asiatics, and how many rooms do they get? Nevertheless, in our civilisation a family ought to have more, and the evil is great enough for the State to intervene; but then, admitting that, let us all consider what we are to do. Shouting on hustings will not mend things, nor will philanthropic gush. There are seven millions of houses in the two Islands, of which at least five millions want serious improvements for the sake of hygiene; and of these, one million at least ought to be rebuilt. The latter alone will cost £150,000,000, and the 4,000,000 of the former £40,000,000, for every £10 note spent on each house. How far will £10 go? We venture to say we shall not rehouse Englishmen as they ought to be housed, with two rooms as the family minimum, decent windows, and trapped cloacæ, under a new National Debt. That is no reason for not beginning the work, still less a reason for not enforcing the strictest possible Lodging-house Act, but it is a reason for not accepting vague talk with rapture because it is philanthropic. Telling Hodge that he ought to be well housed, and shall be, is not philanthropy, or sense either. We must, if we are honest, call for scientific estimates, settle about materials, declare what we exactly mean about crowding, and then stoop our shoulders to take up another weighty burden. Our duty is not the less clear for the weight, but for God's sake do not let us shout that, if our objects are only good, the laws of gravitation will be suspended. They won't.

Upon the third rule it is useless to say much, for Nature says it with a voice which drowns ours. If every rich man is a Clarkson, and every poor man treated as his brother, both will be born in pain, both will die with pain, and both will have to endure without screaming their modicum of tooth-ache. All the philanthropists alive, or to be born, will not modify the physical conditions of the world much, though they may make it a little happier, and can indefinitely improve its morale.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE FRENCH CHAMBER.

THERE are just three living forces left in France, the Chamber, the Army, and the Mob of Paris; and of the three, the Chamber is, for the moment, the one which governs. Its power, as we have repeatedly pointed out, is absolute, and is used absolutely. It overturns Ministries when it will, dismisses individual Ministers at discretion, and would without difficulty, as is believed in Paris, compel even the President to resign. He could not remain after a hostile address, and he would not remain after a distinctly hostile vote. The Chamber, however, though irresistible, has never been severely tested, and its conduct, now that a test is at hand, is matter of unusual interest, both to those who believe that government by an unfettered Chamber is impossible, and to those who think that, if it is impossible, democracy stands self-condemned. All who could think have perceived that the difficulty of a Chamber which should attempt direct government as the French Chamber has done would be in questions of foreign policy, and it is with many such questions, all urgent, all complicated, and all new, that the Chamber, when it meets on the 22nd inst., will have to deal. Every difficulty has been left for its decision, and the Deputies between October 22nd and November 3rd must declare whether they held Paris right in insulting the King of Spain, whether they intend to accept a war with China, and whether they will or will not reject the suggestions of the British Government in the matter of Mr. Shaw. It may be doubted if the Ministry will even suggest a definite course; but in any case it will rest, as the Radicals clearly see, with the Chamber to decide. Its Members must exercise, for the first time, the Kingship they have assumed, and prove not only that they can lay down principles of action, but apply them to the actual affairs of life as a strong Executive would. The circumstances will make of their action an almost supreme test of their competence to rule. The Spanish Government, it is clear, though anxious to spare the dignity of France, is asking for redress for the insult put upon its King; while the populace of Paris, which surrounds the Assembly, is vehement that no redress whatever should be granted, and talks of those who consent to an apology as indifferent to the honour of France. The Government of Great Britain asks compensation for Mr. Shaw, while not only the populace of Paris, but even leaders of French thought like M. John Lemoinne, deny emphatically and with ridicule that Mr. Shaw is entitled to anything beyond commiseration for unavoidable suffering caused by a mistake. And the Chinese Government calmly awaits a decision which means peace or war; while the official class in France is averse to any solution except a compromise already rejected and far too favourable to France. If the Chamber is able to cope with such difficulties it will prove that it is competent to govern, that the future of France, even in matters of foreign politics, may safely be trusted to its hands, and this, too, when it is not under the dominance of any single or commanding mind. Its strength, if it displays any, will come from its own representative character. If, on the other hand, it is not competent, even devoted friends of Republicanism will doubt whether it is possible any longer to do without an Executive which the Chamber cannot remove.

We confess we look forward to the prospect with some dismay. A Chamber acting as Sovereign in such affairs is a novel phenomenon in politics, and the signs that this Chamber will go right are not many. There is, it is true, little doubt what a wise King placed in such a position would do. He would refuse absolutely to quarrel with Spain, and implicitly with Germany, upon a question rather of courtesy than of principle, would declare that Paris had been misled into a natural though ignorant irritation, and would offer, in the name of the nation, an apology sufficient to satisfy the sensitive pride of Spain. He would treat the Shaw affair as a pure misfortune, due to the neglect by a deceased and very sick officer of precise and unmistakeable instructions; and he would thus, freed from European annoyances, concentrate his will upon the dispute with China. If Tonquin, in his deliberate judgment, were worth a war, he would reject Chinese interference with disdain, send ten thousand men to Hanoi, and calmly accept the consequences; and if it were not, he would sign the proposed agreement, by which France cedes all claims in Tonquin, in consideration of sovereignty over the rest of Anam. There would be no loss of honour in such decisions, and none of prestige, for the world would recognise at once that a strong man was deliberately ridding himself of weight in order to attain more rapidly his true ends. We fear, however, that the Chamber, though in the main anxious for peace, will take no such dignified course. It would, if the Deputies believed in war with China upon the Tonquin affair; but they are so ignorant, that if M. Challemeil-Lacour asserts that the Government of Peking is quailing, and only threatens under British influence, they may accept the continuance of the situation, in which, as Frenchmen believe, the Black Flags are always evacuating Sontay, and the "Chinese Regulars" are steadily defeated, without any consequences whatever. The Deputies may, in fact, allow the Government to drift. As to compensation to Mr. Shaw, they will allow it to be made, if the Government choose, amid speeches which will take all the grace out of reparation; and as to the insult to Spain, they may refuse all but the most meagre apology. The Radicals are already defending General Thibaudin, who approved the insult, and M. Clémenceau, usually the least unreasoning of Reds, has published an article in La Justice in which he attributes the overthrow of that Minister to the Orleanists, and declares that if France is to respect others, she must be respected. In fact, the whole Extreme Left is disposed to consider that "patriotism" justified the hooting of King Alfonso. The majority of Deputies may be better advised, but it is evident that the extreme irritability visible in all the foreign politics of France—an irritability scarcely to be explained—has extended far upwards, and that men who do not usually vote with the Reds may take the opportunity to destroy the Ferry Government, with no thought of ulterior consequences. If the Chamber censures the apology, it becomes, of course, of no value, and even Spanish Liberals will believe that the French Republic has shown itself contemptuous of the Spanish nation. Worse diplomacy could not be conceived, and it will be the diplomacy of the only Power which even claims sovereign attributes in France, and which represents in a special degree the Republican principle. The very objection of all Royalists to the Republic is that it provides no Executive strong enough to carry out any policy without bending to the momentary and, perhaps, ignorant wish of the majority of electors.

We do not fear enormous or irretrievable disasters, even if the Chamber should go wrong. Germany is not interfering, England is patient if not insulted, and the Spanish Government will, at worst, only withdraw its Embassy with a certain éclat. But we should greatly fear the deepening of the feeling in France that the Republic, however good in principle, does not give sufficient security in foreign affairs, and may lead the nation into a catastrophe. The dread of war has enormous weight in all countries—for instance, it protects the present Government of Germany—and in France, where all men think the world plotting against them and invasion always a possibility, it is nearly irresistible. It is fear which is making the French people so fractious, and if anything occurred to accentuate the fear, the peasantry might take refuge once more in a Dictatorship, which would, as they might think, strengthen them to resist external attack. Such a Dictatorship would almost certainly be created in war-time, and the expectancy of war harasses Frenchmen more than a campaign.

THE FEDERATION OF GREATER BRITAIN.

THE remarkable book, or rather collection of pamphlets, which Professor Seeley has just given to the world,* may have one mischievous effect. It may strengthen the hands of that imaginative but unpractical party which is always looking forward to a Federation of the Empire. Professor Seeley contends that we English misread the greatest of all modern political occurrences,—the "expansion of England." Optimists or pessimists, we none of us see the precise truth, and either indulge in bombast, or are careless of gains which, wisely treated, might keep us on a level with the greatest States of the world. He holds India to be a mere possession of little or no value to the kingdom, though one which, for the sake of its own population, England may be in duty bound to retain; but considers the real Colonies, such as the Canadian Dominion, the West India Islands, Australia, and New Zealand as parts of England, expansions of her territory into which her people pour exactly as they would pour into unoccupied lands close at home. They have done so continuously for two hundred years, have fought war after war to maintain their right to do so, and will continue doing so, until within a very short period the English who have not split off, the English under the Queen, who are already forty-five millions, will number a hundred millions, possessing, exclusive of India, one of the largest territories in the world. Professor Seeley believes that these hundred millions may still hold together, that we are all deceived by the precedent of the American schism, that the binding forces developed by the aid of science are now stronger than the dissolving forces, and that if the English will but place themselves mentally in their true position, a great and vigorous State, equal to any other in the world, may yet be created. They ought not to think of themselves as people of an island, but as citizens in common of an enormous, though scattered State, which they can if they please hold together by Federal ties as easily as the American Republic holds its almost equally vast and scattered population. With steamships and telegraphs, distance presents no difficulties, and the Empire, apart from India, has in it a basis of stability, its population being essentially homogeneous in race, colour, and aspirations, and we may add, not divided by any of those violent differences of civilisation which so nearly rent the Northern and Southern States violently asunder.

This is a brilliant picture, and substantially a true one; but Professor Seeley draws from it, we think, a dangerous deduction. He does not exactly say, "Federate this Empire, and maintain it at all hazards, even civil war," for he has a lingering doubt whether a State is happier, or greater, or even stronger for being so very big, but this is the bias of his teaching. He tells us that we may enjoy this greatness, if we employ the Federal system. He shows how the United States have prospered under that system, how vigorously and splendidly they fought for their Unity; and he brings in throughout his discourse the word "Federal," in a way that shows he regards this scheme of government as the instrument of empire. Moreover, he does distinctly recommend that Greater Britain should be so organised that its whole strength should, in case of need, be available for war; and that, of course, implies federation of some kind. At present, we defend the Colonies on condition of directing their foreign policy; but if they are to defend us, they must, of course, have their voice, and a potent voice, in that branch at least of the general administration of affairs. The prospect greatly gratifies many minds, and is not without a charm for all; but it is, we believe with much reluctance, impracticable. We entirely agree that the Colonists are only scattered Englishmen, and we have always maintained that we should bind the Colonies much more closely to ourselves as allies, by more honorific treatment, by more respect for their fancies, by more attention to their Envoys, by more rigid abstinence from interference in their internal affairs, but federation is impossible. The federation could not be limited by any art to Foreign Affairs, for with the first common war would come common taxation, and with common taxation the business and the rights of the common governing Power would cover all departments of life. The distant States must be represented in the Supreme Parliament, and with that great change, however effected, whether by seating Colonial Representatives in the House of Commons, or, which would be more effective, by superseding the House of Lords by a Representative Senate, with special control of patronage and foreign policy, the freedom of the Island Englishmen to direct their own lives would speedily be ended. Fifty years hence the Colonists will outnumber us, and would under this scheme govern us in our own capital, and long before that period they would hold the balance of power. Upon all questions of foreign policy, of military and naval preparation, of Colonial government, of taxation for war, they would hold their own ideas, would ally themselves with one of the great parties, and would be irresistibly strong. We see how powerful thirty Parnellites have made themselves, but the Colonists, if admitted into Parliament, would already claim a fourth of all the seats, or say roughly a hundred and fifty Members, a body which could always secure the casting-vote, and which, in ideas, ways, and aspirations, would be as separate from us as the Irish Ultras. They could not feel as we feel about Colonies, navies, or tariffs; and they would not feel as we do about our relations either with the Continental States, with Ireland, or with the American Republic. The burden of government, already severe, and only borne because there is in the body of British electors a final authority, would speedily be past endurance.

Nor are we at all sure that a Federal Greater Britain, if it could be formed, would be so wisely governed as Great Britain is now. The Colonial Office is not a perfect Department, but the Colonial system of Great Britain is now the most lenient and self-denying the world has ever heard of. The Mother-country, while keeping all seas clear for her children, and defending them from all attack, asks nothing of them, neither revenue, nor soldiers for general service, nor even special commercial advantages. She is reluctant to press even undoubted claims, and often carries concession to local feeling up to the verge of principle. A Federal Government would be far more exigent, and would often be felt by a particular Colony as intolerable as the Southern States felt the Federal Government of the Union. The new bond might well lead to disruption, instead of closer union. In war-time, this danger would be very great. Each Colony has then its special interests, which the Mother-country can and does allow for in a hundred informal ways; while the Federal Government would be compelled to apply to all the same rigid rule. No representative system, however artistic, could make the Canadian and Australian Dominions think alike about a war for the right of fishing round Newfoundland, and the prominence of the two in British councils would only deprive the Mother-country of its present moderating power. That power is sure to tend towards peace, because, if there is war, Britain must bear all taxes, supply all soldiers, and face all consequences, without dreaming that States beyond ocean, represented, but not invested with power, will relieve the central people of a portion of their burden. The system, no doubt, is imperfect, more especially in the place given to the Agents, that is, in effect to the Representative Governments of the Colonies; but it allows the Empire to bind itself together by links of intercourse, trade, and mutual reliance for support and advice. If for these loose links rigid chains are substituted, however artistically they may be made, the movement of the world, which can never be foreseen, may snap them.

LONDON FINANCES.

IT is a remarkable illustration of the small importance of London as a political and social entity, that the long and weighty letter of the Secretary to the Treasury to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, on the proposed continuance of the coal and wine duties, should have been passed over by the public press almost without notice. Here is a measure which affects the pockets of more than four millions of people to the extent, on the estimate of Mr. Courtney, of seven per cent., brought forward by bodies professing to be representative; yet when the coup de grâce is given to it by a Government official, not a voice is raised in remonstrance. The leading journal the other day was full of the grievances of the dwellers in Jamaica and other West-Indian Islands, and devoted many columns to showing how they were depressed and oppressed under a vicious system of taxation. The dwellers in Jamaica number very little more than half a million all told, of whom only a minority are English, while their public revenue scarcely exceeds half a million of money. Yet the great journal which had so much space to spare for them could not afford a single column to the discussion of this measure, affecting the four millions of its countrymen situate at its very doors, brought forward by governing bodies who deal with an annual revenue of five millions and a half, to which it must itself contribute a not altogether trifling amount. There is probably no other professedly representative body in the three kingdoms, or indeed in the whole circle of the British Empire, which could have had the "counter-check quarrelsome" administered to it by the Government so openly, without provoking at least a storm in the tea-cup of its local press, or evoking the beneficent attentions of some "fourth party" or other. But poor London is of no account in the councils of the nation. As a sheep before its shearers is dumb, so is London while its shepherds discuss whether it shall be sheared this way or that, in the winds of March or under the balmy breezes of April.

Yet the matter at issue is one which will indirectly be of great moment, not only to London, but to every great city in the kingdom. It is nothing less than the principle which should guide municipal taxation. The Board of Works and the City Corporation asked the Government for their help to continue the coal and wine duties for another term of years after their expiration in 1889. The Board of Works, which spends the larger part of these duties (9d. out of the 13d. in the pound levied on coal), put forward a series of great schemes of improvement as imperatively necessary, and necessitating the continuance of the duties to meet the interest on the new loans which they will have to contract, further rates being impossible or undesirable. The Secretary to the Treasury, in refusing at present to entertain the proposition, emphasised his doubts both of the necessity for the new expenditure, and of the necessity or desirability of meeting it by the proposed tax. The estimated expenditure was thirteen millions, of which more than five millions was for the single purpose of a cross-river communication below London Bridge. Mr. Courtney says that it is not shown either that there is any need for this vast outlay, or that there was practical agreement with regard to any specific proposal, and, therefore, until some further proof of necessity was forthcoming the Treasury would decline to assist in finding the money. The obvious answer from any other municipal body would be that as they were the chosen representatives of the ratepayers, they, and not the Imperial Government, were the best judges of the need, and also of the best way of meeting the need. But the Board have closed their doors, and are considering the Secretary's letter in secret session. For obvious reasons, they cannot take their stand on this ground. They know, and every one else knows, that though nominally representatives of the ratepayers of London, they are not really so. The wretched double system of election under which the Vestries are elected first, and that by a mere handful of ratepayers, and then the Vestries elect the members of the Board of Works, quite deprives them of any claim to be a representative body. Moreover, they are, no doubt, conscious to themselves that the last time when they propounded a scheme for connecting the two banks of the Thames below London Bridge, it was defeated through the opposition of that other would-be representative of London, the City Corporation, which now joins them in demanding a continuance of the tax. Besides, they feel that the Secretary's letter means a good deal more than meets the eye. When he warns them of the unpopularity which follows when the outlay, which is always popular at the moment of expenditure, has to be met, they know that so far as they are concerned he is speaking to deaf ears. They are doomed men, making one last desperate struggle to escape the inevitable day. The popularity of the moment is everything to the Board of Works. If only it can make enough splash and make-believe to be toiling energetically in the interest of Londoners, by freely spending the money of Londoners on themselves, it may hope to win popularity enough to protract its existence till the Government of action is itself defunct, and the era of "sects and schisms" sets in again, and private interests are stronger than public, and people are content only to let things be. If the day of unpopularity should come, then it will come too late, because no one but the Government can reform the municipal institutions of London, and no Conservative Government would lay its hands on such excellent supporters as the City Corporation and the Metropolitan Board of Works. But it is obvious that such considerations as these can scarcely be put forward publicly. Nor is there any answer to the further point urged by Mr. Courtney that taxation is levied on people who are not even theoretically represented by the Board. The people of Croydon, for instance, the latest-born of English municipal boroughs, are up in arms against paying a tax the benefit of which they allege they do not get, and in the levying and expending of which they have no voice. Altogether, therefore, the Board of Works is in a fix, and it will be interesting to see how they endeavour to get themselves out of it.

Some cross-river communication is, no doubt, necessary. The enormous development of the dock system all the way down the river on both sides, to Greenwich and Woolwich, is quite modern, and the old London Bridge, which was an adequate means of communication till within the last thirty years, is now wholly inadequate. It is equally advisable that the Strand should be improved, and that the upper way to the Law Courts through Long Acre or through Covent Garden should be thrown open. The purchase of Covent Garden Market, the creation of Paddington Park, and innumerable other improvements are also urgently needed. But the urgency is one which will bear postponement until a body is created which will really represent London. Whether such an enormous expenditure as it sketches out is required or not is a question with which the Board is totally unfitted to deal. It was created for one definite purpose,—the drainage of London. This it has accomplished with eminent success, according to its lights, though already there are heard complaints that its lights were darkness. Its constitution does not fit it to decide on an expenditure of additional millions for a wholly different object. Still less is it a body fit to decide whether the enormous sums wanted shall be raised by a tax on a first necessity of life. If such a tax, which is wholly rejected in our national economy, is to find a place in municipal finance, it must be at the instance of the people who will be chiefly affected by it. There are, no doubt, difficulties in the way of increased rating, which practically amounts to a house-tax, and may, if unduly swollen, increase immensely the difficulties of finding decent dwellings for the poor. But it is quite possible that the representative Municipality of a united London would be able to dispense with either alternative. Even if the large funds of the City Guilds are not devoted to municipal purposes, the saving which will be effected by the fusion of the Corporation of the City and the Board of Works alone, to say nothing of the remodelling of Vestries and Local Boards, would be enormous. The direct expense of Parliamentary opposition, the duplication of necessary officials, and in the City the multiplication of unnecessary officials and their over-payment, would all be avoided. Then, by the transfer to the municipal authority of the powers of licensing the sale of alcoholic liquors, not only would money be saved, but probably a means might be found, if indirect taxation does approve itself to the new London, by which money might be made. But the time has not yet come for settling the principle on which London Finance is to be conducted. The reason why the Press and the public have taken so little interest in what might otherwise have proved an epoch-making letter, is that it is felt that the correspondence is not going on between the right parties. The expenditure and the revenue of London cannot be settled between the Board of Works and the Treasury. The people of London have yet to be taken into counsel. Before that can be done, they must be given a voice, and an organ by which they may make that voice heard. Mr. Courtney's letter is an additional proof, if proof were needed, of the necessity of a London Municipal Reform Bill. It is to be hoped it may be taken also as a proof that the Government feel its necessity so strongly, that next Session may see it not only introduced, but passed.

BANKS, AND THEIR CUSTOMERS.

THE case of Warden, the late Manager of the London and River Plate Bank, who was brought before the Magistrate at Guildhall last Monday, on a charge of theft, raises some curious points both of law and policy with regard to the conduct of Banking business. Warden is understood to be accused of stealing a large number of share certificates, bonds, and coupons, some of which had been deposited with the Bank by its customers to cover over-drafts, or otherwise secure their accounts; while the greater part had been left in its custody, according to a convenient and growing practice, for the purpose of collecting the dividends, or simply for safe-keeping. Upon these facts two questions of considerable interest, not only to the commercial world, but to almost everybody who has a banking account, are being debated in the City,—namely, first, what are the legal obligations of the Bank in respect of each of these classes of securities? and, second, if the Bank cannot be held responsible in law, whether, in its own interests and those of Bankers in general, it would be politic for it to assume in favour of its customers a liability which they cannot enforce? The question of law, though not, perhaps, so conclusively settled by judicial decision as has been generally taken for granted, does not appear to present any great difficulty of principle. In ordinary language, a customer is said to "deposit" money with his banker when he pays it in to the credit of his own account. And he is said to "deposit" bills or shares, whether he pledges them to secure an advance, or merely entrusts them for collection or safe custody. The same word is thus used to describe two entirely different contracts. When money is deposited with a banker, the relation created is the simple one of debtor and creditor. The banker is not bound to return the cash in specie; but he is bound to give back its equivalent, and he cannot release himself from his obligation even by showing that he has used the utmost diligence to fulfil it, and has been prevented by some unforeseen and unavoidable calamity. But when the subject-matter of the deposit is securities, the liabilities of the banker are those not of a debtor, but of a bailee. He is bound to return the very thing entrusted to him, unless prevented by some cause for which the law does not hold him responsible. The measure of his responsibility, as is the case with all bailees, depends upon whether he is or is not remunerated for his care. It is here that such uncertainty as there is in defining a banker's legal obligations arises. No one doubts that he is bound to take the most scrupulous care of securities which he receives in the ordinary course of his business, such, for instance, as stock pledged to cover advances; as to them, he is in the position of a paid bailee, and is liable for any loss that forethought and skill could have prevented. It seems almost equally clear, on the other hand, that when a customer makes use of the safe or strong-room of the Bank to deposit there a box of plate or securities, the Bank, which charges him nothing for rent, and adds nothing for this additional convenience to the commission which he would in any case pay, ought not to incur any liability for loss or injury to the things so entrusted to it, unless caused designedly or by gross negligence. And, according to a well-known decision of the Privy Council—which, however, is not binding on the English Courts, and though never disapproved, has never been expressly adopted—this is actually the law, the reason, of course, being that in such circumstances the Bank assumes only the obligations of a gratuitous bailee. There is, however, a third case of common occurrence which may fall on either side of the dividing line. Share certificates, and more particularly bonds with coupons attached, are frequently entrusted to a Bank by its customers, in order that it may receive the interest or dividends as they accrue. In such cases, the depositor's object being not only to avoid the risks of fire and theft, but to save himself the trouble of collection, the documents are as a rule not shut up in a box which he alone can open, but are handed to the Bank and kept by it in its own safes, so as to be available from time to time, when the coupons have to be detached and the dividends claimed. The degree of care which the Banks are bound to exercise in the custody of securities like these obviously depends upon whether they are or are not paid for the extra trouble they incur. If a specific commission is charged for the work (which, we believe, is rarely the case), there is, of course, no difficulty about the matter, and the Banks are liable for any loss that reasonable diligence could have averted. If no special charge is made, the question whether the Bank can be made responsible for anything short of gross negligence will depend upon whether this is a service which a Banker performs gratuitously, out of courtesy, and as a convenience to his customers, or whether it has become so common and natural an incident of his business, that he must be deemed to include a fair remuneration for it in the general profit which he expects and takes care to receive on each account.

Into the further inquiry whether the negligence alleged in the present instance was sufficiently "gross" to make the Bank responsible, even if it was in the position of a gratuitous bailee, we cannot enter, without appearing to prejudge a case which is still under investigation. But assuming that there has been no gross negligence, and that the Bank, if a gratuitous bailee, is, therefore, under no legal liability to make good the larger part of Warden's defalcations, there remains the question whether it may not still be its wisest policy to pay. The Directors, or rather the Shareholders, for the decision really rests with them, are being strongly urged, on grounds of self-interest, as well as of generosity, to settle the matter in this way. They are told that it has always been "understood" that Bankers were equally responsible for all securities entrusted to them; that to make the innocent depositors suffer for the crimes of the Bank's own servant is in any case a harsh and impolitic step; and that the shock to people's confidence in their Bankers will lead to a contraction in the scope and profitability of Banking business generally. These are for the most part merely sentimental arguments, and though sentiment has an important place of its own in business matters, it seems to us that it is here being pushed too far. Provided, of course, that there was no gross negligence, the Bank, we think, has every motive, both in its own interests and in those of the Banking world, to resist the claims which are now being made. The settlement of the question whether they are or are not gratuitous bailees, and liable only as such in respect of deposits of this kind, is of incalculable importance to the Bankers of London. Whichever way the decision goes, it can do them no harm. If they are held to be paid bailees, and therefore liable for such depredations as Warden's, they will be put on their guard, and set to work to devise some means of providing in future, by insurance or otherwise, against this head of loss. The new risk thus disclosed will, no doubt, be an exceedingly serious one for the Banks; how serious, any one may realise who attempts to imagine the value, in millions, of the Securities which are deposited in the various Banks within a radius of a quarter of a mile of Capel Court. There is not the least reason, however, to fear that the Banks would withdraw the facilities which they have hitherto given; it would certainly not be to their interest to do so, more especially as they would find little difficulty in getting their depositing customers to consent to the charge of an extra commission, rather than lose an indispensable convenience. If, on the other hand, the Banks are decided to be, as they contend they are, gratuitous bailees, we do not believe that there will be the slightest appreciable diminution in the volume of their business. Men will continue to deposit their shares and bonds with the Banks for custody and collection, because, when all is said, they are safer there than at home; and the chance of possible loss through the dishonesty of cashiers or the negligence of directors, is not to be compared with the convenience and freedom from constant anxiety which are thus secured. Nothing is more harmful to a great Bank than a reputation for carelessness, and this consideration alone is enough to convince its customers that precautions will be taken for the safe-keeping of their deposits far beyond any which they could devise or carry out themselves, and such as only a very daring and very skilful criminal can defeat.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT ON ENGLISH CRIME.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT, in his opening address to the section of the Social Science Congress which concerns itself with the Repression of Crime, dealt with a number of questions upon which his position and experience enable him to speak with peculiar authority. Few people were probably aware, until he spoke, of the magnitude of the burden which Crime imposes on the country. Its direct cost in Great Britain alone he estimates as amounting to almost £6,000,000 per annum. No less than 74,000 persons are engaged in the work of detection and punishment. Out of the whole population, nearly one in every 36 is apprehended each year, though not more than a quarter of these are charged with grave offences. But, serious as these figures are, there seems no reason to doubt that the spread of primary education and the growth of temperance during the last ten years are slowly draining the sources from which the Criminal Class draws its normal supply. The number of convicts under sentence was practically the same in 1882 as in 1871, though the population had in the interval grown by nearly 12 per cent. This shows a gratifying increase in the average security of the community, and Mr. Vincent, while giving due credit to the various reforming agencies which have been and are at work, assigns the largest share in the improvement which has been brought about to the better organisation and growing efficiency of the Police, as a preventive and protective force. He admits, however, that much still remains to be done, and is apparently inclined to hope for a centralised administration of the ordinary Police. His arguments on this head, strong as they are in themselves, and moderately and judiciously expressed, will not convert the Municipalities. It is quite true that under the present system, there is a great waste both of labour and money, that the service as a whole is over-officered, that the small local forces are unequal to emergencies, and that invaluable time is often lost, and precious energy squandered in mere friction, through the want of a central, directing authority. Nevertheless, Englishmen are so strongly convinced that the control of the Police is a necessary incident of local self-government, and have on the whole, with all its drawbacks, so much reason to regard the system introduced when the Corporations were reformed in 1835 as superior to any which has been tried elsewhere, that there is not the least chance of Mr. Vincent's scheme being realised. The case of London, no doubt, stands on a different footing. London (if we except the City) has never had the management of its own Police, and the Metropolitan Force, though paid by the ratepayers, has always been in reality a branch of the Imperial Service. And there are strong reasons, in the size of the Metropolis, the vastness of its population, and the peculiar dangers to which it is exposed as the seat of the Central Government, why this arrangement should continue. Mr. Vincent declares, and most people will believe him, that on many occasions during the last three years the work of the Police would have been paralysed, if the Home Secretary had had to obtain the sanction of a Municipal Council for his orders. The possible abuses of a system of divided control may be seen fully developed in Paris, where the Prefect directs and the Radical Council pays the Police, and where the friction between the two authorities is so constant that there have been no less than ten prefects in fifteen years. It is, in any case, impossible to leave the Central Government without a civil force at its disposal, and the necessary result of the transfer of the Metropolitan Force to the new London Municipality would be the creation of a State Police, subject only to the Home Office, and paid out of Imperial funds.

Upon the subject of the examination and trial of suspected persons, Mr. Vincent, though not altogether satisfied with our traditional methods, is not in favour of any radical change. He has no desire to increase the inquisitorial powers of the Police, or to introduce in any shape the secret preliminary examination conducted by the Juge d'Instruction under the French and kindred forms of procedure. Readers of Gaboriau's novels, who have learnt from that graphic writer the frightful odds against which, in France, an innocent prisoner has to struggle, will agree with Mr. Vincent that "one of the great merits of the English system lies in the absence of all Magisterial interest in conviction, and the freedom of the Magistrate from all responsibility for the acts of the Police." The interrogation of the prisoner in open Court by the Judge who ultimately tries him is quite a different matter, and Mr. Vincent, as might be expected, strongly advocates this innovation. The rule that a person accused of a criminal charge may not give evidence, even if he wishes to do so, is a curious instance of a survival which has acquired in its old age a new lease of life. It was once an inflexible principle of English procedure, both civil and criminal, that neither of the parties to the suit were competent witnesses, it being presumed that their interest in the issue disentitled their testimony to credit. The result was that in many cases the only first-hand evidence was not forthcoming, and the absurdity came in time to be so strongly felt, that the rule in question was long since banished from our Civil Courts. That it has lived on as a part of our Criminal procedure is due to two causes,—first, to the fact that it never excluded the evidence of the real prosecutor, the Crown being the nominal plaintiff on the trial of an indictment; and, second, to the notion that if the prisoner was allowed to be a witness, he must necessarily risk the traps and pitfalls of cross-examination. No one, however, proposes to put the prisoner in the position of an ordinary witness. Mr. Vincent thinks, and we agree with him, that the interrogation should be by the Judge, and not by counsel. It would, of course, be confined to the facts of the case, and not travel, as it does in France, over the whole life and antecedents of the accused. And the prisoner should be permitted to refuse to answer, without being liable to be committed for contempt, or to any modern substitute for the old peine forte et dure. With these securities, we cannot doubt that Mr. Vincent is right in his opinion that the interrogation of the prisoner would prevent many miscarriages of justice, and at the same time provide an additional safeguard for the conviction of the guilty.

In the matter of punishment, Mr. Vincent believes that a much sharper distinction should be made between first and subsequent offences. "With the rarest exception," he says, "a second conviction should entail a sentence of penal servitude, and a third, one of at least fifteen years." On the other hand, in the case of a first conviction for any crime except one of great gravity, or involving personal violence, he thinks that the object should be "to find some means of reforming the character, without giving the prison taint." The system of releasing upon probation persons found guilty of a first offence has been tried with considerable success in Massachusetts, and has undoubtedly much to recommend it. A second conviction means, as a rule, that the prisoner has definitely cast in his lot with the class of habitual criminals, and to a man who has once been in prison the descent into that class is easy and short. Mr. Vincent knows more, probably, than any one else of the hardships with which discharged prisoners have to contend, but we cannot help feeling some doubt of the wisdom of such systematic lenity to first offences as he seems to contemplate. Would the position of a person "out on probation" be much easier in the matter of getting honest work, and regaining a character, than that of a prisoner who had served out his sentence? We question whether it would, when this mode of treatment had become the rule, instead of being, as now, rare and exceptional. And does not Mr. Vincent, in his compassion for the criminal, lose sight too much of the interest which Society has in making crime dangerous and terrible? It is before the habit of crime has been formed that the deterrent effect of punishment is most powerful, and the systematic condonation by the State of first offences would remove the one fear which keeps many a recruit from joining the army of criminals.

SCOTLAND AS THE POLITICAL FORUM.

MR. GIBSON speaks far too much and poses far too frequently as the all-round politician and rattling partisan; the Tories will never take every Somebody's lieutenant as their leader. But he is as anxious as Sir William Harcourt himself to ascertain how the cat jumps; and being a clever man—although he draws very recklessly on the capital of his cleverness—he occasionally hits the mark. He has done so once in the course of his curious and protracted effort to convert Scotland to Conservatism by Irish blarney and burlesque finance. Speaking at Forres, on Tuesday, to an audience representing the Conservatism of the more northern counties, he said that "one of the greatest and most lasting uses of such meetings was that it encouraged people to think of political questions, and enabled them to hear the views of public men." This is at least a half-truth. The people of Scotland need no encouragement to think on political questions, unless, indeed, it be the minority that are admitted by ticket to hear Mr. Gibson and other Tory missionaries. They are born with Mr. Bright's belief that the only things worth thinking and talking about are religion and politics. But if Mr. Gibson has come to the conclusion that Scotch audiences like to hear public men speak, and speak their best, he is quite right; they enjoy, above all things, what they style "a real intellectual treat." "Sure I am," said Mr. Grant Duff some years ago, "that in Scotland, at least, every man who wants to succeed with a popular audience should make the best and most statesmanlike speech he can." Mr. Grant Duff's practice squared with his theory. The "political surveys" which he was in the habit of addressing to the bourgeoisie of the Elgin Burghs were polished essays that might have appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes in its best days. He had his reward; his "surveys" earned him two Under-Secretaryships, and, finally, the Governorship of Madras.

The late Mr. Bagehot, a thinker very much after the Scotch heart, and still more after the Scotch head, describes the essence of our present political system as "government by discussion;" and the Scotch have interpreted this as government by public meeting. The Midlothian campaign has brought this fact home to the Tory leaders, and as their manner is, they are rather overdoing their appreciation of it. They go to Ireland to call to arms an old ally of Conservatism. They penetrate the Midlands to defy Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Schnadhorst, though perhaps rather in the Pistol, than in the grand, style,—

Boy, bristle thy courage up; for Falstaff he is dead."

But they go to Scotland ostensibly, and indeed ostentatiously, to convince by argumentation alone, a hostile and eminently intelligent public opinion. Last year, Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote were commissioned to storm the chief Liberal strongholds of the North. This year, Mr. Gibson has taken out letters of marque as a political privateer, and tries to cut a prize out of every Scotch port. Sir Richard Cross and Lord Randolph Churchill are advertised to follow. Mr. Mallock, if he gets encouragement from the St. Andrews Burghs, will endeavour to persuade a people governed by the traditions of three centuries of Presbyterian parity, that "equality is not a condition to which we should make any efforts to approximate; and that, so far from being in any way a goal of progress, it is, on the contrary, the goal of retrogression instead." The Liberal Associations have been put upon their mettle by these extraordinary displays of propagandist Conservatism, and have engaged the services of some of the best stars their Party possesses. On Friday of last week, Sir Farrer Herschell answered at Ayr the swaggering sophisms of Mr. Gibson, in perhaps the best partisan speech he has ever delivered. Dumfries itself, to which Mr. Gibson first appealed, will hear the other side of the question from the Attorney-General before the month is out. Ere the year comes to an end, both Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain are expected to appear in some of the leading centres of Scotch trade and industry.

The superior intelligence of the people of Scotland, as a whole, is commonly assigned as the reason why that country is becoming the recognised forum for political discussion in the United Kingdom. It is, no doubt, the chief and fundamental reason; and being so obvious, need not be dwelt upon. But there are other things that, though connected with this superior intelligence of the Scotch people, are worthy of independent consideration. For one, Scotchmen, as we have already remarked, have a genuine liking for public meetings and political speeches. The bias of the Northern mind to discussion is notorious. Besides, the Scotch Democracy—Scotland would be the purest Democracy in the Old World, but for the over-lordship of its landed proprietors, who are not numerous enough to crowd a Belgravian drawing-room—has been trained to see everything affecting its material and even its spiritual welfare settled by controversy publicly conducted. Up to the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, it can scarcely be said to have had a political existence. But it had an intensely religious and ecclesiastical existence. Its tribunes were the Presbyterian clergy, and they thoroughly understood and unflinchingly exercised their power. Four-fifths of the Scotch enfranchised democracy were, and are, Presbyterians; and the methods of Presbyterianism are more easily applicable to the work of government by discussion than those of any other ecclesiastical system. So far as Scotland is concerned, the Free-trade question, the overthrow of Lord Beaconsfield, political reform itself, have been settled in much the same way as was the question of a Disruption in the Church of Scotland, or as the Disestablishment question will be. Whichever side or cause in a dispute can show the largest and most enthusiastic public meetings in its favour is sure to win in the long run. So, to take a question of present interest, England will scarcely be convinced that the Scotch people are united in favour of the present movement for a change in their administrative arrangements—a movement upon which we now express no opinion whatever—unless successful public meetings in its support are held all over the country during the Recess. It is thus not only a superior but a trained intelligence that, to the north of the Tweed, is brought to bear upon the consideration of public questions, and that delights in political dialectic. That discussion there should be essentially decorous, and should consist essentially of appeals and counter-appeals, not to passion, but to reason, may easily be traced to the fact that only such an intelligence takes part in such discussion. But it is a very important fact, nevertheless. If Lord Randolph Churchill is ever to appear to any purpose as an apostle of Conservatism in Scotland, he must drop the rôle of the gamin of his Party and the vitriol-thrower of his caste, and endeavour to prove himself the serious politician he declares Sir William Harcourt not to be. Scotland is the forum, but it will never become the cockpit of political discussion. May not, too, the present-day desire for effect in all departments of life have something to do with the starring of politicians in the North? After all, Mr. Gibson, chaperoned by Peers, followed by reporters, and applauded by the train bands of Scotch Conservatism, is a more picturesque figure than Mr. Gibson acting as bottleholder to Lord Salisbury at a banquet in the Midlands, and with only a couple of his sentences reported in the Times.

What is the real object of the now annual Tory invasions of Scotland? Are all these demonstrations and speeches intended merely to add a cabful to the Conservative strength at next General Election? Under present political conditions in Scotland, and granting a Conservative reaction, the Salisbury-Gibson crusade will not do more than this. On the contrary, if we could suppose a Household Suffrage Bill for Counties passed in 1885, a couple of hansoms would probably suffice, after the General Election of 1886, to convey the Tory Members from the North from King's Cross or St. Pancras to St. Stephen's. We believe there is more in the crusade than this. We believe that the leaders of the Tory party are firmly convinced that there is a religious, material, and social Conservatism in Scotland, and hope to convert it. They are right, so far. The Scotch people have never shown any love for change, simply as change, and not for a purpose clearly defined. Innovators and innovations invariably receive from them the cold shoulder at first. There is in Scotland more of that providence which seems the natural basis for middle-class Conservatism than there is in England. Two Scotchmen, it has lately been proved, insure their lives for one Englishman. There is no evidence that the agrarian Socialism of the day is making any way in Scotland. Considering how completely its population is cut off from its soil on the one hand, and how powerless from a political point of view its landed class is on the other, it might have seemed marked out as a special field for the proselytising energies of Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace and the other advocates of Land Nationalisation. But this new movement appears to be making no way in the North, and certainly does not affect Scotch politics of the present day. The trained intelligence of Scotland does not dream, but neither does it allow itself to be frightened by shadows, or satisfied with a Barmecide feast of phrases. A writer in the National Review for this month tries to account for the dearth of Conservatism in Scotland by saying that it is badly organised, and that "local Conservatives" are rather uppish. The explanation is, however, inadequate, although there may be something in the latter half of it. The truth simply is that the Scotch people are not only intelligent, but grateful to the Party that has always been identified with the advancement of their welfare. "The Scotch nation," says Mr. Gibson, "is a nation that is for wise change and well-considered progress." Precisely so; but then, the Scotch nation invariably finds the true Tory leaders opposing change when it has been clearly shown to be wise, and seeking to retard progress when the time for consideration is past, and the time for action has come. Is it at all wonderful that it should hesitate to believe that at last the Ethiopian has changed his skin? Scotland did not give over muzzling the dry bones of political economy, even at the solicitation of a Disraeli, from whom it took Household Suffrage without thanks. It will not, to please Mr. Gibson, rally to the defence of "the rights of property,"—which, if not simply an unmeaning phrase, represent little more than the bitter memories of generations of caste domination.

AN ARMY THAT DOES NOT INVADE.

THE neutrality of Switzerland has endured so long, and come to be regarded so much as a part of the established order of Europe, that we are apt to overlook the dangers to which it has been exposed in the past and may be exposed in the future, and to forget that the Confederation owes its immunity from attack no less to the jealousy of its neighbours than to the valour of its sons. Since the crowning victories of Morat and Nancy, Helvetian liberty has been in no serious danger, save during the portentous period which began with the downfall of the Bourbons and ended with the overthrow of Napoleon; and even the conqueror of Europe, at the height of his power, considered it expedient to restore to the Cantons much of the independence of which they had been deprived by his Jacobin predecessors of the Directory. Switzerland was the only country of Central Europe which he did not either despoil or annex, for Geneva, though an ally, had never been a member of the Confederation. For this there were several reasons. Switzerland had been mastered, not conquered, by the Directory; and if a part of the population, who were disgusted with the tyranny of the Lords of Berne, and beguiled by the promises of their soi-disant liberators, had not sided with the French, the task of the latter would have been unspeakably more difficult than it proved, and it proved no holiday work. After Berne and the Waldstätten had either voluntarily or involuntarily accepted the terms imposed by the French Commissioners, and the Constitution prepared at Paris, Schwyz, with a little help from Glarus and Uri, rose in rebellion, and fought so desperately as to extort the admiration of the Generals of the Directory, who declared that they had never "seen anything warmer in La Vendée." It was the resistance of Schwyz that saved the independence of the Confederation. They said at Paris that the Swiss deserved to live, because they knew how to die; and although the idea of annexing the country to his future Empire more than once occurred to Napoleon, he finally decided that it was better to have Switzerland for a friend than an enemy, and agreed, in 1803, to a Treaty of Alliance, the conditions of which, considering the circumstances, were singularly favourable. One of the conditions was the furnishing by the Confederation of a military contingent for service in whatever part of Europe it might please the First Consul to employ them. These troops served him with the traditional fidelity of Swiss soldiers of fortune; they fought in all his wars, and were amongst the few who, amid the horrors of the Moscow retreat, neither lost discipline nor abandoned hope.

By the Treaty of Vienna, the neutrality of Switzerland was placed under the protection of Europe, and albeit recent events have done much to impair the sanctity of international engagements, the causes which have so long favoured the maintenance of Swiss independence still endure. Of the four great States that encompass the Confederation, there is probably not one that does not covet a slice of its territory. Germany would find it very convenient to hold the northern portal of the St. Gothard Tunnel; Austria would gladly obtain a footing on the south bank of the Boden See; Italian patriots regard Ticino as a part of Unredeemed Italy; and the operations of France in the next war would be immeasurably facilitated by possession of the country between Lake Lemán and the Jura. But the attempt of any one of these Powers to convert its desires into realities would draw upon it the hostility of the rest, plus Switzerland, now stronger than ever before, and at this moment the independence of the Confederation is probably as secure as at any period of its history. Whatever danger the future may have in store for Switzerland will arise rather from an unforeseen violation of its neutrality than from a deliberate design against its independence. To this danger Swiss statesmen are fully alive, and to a sense of its existence are due the Constitution of 1874 and the present military organisation of the country. Nothing short of the imminent peril of 1871, when Western Switzerland was within an ace of being turned into a cockpit, would have induced the Cantons to consent to the changes which rendered possible compulsory military service and a central administration for the Army. If Bourbaki's forces had been less disorganised when they crossed the frontier at Verviers, or General Herzog, the commander of the Swiss forces, had displayed less energy and presence of mind, the contest might have been continued on the soil of the Confederation, to the utter ruin of the country. In the next war the danger may be even greater, for the French will be under strong temptation to strike at Germany on the side of Switzerland; and though such a measure would array the Swiss against them, they might hope to achieve their object before the Federal forces could offer any effective resistance. In these circumstances, it is the policy of Switzerland, while avoiding the danger and cost of a standing army, to have such an organisation as will enable her Government to mobilise swiftly a force sufficient to bar the way to any foreign army which may attempt to traverse her territory, until the allies whom the occasion would enlist on her side could come to her help. To this end, the Confederation, like its neighbours, has adopted the system of compulsory military service. As every valid Switzer reaches his twenty-first year, he is called out for six weeks' drill; and every other year thereafter, until he has passed his thirty-first year, he undergoes at least three weeks' training. At thirty-two he passes into the Landwehr, and is called out for ten days' drill every alternate year. In the Artillery, the first term of training is six months; the same for the Cavalry, who provide their own horses. Aspirants for commissions undergo special training at Thun, and non-commissioned officers are also specially instructed. The men are called out merely by bills affixed to the walls, which mention the time and place of muster. Those who neither appear nor send properly attested proof of illness—the only excuse accepted—are treated as deserters; but the absentees are singularly few, for military service in Switzerland is regarded more as a pleasure than a burden. The arm of the Infantry is the Vetterli rifle, an excellent weapon; and as the men are allowed to retain their rifles, and tirs, both cantonal and communal, are frequent and popular, the Swiss Militia are probably better shots than the "Regulars" of any neighbouring country. So far as discipline and organisation are concerned, the Artillery leaves little to be desired; but the guns are growing somewhat out of date, and the Federal Council have it in contemplation to replace them with a weapon more on a par with present requirements. The Swiss Army of élite, which corresponds with the active armies of Germany and France, and comprises all the trained men in the country between twenty and thirty-two, consists of about 160,000, who could be mobilised in fourteen days, and in defence of their native mountains would probably prove a match for the best troops in Europe. By calling out the Landwehr, their numbers could be increased to 250,000, and Switzerland possesses half-a-million citizens who have been trained to arms, and who, if the need arose, would be available for the protection of her neutrality. The Swiss Army is organised purely for defence. It costs the country less than a million a year, and it is hardly possible that it should ever be used for offensive purposes. It is an Army that does not invade, and if other armies were formed on the same model, the danger of war and the pressure of taxation might be reduced to a minimum. A general disarmament is no more practicable than a general abandonment of the system of universal military service, and universal military service is too much in accordance with the fitness of things and the principle of democratic equality for its abandonment to be possible. But there is everywhere a constant tendency to shorten the term of service, to approximate, if ever so slowly, to the Swiss system, to lighten the burden while maintaining the organisation, a tendency that in the end may convert the hosts which at present threaten the peace and exhaust the resources of Europe into armies as strong for defence, and as unfitted for aggression, as the Citizen Army of Switzerland.

CIVILISATION AND POETRY.

WE always read Mr. Mark Pattison with pleasure, and a wish that he would bestow his lighter thoughts on us more frequently, but we do not exactly follow the discourse on Poetry which he delivered on Wednesday to the ladies of Bedford College. The report is not very good, but we understand him to say that the appreciation of poetry which should be, and in part is, an attribute of civilisation is greatly impaired in our modern society by two principal causes. One is the quantity of good criticism poured out, which makes readers look through a haze until they do not see what the poet actually says; and the other is the tendency to immersion in the business of life, or among women, in household cares. "Life in great towns makes leisure and solitude more and more rare and difficult to obtain and yet without these it is difficult to cultivate the poetic emotion. The habit of living at high pressure even makes leisure and solitude insupportable, when we can get them; as with alcoholic stimulants, when the high pressure is removed the nerve-force collapses. The over-stimulated soul has no power to respond to the gentle and natural invitations with which common things solicit our love."

With the first statement we have not much quarrel. There must, it is true, have been plenty of criticism among the audience who watched and enjoyed Euripides, or the cynical nobles who listened to "the stateliest measure ever moulded by the lips of man," as Virgil recited, yet we do not find that they failed in an appreciation which, for one thing, sent those poets down to us through the ages; but still it is doubtless true that even good criticism may obscure certain meanings, while it throws white-light on others. We read the poets with our thoughts filled with criticisms till, instead of studying what they say, we are reconciling their words with the opinions on them. We listen to Fechter, to see if the Press is right. We can all verify that by remembering how study and critics have obscured for many of us the poetry of the Bible, till men read passages like the thirty-eighth chapter of Job without an idea that they are listening to a burst of poetic praise as unrivalled in the revealingness of its thought as in its majestic melody. A haze has been created, as Mr. Pattison says, until we can hardly see. But the second allegation is more serious, for if the complexity and the movement, the rapid life and the sordid cares, of our modern existence interfere with or intercept the appreciation of poetry, then the greatest of all methods of cultivation has been ruined, and the world has lost the strongest except one of all its ennobling influences. Life will not grow simpler or money-making less necessary, and if Mr. Pattison is right, the appreciation of poetry will steadily decline. We cannot think that is so, and would ask all who read Mr. Mark Pattison—and who misses anything that he writes in that iced and flavoured English of his?—to consider some arguments on the other side.

Does immersion in the world's work, even if it be in house-keeping and the care of babies, hinder the appreciation of poetry? A priori, it should not, for it does not hinder its production. A soldier wrote "Prometheus Bound." A King in difficulties, fighting daily for leave to exist, composed the majority of the Psalms. A Vizier poured out the marvellous hymns which we call the Prophecies of Isaiah. Shakespeare did his most poetic work while immersed in the cares of his theatre, paying every court to society, and making the money he needed to get away from it all. Byron was steeped to the lips in affairs, often discreditable and harassing; Goethe was a Premier; Victor Hugo is a politician; Mr. Morris decorates our houses, and in business is not to be taken in. If the production of such poetry is possible to men essentially of the world, and loving the world, doing its work among crowds, and distracted with hourly and imperative calls on their attention, why should the appreciation of poetry be so impossible to men similarly situated? Could poets have written, if they did not appreciate? It is not so in Art. On the contrary, it is when life is at its busiest, when men are fullest of work and most steeped in interests, when living has grown most complex and man is most distracted by details, that Art and the appreciation of Art reach their highest levels. Athenian Art rose highest under Pericles, surely no time of inactivity. Life has never been so full among mankind as in the Italy of the Renaissance, when men both produced and appreciated architecture, painting, statuary as they have never done since—the appreciators being, first of all, Kings, Cardinals, and busy nobles—or are doing only now, when in bubbling Paris and seething London, Art, if it reaches no lofty level of execution, is at least a worship. If civilisation does not crush Art, what is there in it which should crush poetry, or the appreciation of poetry, which, equally with the appreciation of Art, requires a developed feeling for beauty? As a matter of fact, it does not, and not only is the poetry of our day singularly, almost specially poetic, but the appreciation of it is nowhere so keen as in City parlours, in politicians' libraries, in the boudoirs of over-busy women, and in the offices of critics distracted by a million interruptions. It is quite true that solitude and reflection are essential to insight into poetry, as well as enjoyment of it; but Mr. Pattison confounds the external life with the internal, and forgets that the mind may be as lonely and as detached in Lombard Street as on the top of Helvellyn—may, indeed, be more lonely, for the rush of the City attracts the attention of the poetic less than the sweep of the clouds across the mountain's face. How can the man who can see enjoy even Wordsworth, when the storm sweeps over Helvellyn? how not enjoy, when in an office in Cheapside the innumerable murmur of the human bees is borne in on one low-sounding roar? That many men and more women immersed in affairs do not appreciate poetry is true, but it is not in consequence of the immersion, but of something in their own inner natures on which poetry makes no more impression than art upon the blind. No doubt, in the multitudinousness of our people the poet seems to make far less impression than he ought; but does any man who appeals to the ear make more, except, perhaps, the preacher, who says he can tell the crowds the secret of the Whence and Whither? That disparity is natural, for to the man expecting death the words of the doctor are of more import than even those of his wife; but who among secular writers has the audience of a Tennyson, or when can appreciation have been more universal than that which, in the choked streets of Glasgow, as much as on the silent pastures of Ayr, follows the poetry of Robert Burns? The body of men appreciate no literature of any kind, and probably to the end of time never will; but the largest section of admirers is reserved for the singer.

It seems to us that the great obstacle placed by civilisation in the way of the appreciation of Poetry is not the bustle it produces, or even the mental dissipation it encourages, but the cleavage it effects between the educated and uneducated, a cleavage so deep that what charms the one will not interest the other, and a poet appreciated by a whole people can hardly arise. The cultivated tend to become reflective, while the people remain emotional; and the poet who feels acutely the influence of culture, even if he has it not himself, gives out first that which attracts the cultivated most. Thousands of men in every grade admire Mr. Tennyson, but for the body of the people, "In Memoriam" is almost sealed, their religion is so distinct. They can and do feel "The Death of Wellington" and "Locksley Hall," but not "Ulysses," still less "Tithonus." This is a great evil, perhaps an irreparable one; but great poets have sung to small nationalities, and it is the only evil influence on poetry which can be distinctly traced to civilisation. After all, the Railway and the Telegraph are not such mighty advances that we should think ourselves so different from the men who learned Homer or Valmiki by heart, or quoted to each other with cheerful gusto the last songs of Horace.

THE COST OF LIVING IN SWITZERLAND.

THE superstition that living abroad is necessarily cheaper than living at home still lingers, and hundreds of families every year betake themselves to the Continent, in the hope of bettering their condition by reducing their expenditure. This end they generally attain, albeit by the adoption of means which, if they were adopted at home, would produce a similar result. There was a time when the prime necessities of life were cheaper on the Continent than in England, but the extension of railways has equalised food prices all over Europe, and, except in a few outlying countries, whither only travellers careless of comfort ever venture, flesh meat and bread-stuffs are now nowhere much cheaper than they are in England. On the other hand, coal, exotic produce, and all sea-borne articles are considerably dearer abroad than at home. The manufacturing supremacy and Free-trade policy of the United Kingdom have made it, for clothing, the cheapest country in the world; while, against the comparative dearthness of dairy produce, a dearthness due to the legal and social discouragement of small farms, may be set off the far greater cheapness of fish. Of some other items of domestic expenditure, such as education, house-rent, taxes, and servants' wages, we shall speak presently.

The country at present most affected by English families in search of economy is, probably, Switzerland. It possesses several varieties of climate, highly attractive scenery, and foreign residents (unless they happen to be members of the Salvation Army) enjoy greater liberties and immunities than elsewhere in Europe. The permis de séjour, though still exacted, is little more than a matter of form, and by the payment of a trifling fee you may have a permis d'établissement good for the entire duration of your stay, however long it may be. Sojourners in Switzerland, moreover, have the choice of two languages, and the chance of cheaper education than is to be found either in France or Germany; while, in the former country, the cost of living has been greatly enhanced since 1871 by heavy taxation, and in the latter by the protective policy of Prince Bismarck. Taking everything into consideration, Switzerland offers to English families for whom economy is a necessity greater advantages than any other part of the Continent. No Commune is without its free school, and the more advanced Cantons—Berne, Zurich, Geneva, Vaud, and others—possess educational institutions equal to any of their class in Europe, and in which instruction is imparted at an almost nominal cost. The College of Geneva, founded by Calvin, which may take rank with any English public school, gives a liberal education at the rate of twenty francs a year, and the fees at the secondary and superior girls' schools are on an equally moderate scale. The fees at the Gymnase are forty francs a year for each of the two sections, technical and commercial, so that if a pupil were to take both, which, however, no pupil ever does, the total cost would be £3 4s. 4d. The charges at the Conservatoire de Musique are 50f. for six months' instruction in any one branch, and the School of Design is free to pupils who make a point of regular attendance. The fees at the University, the Schools of Chemistry and Industrial Arts, are relatively quite as reasonable; and as private lessons are also very cheap, Geneva is probably the most desirable city in Europe for folks with large families and small incomes. But there is a reverse to every medal, and as none of these institutions are self-supporting, and all (except the Conservatoire) are subsidised either by the municipality or the State, taxes are necessarily high, almost as high as in England, although Switzerland has neither standing army, navy, Court, nor Foreign Office. The rate of taxation in Geneva, including local imposts, is at the rate of seventy-six francs, a shade over £3 a head of population. In no other Canton is this rate exceeded, in many Cantons it is much less; but none, perhaps, possess equal educational facilities, or offer them on the same liberal terms alike to foreigners and citizens. Apart from education, it would not seem that the cost of living is any less in Geneva, or elsewhere in Switzerland, than in England. It is difficult to compare house-rents, so much depends on situation and accommodation; but there is no question that rents abroad are generally higher than rents at home. They are higher at Paris, Berlin, and Vienna than in any large English city, and they are higher in the environs of Zurich, Geneva, and Berne than in the environs of London. According to a careful estimate which appeared some time ago in a Zurich paper, the cost of building in London is little more than half the cost of building at Zurich. This difference is due less to any great difference in the price of the materials used by English builders than to the greater efficiency of English labour, the skill with which it is directed, and the more general use in this country of labour-saving appliances. Rents, therefore, are higher, perhaps ten to twenty per cent. higher, in Switzerland than in England; coal is dearer—it costs in Geneva £1 15s. a ton—tea, coffee, sugar, currants, petroleum, tinned meats, pottery, hardware, and clothing are very much dearer. Dairy produce and vegetables, on the other hand, are cheaper; so are servants' wages. A Genevan housemaid is satisfied with £10 to £12 a year; a cook considers herself well paid with from £12 to £16. The cheapness of wine, even for those who like it, is not an unalloyed blessing. Your servants take it with their dinners and suppers as a matter of course; when you employ a gardener, he expects a bottle a day; every man who brings a parcel, or who does an odd job, wants a drink; low prices induce increased consumption, and the net result is not economy.

Theoretically, then, housekeeping is no cheaper in Switzerland than in England, and if people do, in fact, live less expensively in the former country than the latter, it is because they live more simply. English families who at home inhabit a country house or a suburban villa, and keep five or six servants, when they settle for a season at Geneva hire an appartement in a second story and keep a housemaid and a cook, or, perhaps, a maid-of-all-work. They have emancipated themselves from the yoke of Mrs. Grundy, and the simpler living of their new neighbours makes thrift seem easier and more natural. Large fortunes are rare in Switzerland, and the salaries of public functionaries are very modest. The President of the Confederation receives for his services only £600 a year; few Judges receive more than £250, and there is probably no bank manager in the country with a salary of more than twice that amount. A man with an income of £500 is considered very well off indeed, and to have £1,000 a year is to be "passing rich." An English family, consisting of six persons—four of them children—having, say, £500 a year, and desiring to settle in Geneva and practise economy, would probably take an unfurnished appartement on a second or third story, which with taxes might cost them £60 a year. Two servants at £22, and education (including books and some private lessons), would bring up their fixed expenditure to £100, leaving £400 disposable for food, clothing, and et ceteras. How much our economical family should spend on clothing is not easy to say; but if they were very careful, and the mistress a good manager, £60 to £70 would go a long way. As for food, if they lived as the Swiss live, profiting by the cheapness of vegetable and dairy produce, and not being extravagant in butcher meat, they might perhaps provide it, together with firing and lights, for about £200 a year more, leaving for sundries and the unforeseen a margin of £130. In the country, considerably less would suffice; but the country does not offer the same facilities for education, for attending the gratuitous lectures organised by the University, and for amusements. For people with small families, or with no families at all, lodgings are perhaps cheaper than house-keeping. In Geneva, Lausanne, and almost every other Swiss city, pension may be obtained at from four to six francs a day, in the country for very much less. An American gentleman known to the writer, who came to Europe for the benefit of his health, and for whom economy was a necessity, found at Yverdon, on the Lake of Neuchâtel, a pension which took him, his wife, child, and nurse at the rate of 12 francs, say 10s. a day, everything included. He had two bedrooms and a sitting-room, everything was scrupulously clean and neat, and the fare, though plain, was sufficient and substantial. But Yverdon is a terribly dull place, and there are few English people who, save under pressure of necessity, would consent to spend a winter in a quiet Swiss village unfrequented by their countrymen. There are probably places in England where it would be possible to live as cheaply as at Yverdon. So far as Geneva is concerned, the greatest advantage it offers to foreign residents, apart from its fine situation and bracing climate, consists in the wonderful cheapness, variety, and efficiency of its educational institutions, as to which it is unsurpassed, perhaps unequalled, by any other Continental city.

MODERN EDUCATION AND HEALTH.

WE confess that we regard with much suspicion the outcry which is heard from time to time now-a-days against our system of Elementary Education, on the ground that it is injuring the health of pupils and teachers. The charge is brought, as a rule, by those who have been opposed to the whole scheme of Compulsory Education, or, at least, who are but half-hearted supporters of it, and always eager to keep it down strictly to "the Three R's." Still, after allowance is made for prejudices, there remain some statistics and opinions of men of weight which show that the question, though often discussed, has not been by any means settled as yet. The address of Mr. Teale, President of the Health Department at the Social Science Congress, on Monday, brings it again to the front.

Intellectual quickness is clearly not characteristic of the masses of the English race in England. There is nothing in the Standards which prevail in our Elementary Schools which ought to render it difficult for children of a bright, average intelligence to pass them. In Scotland and in Germany, harder tests are applied with better results than our Standards give us here, but some explanation of this fact may be supplied by the consideration that the system has been in full working in those countries for a long time. Are we trying to do in a few years what requires a longer period? Is it the case that, in those countries, in the words of Mr. Teale, "the science by which Educational requirements are brought into harmony with growth, development, and health has attained a point of perfection from which the English Educational system is separated by a long interval?" If it be so, we shall have to ask ourselves what quantity of pressure it is legitimate or allowable to bring to bear upon the English children of school age so as to make up, as far as possible, for the time lost. We can do nothing in the matter till we obtain definite information from those best qualified to report on the effects of our present system on the general health. Mere vague allegations or even isolated proved instances of harm done are of no real value, unless, indeed, we are to lay down the thesis that there is no excuse for removing an abuse, where the remedy applied falls short of perfection in its application. The system of compulsory education in its present form is not to be condemned by showing that here and there it has done harm when injudiciously applied, especially when we consider how millions have been trained by it to become better citizens and better men. We have no separate heading as yet in the Registrar-General's Reports for Competitive Examination, beside zymotic and other diseases. The true principle of criticism in such a case is to measure what is against what was, and its mischiefs against the mischiefs of the old no-system, and then to decide between them.

Still, perfection being the point towards which the statesman must steer, it is highly desirable that this question of health in relation to Elementary Education should receive a prompt solution. It is a question which will press for an answer more and more with time, for the inevitable drift of our Educational system must be towards Standards of greater difficulty. Mr. Mundella tells us, with the authority of one who has studied the Education question throughout Europe, that "the requirements of the English Educational Code are the lightest" of all, and it does not need a prophet to foretell that, while this is so, no finality will seem to be attained,—in the eyes of Liberals, at all events. Whether a Royal Commission on "Brain Pressure in Relation to National Health" would be of much use, we are inclined to doubt; but surely some system of Reports might be devised, wherein the governors of Board schools should give the results of inquiries and observation on their own part, and on the part of the staff of each school throughout the kingdom. Her Majesty's Inspectors also could help in this matter, by paying special attention to the backward pupils in the annual examination. A good Inspector ought to discover very quickly whether a dull child has been "crammed" so as to mechanically answer questions, and just earn the grant; and if he comes to such a conclusion, he can refer the investigation on the subject of health, in such a case, to the governors of the school. No doubt, this has already occupied the attention of some Inspectors; but what is wanted is organised, universal observation.

We cannot as a nation afford to keep back the bright child for the benefit of the dull, as we should be doing were we to lower the Standards; nor can we separate off the dull children from the bright for separate instruction, as that would be fatal to the progress of the former, who would lose at once the incentive to industry, and with it their own self-respect. If the strain of our present Code is too great—and we disbelieve it—some other system of Grants will have to be devised. Instead of payment by results, which the New Code has already modified, we shall have to pay according to efficiency in management and teaching only. It will be a truly difficult task to frame an Inspectorate which could give satisfaction by its Reports under these heads, without the hard, matter-of-fact clue which is supplied by the results test in examinations.

So impracticable, indeed, does it seem to apply any other than the Examination test in Elementary Schools, that it will be well to devise some means which will prevent any risk of impairment of health under the present Curriculum. Some such plan as the giving of a substantial meal in the middle of the day in all such schools, as suggested in our issue of a fortnight ago, would, we believe, produce the best results. Too often it is the case that the dull child is the under-fed child, and the school meal would breed a double benefit; improved general physique and improved power of bearing the pressure of instruction, where the mind is, at present, starved through the body. Were the nation once convinced that, to hold our own, we must raise our Standards in education progressively, and that a healthy and well-fed body is an absolute condition of success in the average pupil, we believe the means of paying for such a meal would be forthcoming. Thus mind and body would be reciprocally indebted to each; mind, as developed to the utmost under favourable health conditions, body, as owing to the recognised need of educational developments its improved condition. On the question of the influence of the higher education and competitive examinations, which are equally part of the subject discussed at the Social Science Congress, we are inclined to traverse entirely many of the allegations which are often made. We do not believe that the best candidates in such examinations, putting aside, perhaps, the Indian Civil Service, where climatic influences come into play, suffer materially, if at all, from the strain put upon them. The defect is not in the system, but in the abuse of the system. Those who break down under it are, we fancy, those who have been driven on at too high a pressure to secure, by exceptionally severe efforts of memory, positions in the list to which their natural abilities do not entitle them. This is the real evil of the "cramming" system. For the candidates who are, by natural power, exactly those whom the Service wants, there is no need of "cramming," unless, indeed, the organised development of knowledge with the most careful avoidance of waste of energy is to be so called. It is a poor compliment to pay to the Examiners in such cases to suggest that they select "crammed" candidates, for the most part. As a matter of fact, it is well-organised knowledge which they appreciate highest, and unless such knowledge as candidates have be well organised, there are only a few, if any, who can give it adequate expression on paper. What successful "coaches," such as Mr. Wren, do, is to give instruction of a high kind in the subjects required for the different examinations, specialising more than can be done at a school, and supplying defects of ordinary school education which would ruin the chances of many excellent candidates, as, for instance, the niggardly allowance of time given to the modern languages, and even to the history of our own country. Their pupils work no harder than many a youth at the Universities who looks forward to a "First" and a "Fellowship," yet no one wants to abolish "Honours" at Oxford or Cambridge. Where, again, are the evidences of deterioration of health in the Officers of the Army or the Navy, or the Clerks of the higher grades of the Home Civil Service? Even if, however, it could be shown that the Competitive-examination system is a car of Jagannath, crushing its thousands of self-offered victims beneath its wheels, still the old question comes up,—“What is your alternative which will avoid jobbery and favouritism?” Mr. Teale's suggestion, in cases where good candidates outnumber appointments, that the final selection should be made by the drawing of lots, is not likely, we venture to think, to win the day.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

DR. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT ON COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I note an interesting query in your recent comments upon Dr. Clifford Allbutt's paper on competitive examinations: "Will Dr. Allbutt just tell us why, if physical injuries are not inherited, which is certain, mental injuries should be? The examinee may be hurt, and we are certain often is, but his children are not."

I fear you are in error with regard to the transmission of physical injuries. Some physical injuries certainly are inherited; the injuries inflicted by trainers upon thoroughbred horses leave their mark upon the offspring. The whole history of the survival of the fittest points to the inheritance of abnormalities which are the result of external influences more or less in the nature of injuries. It is well known that some dog-fanciers produce an exaggerated pug by breaking down the nasal bones, which I am told has its effect upon the progeny; and it is difficult to account for the tailless cats of the Isle of Man, if we reject the theory of centuries of mutilation. Men who do no work have children with small extremities. Fish spawned in the dark come at last into the world without organs of vision; and it is well known that short-sight is constantly transmitted from parent to offspring. Now, if the father did not overstrain his eyes, he would not be short-sighted, nor would he beget short-sighted children; but he does overstrain his eyes, and he does beget short-sighted children, who, again, transmit the defect. Here is clearly an instance of a self-inflicted injury which is undoubtedly transmitted, and if a physical injury of this kind is carried down for generations, why should not a mental or cerebral injury, the result of overstrain, have a deleterious effect or reappear in the offspring? Men who cannot perform their tasks without stimulants, as is the case with some orators and actors, are apt to have children with an abnormal tendency to alcoholism. No one is surprised at this. They say, "His father drank before him." The thief, the coward, the liar, the miser, reproduce themselves. "Like begets like," all the world over; I am sure the remark applies to acquired as well as to natural peculiarities, and if men will overstrain themselves in the endeavour to develop the mental at the expense of the physique, we cannot wonder that their offspring should suffer. Children whose eyes have been damaged for life by the present craze for "cram," under the modern School-board system, are constantly brought under my notice; and I entirely concur with Dr. Clifford Allbutt, to whom the thanks of the nation are due for his manly protest against the evils of competition. Knowledge is, no doubt, a good thing in itself, but it is evil, and not good, if purchased at the cost of broken health and spirits, or a tendency to disease which damages the race.—I am, Sir, &c.,

LONGEVITY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As a constant reader of your excellent paper, I have been much interested in the letters on "Longevity." Regarding the instance adduced by General Robertson in your number for September 29th, I may remark that, owing to a slight error in calculation, he does not make the best of his case—the lady therein mentioned having been born on May 11th, 1748, and dying on April 2nd, 1858, was within thirty-nine days of completing her 110th year—not 108th, as erroneously stated.*

I venture to submit the following instance, which fell under my own observation. When passing through Moscow on my way overland to India in 1828, I made the acquaintance of a medical man, a Scotchman by birth and education (whose name, however, has escaped my recollection), who had been settled there for many years, and was then physician to the Shérémétieff Hospital, an establishment founded and maintained by Count Shérémétieff, one of the old Russian Boyards, for the use of his own serfs, who in those days numbered 120,000 souls (as they were called in Russian), i.e., males paying "obrok." My friend, in going round the wards of the hospital, pointed out to me a hale-looking, little, old man, sitting on his bed, but who stood up and answered intelligibly some questions addressed to him, his only infirmity being slight deafness. This man had been drafted into the Army in the time of Peter the Great, before whom he had passed in review shortly before that monarch's death, which took place in 1725. This was, the doctor said, authentically proved by papers in his possession, and the man's career clearly shown until his reception into the hospital thirty years before. Supposing his age to have been only fifteen at the time of his marching past the Emperor, this makes his age when I saw him to be one hundred and eighteen. My friend assured me that instances of very advanced age were very common among the peasantry in Russia, but that, owing to the absence of all parish records or other similar documents, it was difficult, if not impossible, to get at their exact age, except in an instance like this, where the subject had entered the Army, and his future career was therefore a matter of public notoriety.—I am, Sir, &c.,

PROFESSOR FLOWER AT READING.

SIR,—In your article on "Professor Flower at Reading," you say that the Clergy quake lest the doctrine of Evolution may interfere with the belief in miracle, and you seem to hope that the Professor will supplement his address with further matter showing that the Clergy need not be quakers. I do not know whether Professor Flower may be able to supply the required consolation. To my mind, that would depend upon what you or what the Clergy mean by "miracle." It seems to me that the objection of most scientific men to "miracle" is that that expression implies and enforces mental indolence. Zet; 3et implies that Zeus rains of his own volition, and there is an end of inquiry and speculation. "It rains," on the contrary, leaves us free to find out what rain is, and the how and why of it. A physical occurrence is always, according to the scientific creed, a fair subject of analysis. If a Mormon tells me that Joe Smith raised a man from the dead, the Mormon's mind is filled and satisfied with belief in Joe's supernatural power; but to me, his assertion is absolutely meaningless, unless I have opportunity of enlarging the facts which he represents in this way.

But the difficulty as to miracles is solid in winter only, and will melt in the spring which is, as I hope and believe, at hand. Only I am sorry that you should think "miracles" in any way essential to Christianity. Are you not binding upon, let us say, the weaker brethren burdens not imposed by our Master? Have we the slightest reason to think that he would have rejected a follower who doubted whether he had raised Lazarus? To believe that the physical consequents on Christ's death are scientifically inexplicable is the miraculous theory; to believe that they are potentially explicable, i.e., explicable if the facts were sufficiently known, is the non miraculous theory. Surely a man may hold either of these, and—if he love the Lord his God and his neighbour—be an excellent Christian. Or must we make that absolutely essential to our Christianity which is wholly foreign to the Christianity of Christ himself?—I am, Sir, &c.,

CONVICTS.

SIR,—I observe in the Spectator this morning a remark (with regard to the intrusion of French récidivistes in Australia) that "it is difficult to expect that the colonies of New South Wales and Tasmania should be so grimly in earnest as Victoria, New Zealand, and Queensland evidently are."

Long experience in Australia justifies me in assuring you that no colony will be found more grimly in earnest on the question of repelling convicts than the powerful colony of New South Wales; and weak though she may be, and remote from the points where invasion is imminent, I doubt not that Tasmania will do her part also. How can the Imperial Government expect it to be otherwise? Did not the public men of Australia dare the displeasure of some English statesmen, by rejecting convicts from the mother-country? Shall they welcome the crime of France?

It is proverbial that men are in peril when a neighbour's house is on fire. Would not he be mad who, after once putting out the flames in his home, would tamely see a stranger lay a train by means of which his house is to be again set on fire?—I am, Sir, &c.,

CHILDREN AND THEIR DINNERS.

SIR,—In your interesting article on the above subject, you say:—"To raise the race, the growing boys and girls must be fed too, and the total expense of feeding them 'like gentlefolk's children' as regards essentials, and especially of giving milk
